Editorial.

THE change of name from the UNIVERSITY MIRROR to the BUCKNELL MIRROR is but a step in the contemplated plans for improvement. The management is indebted to Miss Candace Wood for designing the new title page.

THE MIRROR for July will be issued as soon after commencement as possible. Scarcity of news for the July issue, and the difficulty of communicating with the editorial board after the close of the term, render this departure advisable.

THE college Y. M. C. A. is to be congratulated on its splendid work for the past year. The meetings have been highly interesting and instructing and have done much to elevate the moral and spiritual character of our students. May the good work continue to prosper and bring forth abundant fruit.

CONCERTED action is always more successful than individual effort. Unity of purpose never fails to secure good results. In research, study, athletics; in every phase of student life this is true.

Association among students for the advancement of various interests are often laughed at, but not justly. We have a number of such associations at Bucknell and the benefit derived from them can be plainly seen in the success of our Chemical and Physical society.

THE reception to be given by the Chemical and Physical society during commencement week promises to be even more interesting and instructive than that given last year. This society has been doing a good work at Bucknell, and it is still in its infancy, so far as influence is concerned. Every student who is interested in scientific research should become a member of this society. The fees are small and the benefit to be derived will repay many times the amount invested.

COMMENCEMENT and the close of another year's work are near at hand. The Seniors can be observed "grinding out" their mighty graduating orations, and the under-classmen may be seen "bohning" and "poling" for examinations. Glancing in retrospection over the work of the past year we are assured that Bucknell has taken rapid strides forward. The curriculum has been broadened and improved, especially in the matter of electives. New apparatus has been secured for the study of electricity, histology, biology and chemistry. New and valuable books have been added to the library and much refurnishing and refitting has been done. When our Alumni return at commencement time to visit their alma mater they will surely be pleased and inspired by the progressive work of the past year.

THE meeting of the Central Inter-Collegiate Press association, held in Philadelphia on May 20th, was not as well attended as the previous one, but was nevertheless quite interesting.

The place of meeting was changed, and the next meeting will be held in Lancaster. It is the intention of the association to hold the meetings at the various colleges instead of holding them continually in Philadelphia. It was also decided to drop from the roll of membership all college papers which did not send representatives to the regular meetings.

IT IS to be regretted that the graduating class has decided not to have "class day," and it is to be hoped that the class will yet reconsider its action. "Class day," when properly managed, never fails to be of interest and amusement to both students and visitors. It unquestionably adds spiciness and flavor to the proceedings of commencement week. Many of us can, no doubt, recall the "class days" of '89 and '90 and remember how much they added to the commencement.

Held either on the campus or in the hall, "Class Day" exercises should never be absent from the commencement program.

THE class of '93 will soon be numbered among our blue-ribboned Alumni. The class is much smaller than graduating classes for several years, but let us hope that it makes up in quality what it lack in quantity; "Exigui numero, sed bello vivida virtus."

The graduating classes of the Institute and Academy are of about the usual size. The program for commencement week should prove interesting. The "Junior Ex." will take place on Saturday evening, June 17th, and the graduating class in music will hold their exercises on the afternoon of the same day. Several very prominent educators will serve to make the following three days interesting, and the remaining part of the program will be filled by the graduating classes.

Let us remember that the success of the commencement depends largely on the students, and let us work to make the commencement of '93 a memorable one in the history of the University.

OUR base ball team has not come up to our hopes and expectations, but let us not become discouraged. The members of the team have worked hard and faithfully for success. The captain, Mr. Smith, ably assisted by Hon. H. M. McClure and P. B. Linn, Esq., has done all in his power to make the team successful. The failure to win a majority of the games must be attributed to the stagnant condition of base ball at Bucknell for the past three or four years. Ball-players are not developed in a week nor in a year, but constant and assiduous practice for a number of years is required. The team may not be a source of pride to us this year, but the experience derived will be invaluable for the next season.

The lot of the manager is not an easy or a pleasant one. With the aid of our entire student body we should be amply able to assist and support our athletic teams. Let those who have not been accustomed to uphold the athletics of Bucknell fall into line and help us on to victory and success.

CARPIO MANTILINUS.

Twelve hundred years ago the rising sun looked down on the stately city of Juno, proud Carthage, queen of the Mediterranean, whose glory was as yet undimmed. It gilded her costly palaces with their beautiful pleasure grounds and sparkling lakes, and gleamed on the burnished helmets and lit up the dark faces of a mighty army marching to the harbor, there to embark for Italy, the fair Hesperian land. "Embark for Italy," did I say? Yes, that was to be their final destination, but their feet would first travel through many lands. They were to pass through almost unbearable hardships and meet almost unconquerable difficulties before they reached that fair country, the centre of all their hopes, and the goal of Hannibal's ambition.

All were full of the enthusiasm of their commander, but no heart beat higher and no braver spirit was in the throng than that of little Carpio Mantilinus, a Carthaginian boy, who had run away from home that morning and begged Hannibal to let him go, too, on this glorious journey.

Though Hannibal had no intention of transporting a nursery with him, yet he was impressed by Carpio's bravery, and perhaps remembering his own extreme youth when he began his career by vowing eternal hate to the Romans, he was prevailed upon to take the daring youngster. So on this bright spring morning little Carpio, Hannibal and his great army, with thirty-seven war elephants, set sail for Spain. I say little Carpio first, for he and not Hannibal is our hero.

The rocky promontories being gained, a hostile country lay between them and the Pyrenees, for the interior of Spain was then almost an unknown region, inhabited by savages of the fiercest type. Through the war like tribes they pushed on their slow march, winning the ground inch by inch, and more than twenty thousand men were lost, and the summer was nearly gone when they reached the foot of the Pyrenees. Yet Hannibal was not disheartened, nor was little Carpio, who had become more truly Hannibal's companion and confidant than anyone else in the army.

The boy had a very winning way, and the intense disposition of the hero-worshiper, as Carlyle would say, and that combined with his unconscious bravery, made him very congenial company for Hannibal, who, in spite of his fiercer qualities, had a very warm heart.

Leaving a strong force to guard the newly-conquered lands and discharging ten thousand more of the men who had begun to murmur because of their hardships, the commander pushed on with the remainder across the Pyrenees, and led them into the valley of the Rhone. There the Gauls attempted to dispute their passage, but they were routed and the army (now only about fifty thousand) and the elephants were ferried across the stream in native boats and on rudely-built rafts.

Now they traveled along the banks of the Rhone, then following the course of one of its eastern tributaries, the Isere river, the foot hills of the Alps were reached, probably at the pass of Little St. Bernard.

Everything seemed to join to make the passage hard. It was now late in October and snow fell upon the mountains and the eternal cold of their summits seemed to reign everywhere. Still the army toiled painfully up the dangerous passes, encouraged by the immortal words of their dauntless commander, "Beyond the Alps lieth thine Italy."

"Thine Italy!" for he believed that the Alps once surmounted the country, with all its wealth and resources, was open to them. So on they pressed, sometimes having to cut the narrow path wider for the huge elephants, and often being stoned by hostile bands holding the heights above.

Carpio had assiduously cultivated the acquaintance of the elephants, and when, in the words of the historian, the summit gained, the shivering, phantom-like army looked down into the warm haze of the Italian plains, Carpio, looking like a very determined little ghost perched on the back of the great elephant Majoricus, was outlined against the sky.

His eyes were fixed with an adoring expression on the hero of all hearts, the dauntless Hannibal, who, with his proud form drawn up to its utmost height and fiery eyes flashing with sudden inspiration, cried to his listening followers: "We stand on the very Acropolis of Italy, yonder lies Rome, the Eternal City! O proud mistress of the world, we shall yet possess thee!"

It was the proudest moment of Hannibal's career, for alas! his hopes came not to fulfillment, and he was never surer of victory than then, therefore never more happy.

Then the army, with but half its former numbers, slowly descended to the plain of the Po, to the great alarm of the startled Romans, who never had dreamed of the foe's arriving from that direction. Their armies had gone to Spain, expecting to meet Hannibal there, and of course they were hastily summoned.

In the battle at Ticinus, which followed, Carpio alone could control the frightened elephants, and several times saved lives by his quickness of action.

Finally, when a Roman officer was engaged in a hand-to-hand conflict with Carpio's adored master, Hannibal, another Roman, Catus Scythius, dishonorably rushed up to pierce Hannibal from behind. Little Carpio, seeing the movement, instantly drove Majoricus, the great elephant, toward the man, who swerved from his course just in time to escape death instead of inflicting it, but presently, with a revengeful instinct, slyly thrusting his spear in the elephant's flank, drove the great beast furious in the opposite direction, crushing down little Carpio in his raging plunge.

Thus perished the dauntless child, far from home and friends, but never nobler victim fell on battlefield, and never truer grief was wrung from noble hearts than that which Hannibal and his officers felt for the little hero, Carpio Mantilinus.

IN MEMORIAM.

THE REVEREND PROFESSOR GEORGE RIPLEY BLISS, D. D. LL. D.

Read by John Hamptone before the Baptist Pastors' Conference, Philadelphia, May 22, 1893.

I fear that my love for Professor Bliss, my admiration for his character, and my sense of indebtedness to him as one of the formative forces of my youth, have combined to lead me into the acceptance of a trust concerning him, which I am ill qualified to discharge It is of his Lewisburg life, and chiefly of his influence as a teacher there, that I am asked to speak. He settled at Lewisburg a year before I was born. Of the five years that I spent there, not more than three did I enjoy the privilege of direct contact with him in the class room. There are many of the earlier graduates of the College who came into closer relations with him; many whose maturity of mind, at the time of their intellectual fellowship with him, enabled them to appreciate his mental powers, his varied learning and his spiritual force, as my youth did not allow me to do. At the time I was little conscious of the deep impression his personality was making upon my life. It is the reflections of the after years that have revealed both the man and his influence. As I think of this, it is the most striking evidence, personal to myself, of his real power. So distinct and definite, although then undiscerned, were the influences of his spirit upon my own, that, little as I have seen of him since graduation from College, and little as I then thought He had affected me, I find myself to-day in possession of a clear and cogent sense of the man he was, the influence he exerted, his aims as a teacher, and the inner sources of his power.

"The past
Has got its glory from its being far,
And orbed into the perfect star
We saw not as we moved therein."

And that figure of the star is most expressive as to him and his influences. His life was so quiet, its shining force was so subdued, its radiance was so mild, as to give a first impression of distance and lack of warmth. But the power of the man was planetary. He drew us to him as steadily as satellites are ever drawn; as decisively as though his influence had been more glowingly exerted; and even now that he is no more than a memory, the attractive forces of his life remain to win us toward the ideals that were so serenely lustrous in his character. There is, often, a world of significance packed away in a nickname. It may have been undesigned in the bestowal; those who first affixed it may have nominated better than they knew. To successive classes of students at Lewisburg he was "Bossy" Bliss. How affectionately we lingered upon its utterance. It was never spoken otherwise than respectfully. He was always venerable in our eyes. It came to express (whatever it may have signified at first) our sense of that quiet, masterful influence which he exerted—nay, it is more exact to say, which was diffused, wherever he came. I doubt if any of you have known a life more benign; or a career more unruffled, or a rarer union of power with peace. His self-mastery was nearly perfect. His self repression amounted almost, if not quite to fault. He not only did not parade his learning which was both exact and extensive, in several languages ancient and modern, but he seemed shy of letting it be known that he was in so wide a sense, a scholar. Go to him for information and you were sure to get it, offhand, but precise. His kinsman, Professor Rossitor W. Raymond, has recently said of him, and the words are the more weighty, in that he is himself so full a man, of so versitile a mind, "I never knew the extent of Dr. Bliss's learning—only that when I wanted information from him I always received it. But of this much I am sure, that he knew whatever he professed to know; and that above all acquaintance with books and languages he knew and could teach that high life to which all else is subordinate."

Some of us were not careful to enquire, in those days of old, as to the secret of his marvelous poise and placidity. A deeper Christian experience on our part has furnished the clue. To many a superficial observer it looked like the inevitability of temperament, and was counted in part for weakness. But those who came to know him at all, soon saw that this was no just account of the matter. Test him as to the strength of his convictions and you found him fixed and flinty. Called, in some interval, to administrative responsibility, he proved himself sufficient for the demands of a difficult occasion, and handled delicate matters of college discipline with equal firmness and sagacity. His mildness had the majesty of strength beneath it. His unruffled quietness of manner was a preference and a virtue. The secret of all was that "high life" to which Professor Raymond refers. He wore the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit through Christ's grace, and for Christ's sake. One who knew him in the intimacies of the home explained all when she wrote, "I covet his spirituality, his habitual intimacy and communion with his Master."

This distinctive feature of Professor Bliss's character upon which I have dwelt so decisively, explains both his limitation and his power as a teacher. His limitation, for the choice of one organizing principle of character is always at cost in other particulars. No man is without his limitations. To prefer one sort of power is to forego another. Young and crude minds, especially, respond more quickly to aggressive and assertive leadership. Some teachers stir you, magnetize you. Their influence is immediate and exciting. The effect of such minds upon others is not always as lasting as it is instantly evident. There was a want of this element, whatever its worth, in the work of Dr. Bliss as a teacher. His power was of another order. It was indirect, rather. It was the power of character, with the element of exerted force at the minimum. It required time for its best effects; and for its largest appreciation on the part of the beneficiary. It was the power of sympathy, both intellectual and spiritual; often silent, but when expressed the more helpful because of the reticence against which it stood forth in relief. As one who knew him well says in a note to me, "He drew, and led, and helped us upward, onward, by simply being himself and living his own life before us." Behind the words of counsel when occasion made them necessary was the steady power of his example as man and scholar.

It was this same temper that made his judgments so just and his candor so notable. Your intense mind is apt so to project itself as to become narrow, linear. Calm is the parent of breath. Dr. Bliss was a natural counsellor. The beatitude of the peacemaker accrued inevitably to him. Many a storm of doubt has he stayed in young minds. Many a soul has he led to Christ, and helped to solid footing upon substantial Christian foundations who but for him might have continued to flounder in the slough of uncertainty. Always it was his manifold sympathy with both truth and man that gave him his opportunity. He knew how to trust both. Part of his power was his calm confidence, his freedom from apprehension, as to the future either of truth or life.

Fanciful it may seem to some, but with this same, equable, slow and steady temper of Dr. Bliss's mind, I associate one of the incidental excellencies of his influence as a teacher. He first gave to me a sense of thedignity, beauty and precision of our mother tongue. His stream of utterance did not flow fast, but it was as pellucid and perfect as any English speech to which I have listened. I remember how gradually I became aware of this; and then, with what admiring wonder I used to watch the simplicity and felicity of his diction. Every word was in its right place; every word had its right force. The sentences were as clear as crystal and yet they had the liquid quality of harmonious movement; and they came with so stately a pace that you could easily note and admire. Few men have more thoroughly believed, fewer still have more diligently obeyed that counsel of Dr. R. W. Dale, to Yale divinity students: "Your language is not yours—not yours alone; it belongs to your country and to posterity. Take care that, so far as you are concerned, none of its fertile provinces are permitted to sink out of cultivation. Maintain its ancient idiom. Honor the laws which have governed its structure." This Dr. Bliss did with conscientious care. A scholar in other tongues, he was master of his own.

Professor Bliss gave twenty-five years of such influence to the schools at Lewisburg. He built himself and many of his ideals into their life. The past of the institution is impressed with his character. Its future will continue to be colored by his life. His influence in the councils of the faculty was as quiet and decisive as in the class room It was felt in the church, throughout the town, and ranged into the surrounding country. No review of Dr. Bliss's life in Lewisburg would be complete that did not dwell, at least for a moment, upon these incidental features of his ministry. During the first years of his residence he was pastor of the church as well as professor in the college. He allayed what had been troubles until he came; eased at once frictions that had been irritating. The first autumn of his pastorate saw a revival of religion in progress, the fruit of his faithful preaching of the gospel. More than sixty were converted. Both students and townfolk joined in its benefits. No one who has lived a graduate's term in that town needs to be told in what estimate he was held by everyone. He became in time the patriarch of the region. He had a cordial word and a fatherly smile for everyone, especially the poor and the weak. They would send for him, from miles of distance, to reconcile difference in families and communities The citizens elected him a member of the borough council. When the dark days of the war came, every fibre of him turned to patriotism. He went about making campaign speeches in the Lincoln canvass. He sheltered and succoured runaway slaves. When the institution closed its doors, just before the battle of Gettysburg, he went to the seat of war as a nurse. He made it his first duty to recover the body of a young townsman who had been killed, and of whom no trace had been found until he restored his remains to his friends. To the end of life he would recall, occasionally, what it has cost him of shrinking and pain to face the dreadful sights of the battlefield after the conflict, and the sufferings of the wounded in the hospitals. The hospital in which he did most of his work as a nurse was one in which Confederate wounded soldiers were in the majority. These are trifles, you may say, in contrast with many of the larger achievements of the man, yet they reveal the perfection of the Christian spirit.

But it was to his pupils that Dr. Bliss gave his life. He was philanthropist, patriot, pastor, and in all relations Christian; but first and last, and by preference, he was a teacher of young men. There has come into my hands a copy of a note written by him in the autumn of 1890 to Mr. James R. Gilmore, editor of a forthcoming encyclopedia of biography, which is a beautiful evidence of his manly modesty and at the same time a token of his own clear sense of the quiet pervasive diffusion of himself in and through his students. In this he found his satisfaction and reward. These are his words: "In compliance with your circular request of the 13th inst. I send a few sentences concerning my life history. Of course it is but a few sentences for which, even in a work so extensive as your encyclopedia, you can have room; nor, if you had more room would more words be appropriate. My life has been spent in as strict seclusion as is consistent with the vocation of an instructor of youth. If it is to have any significant record, it is a hidden one in the character, attainments and modes of thought of at least forty five classes of young people who have in succession passed under my influence." This record he has finished. It will abide, and is his living memorial.

He himself is gone. We shall see that tall, spare figure, with the scholar's stoop, that fair-gray head, massive in proportions, that spiritual face, those mild eyes and that wise smile, no more below. We shall not hear again the ripple of his light laugh (for he had a quiet, delicate sense of humor) nor the music of his speech. We shall feel no more the thrill of his fatherly sympathy, nor rejoice again in his evident pride in us and in our work. But so far as I know, there is not one student of all who sat in his class room that can, or will, forget him. His influence will last with us till the close of life. We shall love him not less, but more, as the years go by.

THE LANGUAGE OF LITERATURE.

The chief thing in literature is the substance of the literary work. One cannot write well unless he can think well. And the chief thing, then, is the thought which is expressed by any writing. Very few stop to think how the work is written or bother themselves about the form of expression.

Certain modes of expression are strikingly impressive, but the majority of readers notice very little more than that they are different from some other ways.

While the mode of expression is secondary to the thought expressed, still if the language of literature were not chosen very few books would survive their birth, no matter how much thought they contained. And so we find that authors differ very much as to the character of their language and expression, and this difference is pleasant to note.

The language of literature must be far above the common conversational language. Even the speech used in conversation in the best society and by the most highly educated people must be surpassed in literature. One reads books for enlightenment and entertainment, and he cannot be satisfied with the monotony which accompanies common, every-day speech. In the newspapers this style may be permitted, for the papers are read only for the sake of obtaining certain facts concerning actions which are relative to us. Once read, they are thrown aside and are rarely kept for reference or for their lasting thoughts; and, in fact, they are scarcely even read, but merely glanced over for the current news.

We have been referring to proper conversational language, but improper speech used in conversation is more doomed to destruction than the proper modes of expression. By proper forms of expression we mean those which are grammatically correct and are not included under provincialisms or slang. While it is the language which makes grammar and not grammar which makes the language, still it is the observance of grammatical rules that gives the writer any precedence as such. No one considered the writings of Sam Jones after he had once read them in the daily papers; in fact, very few took even the trouble to read them. Another improper form is slang. It is true to some extent that the slang of one age becomes the correct speech of the next age, but not so by any means with all slang. And so when we read works of fiction or any other literary work we may be surprised at the expression and we may perhaps admire it, but that is all. The works of Dickens are very good illustrations of this kind of language. We do not say all his language is offensive, but it is such that we of this generation cannot heartily approve; and quite likely in the next age many of his works will become obscure. Contrast the language of Shakespeare and Milton with that of Dickens or Thackeray. We all admit the supremacy of the former, not only because the thoughts are greater, but because they clothed the thoughts in a studied expression, such as has moulded the language of the nation for centuries; while the forms of expression in the works of the latter abound in words and sentences which are already quaint and obscure.

While common conversational language is unsuited for literary work, still one must not think that a high-flown style, full of large words, is meant.

Plain and simple language, with words suited to the thought is that for which every author should strive. Mrs. Humphrey Ward's book, "Robert Elsmere,'' created a great sensation because of its thought, but the language was so beyond the ordinary usage that it was difficult for most people to grasp her thought. On the other hand, the simple story told in simple language by Harriet Beecher Stowe, has been read the world over and has helped to influence a nation.

Another uncommon literary form, if it may be called a literary form, is the use of foreign words. An author may be well versed in foreign languages, but he is ignorant of their use if he dots the pages of his work by foreign terms and with those which are not understood by the masses of the nation for whom he writes. Many people lose interest in a book simply because there are inserted here and there foreign words and expressions which they cannot understand and the force of which they cannot appreciate. If a good thought is expressed well in one language the people will see to it that the same thing is put into many languages. Victor Hugo wrote ''Les Miserables'' in French, but the English have made its fame world wide by translating it into their own language.

Finally, all works will bear criticism, but there are some whose influence will last because of their expression, and they would scarcely endure because of their thought. "Larna Doone,'' by Blackmore, is an example of this kind. It is lofty yet subdued; prose and still poetical; with simple yet exalted language; it stands as a monument of proper literary language. And so we might speak of the simple English in ''Pilgrim's Progress,'' and of ''Paradise Lost,'' and of the works of that greater writer, Shakespeare; all have stood the fire of criticism and remain to us as models of what is necessary in the language of literature.

THE POET IN HISTORY.

The poet has been considered an idealist. He is supposed to see things with the mind's eye, rather than with the eye of sense. His pen "gives to airy nothing a local habitation and a name." He is not practical.

On the other hand, history is serions and real. Humor may cometimes touch human conduct, but, for the most part, the events with which the historian deals are grave and serious. How, then, can a poet be considered as a part of history? He is so considered because the general concept of his nature and work is erroneous. The poet is by no means the lackadaisical creature represented in Puck; he is a real and practical character. Take, for instance, his faculty of sight. Does a poet see things as clear in outline and true in color as the ordinary man? It is his province to see nature and man as they are. He can define a landscape and explore the hidden depths of our hearts better than any other man in the world. The poet above all knows what we are and what we ought to be. Tennyson could not restrain those notes:

> "Live pure, speak true, right wrong,
> Follow the King,
> Else wherefore live?"

Again, take the question of practicality. Than international affairs there are few affairs more important to mankind. As by an instinct men have chosen, during the last few centuries, poets for ambassadors, diplomats and envoys from state to state. Even here in the United States, where materialism runs rampant, the poet has been called from the quiet of his study to represent his country before the sovereigns of the world. Lowell will not be honored alone for his poetry and prose, but he will have a place and rank for what he has done among the rulers of the nations.

The ancients held the poet in a truer light than do the moderns. He could engage in the activities of life. Little may be known of Solon as a poet, yet his verses were held in high esteem by the Greeks. His wisdom was not only displayed in rhythmical utterances, but also made a lasting impression on the laws of Hellas. Tyrtaens it was who wrote marching songs for the Lacedemonians. That pean, "To the front ye brave sons of Sparta," thrills us as well as the Spartan soldiery who marched to those immortal battlefields.

The Romans, as much as the Greeks regarded the bards as a part of Republican and Imperial society. Roman poets were often wealthy and frequently held positions of responsibility under Emperors. The composition of a great poem was reckoned a work of the highest honor Great potentates sought the companionship of Virgil and of Horace; they were flattered by a recognition in verse.

If, then, the ancients recognized the true worth of poets by courting their friendship and honoring them not only for their verse, but for their ability in other lines, we of today must give due consideration to the place of the poet. For ourselves modern instances ought to suffice. The bard, therefore, shall no longer be confined to the ethereal, but shall have, with other great men, his pages in the annals of the world.

Local.

A cinder track will be put on the campus this summer.

J. Lesher, '96, has been away attending his brother's funeral.

The general countenance of Ezra Allen, '95, is again seen in our midst.

The prospects are that the next freshman class will not number less than fifty.

Dr. Enoch Perrine preached two scholarly sermons in the Presbyterian church April 7.

The third game in the Dickinson-Bucknell chess tournament was concluded May 12, resulting in a draw.

The last of the series of Sunday afternoon sermons, in Bucknell Hall, was preached by Rev. Owen James, May 21.

President Harris addressed the Reading Baptist Association, at Pottsville, at its meeting during the second week in May.

Soph. translating German: "Thrice I tried to put my arms around her, professor, that's as far as I got." Prof: "That was far enough."

Through the kindness of Mr. and Mrs. Dr. Harris the Senior class were given a reception May 30. A very enjoyable evening was spent.

The Alma Banjo Club gave another one of their delightful concerts in Bucknell Hall on Friday evening, May 26, for the benefit of the Athletic Association.

H. T. Colestock will go to Harrisburg at the request of the Prohibition Club of Bucknell, to represent Bucknell in the prohibition contest in oratory June 6-7.

Beginning with the next school year, an additional course in history will be offered to the Juniors, and advanced work in organic analysis will be added to the scientific course.

His honor, Judge McClure, sometimes amuses the boys on the College campus by batting "flys" beyond the walk. The judge is an old base ball player and occassionally indulges in playing for exercise.

A student in grammar at the Academy comparing ill—positive ill, comparative worse, superlative dead. Professor: "That will do; the class will have a vacation of two days to attend the funeral."

Maxey, '93, represented THE MIRROR in the meeting of the Central Inter-Collegiate Press Association, held in Philadelphia, May 20. The subject of his paper was: "The Future Usefulness of the Association."

Mr. H. T. Colestock, '76, won the second prize in the State Prohibition Oratorical contest, held at Harrisburg, June 6. Dickinson College carried off the first prize and will represented Pennsylvania at the National contest, to be held at Chicago, June 28.

An Edison phonograph entertainment was given in Music Hall, Monday evening, May 8, for the benefit of the base ball team. The attendance was not very large, probably owing to the nearness, in time, of other events at the hall, both past and prospective. The phonograph worked nicely. The University band played a selection, which was followed by the College cry and singing by several of the students. These features were perfectly reproduced by the phonograph.

On Memorial Day a sad accident befel little John Harris, the bright three year old boy of Dr. Harris, of the University. While the house was being decorated the little fellow ran out on the roof of a porch over the front entrance, and fell down to the pavement below before aid could reach him. He fell on his side and broke his left leg at the thigh. No internal injuries were found.

The Junior Annual, L'Agenda, is out and is a production of which the class and the school may justly be proud. It is a book containing 200 pages, the page being 7x9 inches in size, and is full of interesting, spicy matter which it is a pleasure to read. Among its special features are cuts and sketches of Prof. John Owens and Dr. Robert Lowry, and sketches of Dr. Bliss and Rev. J. P. Tustin, recommending the book to those interested in the University and its men, not only as of present interest, but as a book to be preserved. The humorous side of college life is hit off in a way, which, while amusing and often ludicrous, cannot seem overdrawn or offensive. The price of the book is 75 cents. Sent anywhere postpaid on receipt of price. Address, Warren Martz, Manager, Lewisburg, Pa.

A pleasant affair took place one evening recently, at the Institute, when Dr. E. Aviragnet, the capable leader of the University band, was presented with a handsome silver tipped baton. The presentation speech was made on behalf of the band by Manager G. H. Waid, and Dr. Aviragnet, although deeply moved, responded in a few well chosen words. The baton is the handsomest of the kind ever seen in Lewisburg, and was purchased from Nogel Bros. After the presentation, the band accorded the Institute girls a serenade.

NOTICE.

Upon application, I will furnish card orders for excursion rates, good for ten days, on the following railroads: The Pennsylvania railroad system, including United railroads of New Jersey, Philadelphia and Erie, Northern Central, Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore, the Philadelphia and Reading railroad, including the main line and Williamsport division. By special arrangement good board can be had at private boarding houses from $1.00 to $1.50 per day. Hotel rates, $2.00 per day. Special information concerning accommodations will be furnished on application. All commencement visitors are cordially invited to register in Room No. 2, College Building, where the undersigned will have quarters during commencement week. Writing, mailing, telegraph, postoffice and messenger facilities can also be found at the same place. Polite attendance will be furnished, free of charge, to escort visitors over the grounds and through the various buildings. Mail sent in care of the Registrar will be promply delivered. W. C. GRETZINGER,
Registrar.

Under the direction of Professors E. Aviragnet and J. B. Ettinger, the concert given May 18 for the benefit of Miss Mary Derr, a former pupil of the Institute, was a grand success. The chorus sung by the Choral Society of Bucknell was a notable feature, as also selections by the University band and the orchestra. The greatest interest centered in Miss Derr and Mr. Halfpenny, who both came from the school of the celebrated vocalist, William Courtney, of New York. The class of voice culture from the Institute was represented by Miss Nellie Jauss, who sang the soprano parts in two duets with Miss Derr. It was the debut of Miss Jauss, and a very brilliant one. Other features of the concert were Beethoven's Vth Symphony, admirably rendered by Misses May Harris and Juliet Aikin; Mr. R. B. Davidson sang with good effect, while Miss Louise Lawshe and Mr. Brown Martin pleased the audience by selections on the violin. The concert was in every way a great success and ranks high in the annals of Lewisburg's musical events.

During commencement week the seventh volume of the Daily Commencement News will be issued. It will greet its many friends with a complete resume of all of interest happening during our annual commencement. Its improved condition will bespeak the prosperity attending our University. Some of Bucknell's most noted alumni will contribute valuable articles to our columns. The "Spectator" will again contribute a column. The News will publish the Baccalaureate sermon, by President John H. Harris, LL. D.; oration before the literary societies, by President D. B. Purinton, LL. D., of Denison University, O.; oration before the alumni, by E. M. Brawley, D. D., of Nashville, Tenn. It will also print abstracts of all other leading discourses. The four issues will be mailed to any address for 15 cents. Let all those interested in our University send in their subscriptions as early as possible. Stamps may be sent. Address the manager,

A. C. LATHROP.

BASE BALL.

BUCKNELL VS. MILTON.

On the afternoon of May 17, the team went to Milton with the express purpose of defeating the Milton ball team. But again we lost, and it was such a very hard game to lose. Without the assistance of Mr. Reid, the first umpire, Milton would never have been in sight of victory. Marsh and Barclay had just completed a splendid double play when the aforesaid umpire objected and called the man safe at home; at this point Capt. Smith strenuously objected to Mr. Reid, and Mr. Reid was accordingly "fired." Megargee to Cressinger to Smith was the passage of a ball in another double play for our team, this time too painfully evident to the Milton men to call the man safe. As far as hitting went, Bucknell made eleven hits to Milton's six—but yet we lost. In the seventh inning and the ninth Bucknell had three men on bases, but it was impossible to score. Scatchard made his debut as a player, and played a good game, making two hits and having an assist in right field. Weidenhammer's pitching was difficult to gauge at times, as he struck out fifteen men. Smith's work was also very effective.

BUCKNELL VS. DICKINSON.

Bucknell played a game with Dickinson college at Carlisle on May 20. It was a very close and exciting game until the ninth inning, when Dickinson batted out six of their twelve runs. The features of the game were a great catch of a fly ball by Parker and Cressinger's unassisted double play when two men were on bases with one man out. Smith stole bases with impunity, but Barclay cut off several attempts of the Dickinson men to reach second base by hard, quick and accurate throws. For Dickinson Goodall's batting was the feature. The team was entertained very nicely by the Dickinson men. Such treatment deserves creditable mention, because it enhances the pleasure of a trip with a ball team, even if the visiting team is defeated.

Dickinson College sent her strong nine to Lewisburg on May 12, and administered to us a defeat which should have been a victory. Poor support, as usual, was what lost the game. Captain Smith pitched a fine game, striking out eleven men and giving Dickinson but three hits, and one of these a scratch. Our boys yet lack "snap" in their play, but we believe that with more experience on the field they will gain confidence and play better. Following is the score:

On May 17 the Varsity crossed bats with the strong team of Milton and won their first game of the season. Bourn occupied the box for the 'Varsity and did excellent work. Bucknell's team played fine ball, giving Bourn perfect support. Weidenhammer occupied the box for the visitors, but he was pounded at will by our boys. At the end of the ninth inning the score stood Bucknell 10, Milton 1. The score:

BOOK REVIEWS.

Between the Gates	Vida Davenport
Les Miserables	Emma Starick

Our principal, who spent Sunday at the home of Miss Eva Derr, speaks enthusiastically of the beautiful valley which includes within its limits the villages of Limestoneville and Paradise. Farming is here carried to a state of perfection, which may be called classic. Well tilled fields, orchards white with the rich promise of fruitage and ample barns tell of a well directed industry. But better still, one finds that those who dwell within the pleasant homesteads "have an eye to see, and a heart to feel the beauty and the joy within their reach." Books, pictures, music make rich their hours of leisure. Well were it if all the homesteads of our land were like those set in this fair valley.

There are few college towns surrounded by more attractive scenery and delightful nooks, within walking distance than Lewisburg. Down the river by Red Rocks, which are just now covered with the graceful nodding columbine, is a favorite walk with the girls.

At one of the Friday exercises, Prof. Owens took us to the Paris exposition, and by means of diagrams and graphic descriptions he made us see the wonderful panorama of progress that the French had presented to the world. If Chicago exceeds Paris she will need to direct her energies toward something beside getting the gates of the fair open on the Sabbath. We should be glad to have a comparative lecture on the Columbian and Parisian expositions when Prof. Owens returns from Chicago.

The picnic at Blue Hill, Saturday, was a pleasant affair.

The concert in Music Hall, under the direction of Dr. Aviragnet, was quite equal to his former musical entertainments. The sympathetic voice of Miss Jauss was a delight to the audience.

Miss Margaret Thomson, class of '92, testified to her interest in her school home during her late visit here, by expressing an ardent desire to return and take the College Course.

ACADEMIC CORRESPONDENCE.

[J. M. WILSON, Correspondent.]

The Fourth Form Commencement invitations are out.

Mr. C. B. Galloway, of Moors, has returned to the Academy.

The Third Form declamation contest, which was to have been held on April 29, was postponed and it is doubttul if there will be any contest this year.

The Secomd Form, with characteristic zeal, has decided to inaugurate a yearly declamation contest for their class.

The Alma Banjo Club, of Williamsport, with the aid of some local talent, gave a concert in Bucknell Hall on May 26, for the benefit of the Academy Athletic Association.

The literary societies, Hermenia and Adelphian, are to play a game of base ball before this term closes.

'62. Rev. Henry Bray is Dean of Temple College, Philadelphia.

'65. Rev. H. B. Garner has resigned his charge at Berwyn, Pa.

'72. Rev. Albert Foster, D. D , is located at Newark, N. J.

'72. Rev. W. H. Mentzer is meeting with very encouraging success in his work with the new Baptist church at Wyoming, Pa.

'77. Rev. Calvin A. Hare is pressing forward quite rapidly in his work at McKeesport, Pa. The First Baptist church, of which he is pastor, has just sold its old property with a view to building anew. The new edifice is to be the finest church in the town. It will be erected at a cost of $80,000, and will have a seating capabity of 15,000 persons.

'79. Earl M. Purdy, late of Hughesville, Pa , has gone to Atlanta, Ga., to engage in the furniture business.

'80. Rev. Henry A. Griesemer, of Haddanfield, N. J., is now rejoicing over the payment of a $10,000 mortgage which has been the burden of his church for several years. The dedicatory services which had been deferred on account of the debt were held on May 14.

'82. Rev. H. C. Hall, of Erie, Pa., was recently prostrated for several weeks with a severe attack of bronchitis, during which time his pulpit was supplied by Dr. Harris, of Bucknell, and President Madtes, of Hall Institute. We are glad to learn that Pastor Hall has recovered from his sad affliction.

'83. J. C. Nissley, Esq., of Harrisburg, has moved his law office to North Second street, that city. Mr. Nissley has a good practice, and is making his mark as a barrister.

'84. Franklin P. Lynch, M. D., is assistant surgeon in the soldiers' hospital at Noroton Heights, Conn.

'85. Rev. J. M. Hare, of Burlington, N. J., who was injured last fall in the Reading railroad accident at Manayunk, sued the company for damages. In the trial, which recently closed in the West Chester court, the jury disagreed.

'88. J. P. Pontius, M. D., after pursuing a thorough course in the medical school of the University of Pennsylvania, and spending a year at practical work in the Wills Eye Hospital, Philadelphia, has located for practice at Chicago, Ill.

Ex. '88. Charles D. Clingan, Esq , who for the past two years has served as superintendent of the public schools of Orlanda, Fla., has decided to take up his law practice in Lewisburg.

'90. Rev. William M. Corson, of Eagleville, Pa., is getting along very successfully in his first pastorate, and is held in high esteem by his people.

'91. John T. Hyatt, of Lewisburg, delivered the Memorial Day address before the Henry Wilson Post, Milton, Pa. Mr. Hyatt is an orator of no mean ability, and the comrades enjoyed a rich oratorical feast.

'91. Rev. Robert B. Dunmire has had a very successful year in his work at Purchase Line, Pa. A new church has been built and dedicated, and about thirty have been added to the membership. Mr. Dunmire contemplates entering Chicago University next year for the completion of his theological studies.

Ex.'91. Rev.Chas.DeWoody, after a two years' pastorate, has resigned from the Baptist church at Coudersport, and accepted a call to Mansfield, Pa.

'92. Elton S. Carson, of the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania, recently spent a few days with his friends at Lewisburg. Mr. Corson expects to engage in the bath house business, during the summer, at Ocean City, N. J.

Ex. '92. Rev. G. F. Love, pastor of the North Baptist church, Rochester, N Y., has proved successful in his crusade against the Musee theatre of that city.

Ex. '93 John E Williams has been elected Superintendent of the Dunmore public schools. Mr. Williams has secured an enviable reputation as an instructor, for the short time he has taught. A sketch of his life appeared in the Educational Gazette, from which we learn that he is the youngest superintendent in this State.

'—. T. H. Schooly, a former Bucknell student, is now in the employ of the State Board of Land Commissioners, Denver, Col.

'—. Augustus C. Norris, A. M., who attended school here in former years, died at his home, Woodstown, N. J., about a month ago Prof. Norris had been principal of the Woodstown Academy since 1865.

JULY, 1893.

Editorial.

THE present issue is the last appearance of the MIRROR as a monthly. At the beginning of the next school year the MIRROR will be issued semimonthly. The change necessitated, both in editorial and business departments, will be considerable. The new departure is rather an experiment, and its success or failure can only be determined after a fair trial has been made.

WITH the July number the editorial work of the present board is finished. We think it safe to say that during the past year the MIRROR has not decreased in interest or value in any department. On the other hand, we believe that it has been improved in many respects. It has been the aim of the present board to make the MIRROR a true exponent of the workings of the student body, and not a factional organ. In this we believe we have been successful. We hope that our successors may continue to advance the paper along the general lines pursued this year, and may make it still more of an honor and credit to the college and the student body.

AN exchange says: "The stagnation of success is one of the greatest dangers of college life." In other words one of the greatest dangers is big head. This is not, however, a general danger. The notable successes of the majority of college students is not so overwhelming as to be seriously dangerous. But one of the worst points of this disease is that it is incurable. It is something fatal. When it once gets its grip the poor victim is doomed to go through life with a swollen head. It checks growth. For if one is able why exert one's self? Just to move about with knees, back and elbows stiff, to exhibit one's self to fellow students and to the faculty is sufficient. The usefulness of a man is, to a great extent, at an end when he begins to bank his attainments.

IT may seem presumptuous in us to attack with our feeble weapons a custom so universal and so deeply rooted as the use of slang; nevertheless, we wish to say just a word in regard to it. We see this evil, day by day, making such innovations in our speech that we fear the language will soon be entirely revolutionized, unless an effort is made by us to prevent the further progress of slang by resolutely abstaining from its use. The power of habit is strong, and there is scarcely any one who does not feel its influence in one way or another. In accordance with the law of motion habit follows the line of least resistance. One falls easily into the use of slang, and unless there is violent resistance continues indefinitely in the practice. Many slang phrases, it is true, seem well adapted to our wants. They are brief, they are expressive, they convey in a word or two an idea which, otherwise expressed, would require a long sentence; thus we become so accustomed to economize language by substituting slang for pure, precise English that finally we are at a loss to express ourselves without the aid of slangy expressions. We resolve to give it up, and we are amazed to find how firm a hold this habit has on us. We start to say something and we stop, chagrined to find that the very first sentence is slang. The profusion and variety of college slang is something wonderful. The slang words and phrases of a college student, compiled in book form, would rival the new Century dictionary. "Words are the only things that live forever" How many of us could wish every word we speak to be preserved forever! Would we care for future generations to know, or would it be of especial interest for them to know that at a certain time we were "in the soup," or that at another time we "got left," or didn't "get there," or that at still another time we were "out of sight." Slang, in our opinion, should be indulged in by no one, but especially should young ladies and gentlemen of education and refinement exercise care in the choice of words. Their pride should tell them that the "slangy" language, which is pardonable in street arabs and newsboys is not excusable in them.

Literary.

THE ABLE ADDRESS OF D. B. PURINTON, LL. D., PRES., OF DENISON UNIVERSITY, GRANVILLE, OHIO, BEFORE THE LITERARY SOCIETIES OF BUCKNELL UNIVERSITY ON THE EVENING OF JUNE 19.

Truly great men are rare. There have been many races and many ages that have produced but few of them, and but few races or ages that have produced many of them. Every age is equally busy, indeed, asserting its own claims to greatness and disputing those of former ages. But the great stream of human life flows on much the same from age to age, with only here and there the crest of a mighty wave to mark the spot where some great, gifted soul is struggling against the current and changing the order of its flow. It could not be otherwise; for human greatness is but a relative thing, and if all were great, then were none great.

Nor is this limitation to be at all regretted; for the average man is quite as important as the great man. True, he is not very much in his own person, or in the estimation of the world, but God values common men and keeps on making them by the million. That giant oak is far more striking and impressive than the soil from which it grows, but it is the soil that makes the oak possible. Even so the average man is the soil out of which the great man grows. It is the broad commonwealth of ordinary people that makes possible the rich fruitage of the great. And yet, the ungrateful world is all too prone to praise the product and forget the producer.

On occasions like the present, it is customary to portray the great deeds of some great man and hold them up as an inspiring example to ingenuous youth. Let us do otherwise tonight. Permit me to depart from the prevailing custom and speak to you of common men and common things. The theme will be less distinguished and striking, less heroic and inspiring indeed, but, let us hope, none the less pleasing or profitable. And, I am sure we are not so vain as to think it less practical or personal. If we cannot all reach the extreme pinnacle of human greatness, may we not all at least find the golden mean of sensible, respectable and useful manhood? And is it not wise, occasionally at least, to restrain our ambition within the limits of the possible rather than to be everlastingly straining ourselves up to the plane of the impossible? No man can stand on tip-toe forever.

Your professors have properly and wisely urged you up the heights of future greatness. The journey has been inspiring, the company delightful, the prospects charming, and you have been making swift and sinewy strides for many a month. But, tell me, are you not now a trifle weary, and ready for a rest?

If so, relax your mental muscle, release those giddy ambitious heights to the safe custody of your learned professors, and descend with me for a little while into the easy levels of mediocrity. It is a pleasant place to stroll, and not without a certain value of its kind.

"Aurea mediocritas" the Latin bard pronounced it long years ago, and to this day there is certainly a "golden mean" which the flight of intervening centuries has rendered none the less golden. Between two treacherous extremes, there always lies a middle course, broad and safe, which most men may wisely find and follow. In seeking it, two useful maxims must be observed. 1. Avoid extremes in action. 2. Attain extremes in character.

These two precepts are plainly contradictory in form, but they are perfectly consistent in purpose. The one may lead us along the quiet paths of successful mediocrity; the other, as we shall see, may advance us to the superior heights of wisdom and greatness; but they journey together and both lead along the same safe pathways. Observe whither they lead.

I. Avoid extremes in action.

Taken literally, this is a plain and easy precept, scarcely worth repeating Only a clown will act extremely, and even he will do it with a purpose—to make fools laugh. And yet, there are many elements of human conduct wherein any one, before he is aware of it, may fall into absurd and mischievous extremes. Notice a few of them:

1. There are extremes of expression. The tongue is an unruly member now even as of old, and goes very much as it pleases. Sometimes it runs too much, sometimes too little. On the one hand, you may see William the Silent, who invariably keeps still when he ought to speak; on the other, you may hear the inveterate prattler who invariably speaks when he ought to keep still. Wise men have always recognized and avoided this extreme of loquacity.

You remember how in ancient times Zeno sat silent at the feast while a score of wine bibing philosophers were hastening to tell what wisdom each man knew, but Zeno uttered not a single word, desiring this message to be sent to the king: “There is one philosopher in Athens who knows how to hold his tongue.” Blessed philosophy, would that a new school of it might be founded in babbling America. Young men and maidens, old men and matrons might well matriculate in such a school. I know a college professor even, who ought by all means to enter. He is a good man and means well, but he talks and talks and talks; and candor compels me to add that the more he talks the less he says.

On the other hand I know a college student who ought not to enter. He labors under the misfortune of being a stammerer and slow of speech. In social circles he manages somehow to get along heroically, not to say affably and volubly. But, strangely enough, whenever he enters the classroom his infirmity invariably returns upon him, and his tongue is holden that he cannot speak. He “knows his lesson but can't recite.” Do you know any such?

Bayard Taylor was once asked how he had managed, during such a busy life, to amass so much knowledge on such numerous and varied subjects. In reply he referred to that ancient philosopher of whom it was said, “He never speaks much, but will listen eternally,” and added that he himself had obtained most of his knowledge by adroitly engaging other men in conversation and being himself a good listener. There is wisdom in this, and while both extremes of speech are to be avoided, it is usually true that the longest tongue goes with the shortest temper and the lightest brain. It is a suggestive fact that most men have been furnished with two good ears and only one mouth. But that single mouth, in some cases, seems capable of keeping the tympanum of a thousand ears in a constant state of helpless vibration. Nor is this all. Extremes of speech may be found in its quality quite as often as in its quantity. One may speak very extremely, though he does not speak too much.

There is the gushing superlative, for example, sometimes ungallantly called the ‘school girl style,” in which extreme epithets are freely used, the commonest persons and things are described as perfectly elegant, delicious charming, exquisite, heavenly, and every form of expression takes on such a superlative sultriness of intensity that the thought it once contained is practically evaporated. Just as when one looks into a concave mirror, he finds that the intelligence of his face diminishes as its surface expands, so this extremist enlarges and distorts the plainest facts beyond all possible recognition, and shows his regard for truth only by keeping at a respectful distance from it.

Then there is the “rough and tumble style” which ignores all ornament and polish, glories in its exceeding plainness of speech, rushes irreverently along its thought without standing on the manner of its going, takes a sort of surly pride in shocking the ear with such a ruggedness of utterance as amounts to a deformity, and goes to that disgusting extreme in language to which Rousseau went in morals when he wantonly paraded before the public the nauseating details of his private sins, and to which Cromwell went in art when he said to the artist, "Paint me as I am. If you leave out a single scar or blemish I will not pay you a shilling."

On the other hand there is the sinuous, evasive style, which delights in double-entendre, says one thing and means another, robs you altogether of its meaning, smiles serenely at your confusion, and makes you feel the justice of that famous sneer of Tallyrand when he said, "Words are used to conceal thought."

Then there is the pedantic style, which affects great learning, despises simple Anglo-Saxon, delights in sonorous derivatives, wearies you with foreign phrases, and never deigns to use a short word if a long one can be found. This style is usually the device of a shallow mind, whereby it is hoped to make a little thought seem large by clothing it in mighty words—a sort of mental pigmy masquerading in giant's armor. And yet men of strong mind and true scholarship are sometimes guilty of this extreme. The late Bronson Alcott, for example, in his famous philosophical conversation, was prone to use high-sounding and unfamiliar words On one such occasion, it is said, a disgusted Englishman tried to get even with Mr. Alcott by asking him if he knew whether omnipotence abrogated attribute.

In a certain college town in Ohio there lives a very stately gentleman who is exceedingly fond of using stately language. He is a prominent member of a prominent church. The college boys declare—and of course it must be true—that he was never known to pray but once, and then he began his address to the Almighty in this wise: "Paradoxical as it may seem, O Lord, it is nevertheless indubitable "

But I forbear, and pass to another class of extremes which are equally to be avoided.

2. Extremes in personal bearing.

How exceedingly unlike are the manners and address of the people we meet every day. Here is a man who shows in every lineament of his face and every movement of his person, a certain pomposity, hauteur, insufferable self assertion, and unpardonable condescension which Emerson has described as an unapproachable Lord Almightyness. Here is another who meets you with a servile air, an apologetic look, an obsequious bow, a sycophantic smile, by all of which he unconsciously yet unmistakably declares that he is a poor, unworthy nobody, and begs everybody's pardon for daring to exist.

One man wears extreme clothing, strikes unusual attitudes, poses, calls attention to himself, anything, everything to make a sensation. Another, absent-minded, neglectful of his appearance and surroundings, oblivious of the ordinary amenities of life, is evidently living in the world but not of it.

One bears himself with such stately dignity and slow deliberation of movement as to make the world weary of beholding him. Another jumps and jerks and jostles along at such a nervous, reckless speed as would ruin the constitution of a salamander.

3. A third class of extremes in action may be loosely designated as extremes in methods of living.

At one extreme, we find the gormand and the inebriate who sacrifice their all to appetite. We justly reproach and abhor them ; but are we not ourselves sometimes subject to the same reproach? We use tobacco, perchance, and doubtless we all must agree with Dio Lewis when he stated that nearly all Americans eat too much ; and, on the score of national vanity, we may console ourselves by generalizing still further, and agree with that cynical sentiment of Voltaire wherein he defined a physician as "that unfortunate gentleman who is expected to perform the daily miracle of reconciling health with intemperance." At the opposite extreme stands the fastidious, finical man, who is inordinately careful of his physical health and happiness.

Immanuel Kant, for example, was accustomed to take a daily walk for exercise. But he never invited a friend to walk with him, because he had an impression that talking in the open air might be slightly injurious to his lungs. You remember, also, how that famous Venitian nobleman, Cornaro, decided that human life might be indefinitely prolonged by simply observing exactness, moderation and regularity in the matter of eating and drinking. And so he had a pair of scales at his table and weighed out for himself, with chemical exactness, his daily allowance of twelve ounces of meat and fourteen of wine.

Now these gentlemen did undoubtedly prolong their days in this way. Cornaro lived to his hundredth year. But one cannot help feeling that such pusillanimous regard for things merely physical is unworthy of an immortal spirit. For myself, I freely confess that my respect for the memory of the great philosopher and the distinguished nobleman would have been far greater if they had not resorted to such methods, even though thereby they might have robbed the world of their valuable lives a few years earlier.

Extremes in living are not confined, however, to mere eating and drinking. They may be seen in everything that touches human life. The home and the personal attire may be either severely and affectedly simple, or excessively ornate and vulgarly gorgeous. Topics of conversation may be prevailingly grave and gloomy, or frivolous and trifling. One man is fond of tragedy, thinks it a sin to smile, makes of life one long funeral procession, and never feels well unless he is miserable. Another sees only the ludicrous side of things, profanes the most sacred occasions with his irreverent jesting, and makes of life a comical farce, of himself a silly buffoon.

Now all these extremes in the conduct of life, and scores of others that might be mentioned, are to be strongly condemned and carefully avoided. There may be here and there a man, great in character, who can afford, perhaps, to be extreme or eccentric in conduct. But for most men it is both safe and sensible to follow the maxim of the golden mean, and avoid extremes in action.

II. Still bearing this caution in mind, we may now proceed to our second maxim: Attain extremes in character.

And this exhortation is more important even than the one just presented. For action, at the best, is but outward and variable, while character is inward, essential, eternal. The one is the substance of which the other is only the shadow. And the essence of things is always greater than their appearance. Paint may be cheaper than polish, but when it comes to a blemish in human character it is vastly better to polish it away than to paint it over. And how is this to be done? Let it be remembered that many of the greatest blemishes in character are but virtues distorted and perverted.

There is a sense in which reprehensible extremes may be so combined in a single character as to enhance its virtue thereby. It can never be true indeed that two wrongs make a right, but, in character as in chemistry, there is a mysterious alchemy whereby substances separately hurtful may be so united as to become harmless, and even valuable. Indeed, the perfect human character may be defined as a harmonious blending of contradictory extremes.

This is doubtless what Aristotle meant when he said that every virtue stands midway between two opposing vices; what Shakespeare meant when he said, "The best men are moulded of their faults;" what Paul meant when he declared, "When I am weak, then am I strong."

Extremes in thought and character are like the opposite poles of a battery. Kept apart they are inert and fruitless. But bring them together, once let the poles of thought meet, and the mysterious current begins to flow, and the whole world to pulsate with the throb of a new life.

As in mathematics, a mean proportional is equal to the product of two extremes, so in character and life, we find many of these proportionals produced by the blending of opposite extremes. Notice some of them.

1. There are extremes of doubt and belief.

And these extremes are mutually dependent. Belief is natural to the human mind. Mr. Hume's statement that men naturally doubt, but must be taught to believe, is manifestly incorrect. The child believes everything, doubts nothing, questions nothing, is easily deceived. Being thus deceived, he learns to doubt. Now, while this guilelessness of belief may be admirable in a child it is far otherwise in a man. The man who believes everything is well nigh a fool. Taking things for granted is not genuine belief, and he who never doubts or questions never truly believes. Our strongest, clearest, surest convictions are often born of doubt. As ignorance of danger is not true courage, so ignorance of error is not true conviction. He who is too cowardly to doubt is usually too indolent to believe. And, on the other hand, he who doubts everything, is worse even than he who doubts nothing. These separate extremes mark the little man. The great man is both a good doubter and a good believer.

2. But, again, questions of fate and freedom furnish another combination of extremes in human character.

Men have always believed in some over-ruling destiny. You remember that in ancient mythology although Jupiter was father and ruler of gods and men, yet even he could do nothing contrary to the fates. And this is only one of the many forms of religious fatalism. But nature seems to teach the same lesson. Her laws are stern, irrevocable, relentless. Pope's famous query, ' Shall gravitation cease when I go by ?'' has found a despairing echo in many a soul to whom the study of nature has brought a dark, materialistic fatalism.

Then there are environments and natural temperaments and the long line of heredity. They tell us now that to have good character one must be well born, to be well born he must be well derived, and to be well derived the process must begin 500 years before his birth—yes, 5,000,000 years, if Darwin be correct.

And then Mr. Buckle comes along and demonstrates to a certainty that crimes and suicides in England are directly proportional to the price of corn, and marriages and births inversely proportional to the same commodity ; and the poor dupe who believes him is afraid to look at his own razor when corn is high, lest Buckle's ponderous statistical tables should so overpower his will that he would involuntarily take his own life.

On the other hand, men have always believed themselves to be free. And this belief is perfectly rational and well grounded. Nothing can be surer in this world than that human thought is free, and human will is free. A victorious idea is regal, relentless. He who dares resist it, must inevitably go down in the struggle. Mirabeau was right when he said, ''Nothing is impossible to the man who can will.'' For he who thinks may see the right, and he who wills may do the right, all nature, environment and heredity to the contrary notwithstanding And he who may do the right is free.

The fatalist tells us that in Brazil, trees are great and men are small, nature is everything, man is nothing. Grant it. What then? How stands the case in California? There trees are great, but men are greater. Nature is much, but man is more. The truth is that the mightiest of all nature's mighty forces yield in sweet submission to the majesty of human thought and will.

An ancient poet said, ''The gods sell all things at a fair price,'' and he who is willing to pay the price may enjoy for himself, and possess within himself, even the richest of celestial treasures.

There is certainly a Divinity who presides over the destinies of men and of nations, and determines them according to the sovereignity of his own will. And there is just as certainly a freedom accorded to every man whereby he inevitably works out his own destiny.

Now, here are two extremes of thought as wide apart as the heavens and the earth. And yet the history of the world abundantly proves that when held together they make men and nations powerful, progressive, prevailing ; but when separated, either of them brings inevitable weakness, wickedness and woe.

3. Pride and humility present another possibility of extremes in character.

These extremes are marked and noticeable. Perhaps there is no other element in which men differ so widely as in this. One man is proud, bold, sanguine, self reliant, self-assertive, conscious of his strength, ready to attempt anything. Another is humble, modest, timid, retiring, distrustful of himself, and perennially disposed to flee before the first shadow that chances to cross his path. Now, this difference among men is natural, possibly unavoidable. There is abundant reason for both these feelings. When one compares himself with his ideal of perfection, he can but see how very far he falls below it. And this comparison ought frequently to be made. ''Be ye also perfect even as your Father in heaven is perfect.'' These are the exacting words of human conscience as well as of divine law ; and there can be no manner of doubt that, when even measurably apprehended in all the boundless compass of their import, they must bring to every sensitive soul a humbling view of personal unworthiness and moral need. But notice. Great and lofty natures are invariably made such by dwelling constantly in the presence of their own ideals of perfection. And so it comes to pass that humility always springs up in the richest soil of human hearts. And its beauty and fragrance are ever greatest in the greatest. But humility does not mean humiliation or any other manner of self-depreciation. That spirit is born of disease or hypocrisy. The man who honestly believes himself to be utterly unworthy, is usually a dyspeptic or a lunatic. The sanctimonious man, on the other hand, who pretends to be utterly unworthy, is usually an arrant knave—another edition of Uriah Heap, whose false humility, ostentatiously displayed on all occasions, is but a cheap counterfeit of virtue by a nature already morally bankrupt.

The honest man, remembering that it is far braver to look himself squarely in the face than to look his enemy in the face, will deal justly, honestly, with himself, without partiality and without hypocrisy. But he will not hang his harp upon the willows, his head in the dust, and dolefully wail out that most cowardly of all supplications, "Oh, to be nothing, nothing." God knows there are too many nothings in this world already. He wants every man to be something, something.

But, to be something, a man must first of all be himself, conscious of his own powers, proud of his manhood and proud of his possibilities—too proud, indeed, either to debase the one or to compromise the other. There is a certain just and irreducible pride of character which rightfully belongs to all men—great and small, high and low, rich and poor, alike. It is that all sustaining conviction that the man is more than his station whatever his station may be. Such a pride may live in a hut as well as a palace, and thrives on potatoes and porridge as well as the most delicate and costly viands. It does not mean implacable vanity as in Francis Bacon, nor insufferable conceit as in Thomas Paine, nor yet unpardonable condescension as in Matthew Arnold. But it does mean invincible courage as in Thoreau, when he said, "Nothing is so much to be feared as fear;" and it may mean a defiant manliness as in Luther, who said, "When I am angry, I can pray well and preach well;" and in Paul, when he said, "Be ye angry and sin not." A small man may be either proud or humble, but a great man must be both. In morals, as in physics, backbone is better than cartilage; a man is more than a mollusk.

4. But once more. The old and the new occasion the widest extremes among men.

Here is your fosilized conservative, who adores the past, reveres and follows the ancient worthies, and verily believes that the former days were vastly better than these. And here is your rash, restless radical, who ignores all experience, despises the past simply because it is old, and, with his face toward the rising sun, believes the irrational and attempts the impossible, simply because it is new. Now, both are right and both are wrong. Either of them by himself is an incarnated falsehood. But, put them together and you have a living embodiment of truth.

This is no new doctrine. The ancients understood it. You remember the old legend about the birth of Jupiter. Saturn, it seems, chanced one day to make an oyster. Pleased with the product, he kept on making oysters many days. At length his celestial father, Uranus, suggested that he try his hand at something new. But Saturn, true conservative that he was, dared not venture into untried paths, and so went on making oysters for a thousand years. Finally, yielding to his father s repeated entreaties, he threw away the old, time honored oyster mould, and ventured on a new line; when, behold, at the very first trial, presto! out came Jupiter. Which fable teaches that the conservative and the innovator, the old and the new, are equally concerned in the origin and progress of gods and of men. So the ancients believed, and they were right. Now, let this doctrine be applied to the every day affairs of men.

(1). Take it into the home, and here you find the most vivid contrasts of the old and the new. Under the old type the father is a stern, implacable tyrant, his slightest wish is law, and he himself is judge and jury, governor and executioner, all in one. The home is a mere military despotism, wherein order and obedience are the cardinal virtues, and woe betide the hapless lad who dares to cross the will of the paternal despot. Plato used to say, "A boy is the most vicious of all wild beasts." This is a monstrous sentiment surely, but scarcely more so than that which prevails in the home, be it ancient or modern, wherein the boy is constantly treated with bit and bridle, whip and spur. At sight of such a savage parent we are disposed to agree with Plato, and to add "The boy is father to the man."

Under the new type, however, old things have passed away. Behold, what a change. Here is a home in which the boy is everything, the father nothing. Young America bears rule here, and that with a high hand. He bestrides the domestic world like a collossus. He speaks and it is done, he commands and it stands fast. He seems a very god, for whom all things domestic are and were created. The father is endured, to be sure, as a sort of necessary evil, to bring in the revenues and replenish the exchequer of the domestic kingdom, but his influence in governmental affairs is scarcely worth the mentioning.

We are told of a certain German professor who always bows profoundly in the presence of his pupils, because he sees in them the future burgesses and lawmakers of the realm. If he were an American professor, and should see many of his pupils in their homes, he might make a second bow as to the present burgesses and lawmakers of the domestic realm.

Now, these extremes in the home are equally unfortunate, unworthy and hurtful. And yet the elements they contain may be so harmoniously blended as to secure both the authority and respect of the parent, and the free development of the child. Indeed, they are so blended in thousands of loving christian homes to-day.

(2). But, again, school life displays the same extremes of the old and the new.

Under the old regime, the ordinary pedagogue was never known as a teacher or instructor, but was invariably called and elected by the more commanding title of "master." And once in the schoolroom he took good heed to make his calling and election sure. Discipline, law, blind obedience, and personal punishment were emphasized far more than scholarship, independence and personal development. Even in colleges, in the olden days, the student's taste and preference were never consulted. The more he hated a given study the more he was forced to pursue it. He must be run through the same old mill, if it broke all his mental bones and ground him into educational powder. To this day the French Lycee is a mere tread-mill machine which robs the students of their personality, and treats them as though they were in a mediaeval cloister instead of a modern school. Over the doorway of such an institution one might appropriately write that facetious Latin motto, "disce, aut decede." study or leave. clear out. The new education is different. It demands study, to be sure, but it leaves the order and manner thereof to the student himself. Rejecting the time-honored classics, it dotes upon the new-born sciences. Breaking down ancient and venerable curricula of studies, it prepares an elaborate educational feast of its own, mostly of modern viands, and seats the callow youth thereat, leaving it to his own sweet will whether he shall taste of a dozen courses or gorge himself upon one. Herein is another hurtful extreme.

Now, put the old and the new together, blend their extremes into one, and you have a model school, capable of developing a broad, brainy, manly man.

(3). Once more. You may find the like extremes in politics and the state. One man agrees with Hobbes and the ancient Romans that politics is a divine art, the state is everything, and the individual citizen must yield himself, body and soul, to its sovereign sway. Another says: The citizen is sovereign, the state is nothing, and politics is but a popular name for generalized diabolism. There is truth in both these views. The least government is certainly the best government, but it is possible only when each citizen is sovereign over himself. "He that ruleth his own spirit is better than he who taketh a city." And he alone is the true sovereign, be he king or be he vassal. Do you vote your party ticket straight? If so, you are no sovereign. You may name yourself Republican, Democrat, Mugwump, Prohibitionist, Populist, it matters not, you are a political slave.

It is now thirty years since the manacles of domestic slavery fell from African hands. Is it not time that the shackles of political slavery should fall from Caucasian brains and hearts? God bless the party bolters and ticket-scratchers who carry their conscience and their manhood into their acts of sovereign citizenship. They alone are real freemen, and they alone are worthy to be free.

4. Once more and finally. The church discloses the greatest possible extremes of the old and the new.

The conservative puts implicit confidence in the mediaeval dogmas of the church, believes everything that the fathers believed, mistakes human theology for divine truth, renounces his own reason, and utterly refuses to see new light, hear a new voice, or entertain a new idea, in any matters of religion. The religious radical, on the other hand, renounces all traditional beliefs, rejects truth simply because it is old and some one else has accepted it, deifies his reason, stultifies his faith, and mistakes the new for the true. He utters a thousand reckless negatives, not one sustaining affirmative. He is belligerent, destructive. He would demolish every religious structure in his sight, leave the defenseless soul to the pitiless storm of its own dark despair, and revel in the ruin he had wrought. And he thinks himself perfectly competent to do this. With one stroke of the pen, one stamp of the foot, one curl of the lip, he thinks to blot out that great historic faith that has commanded the unquestioning assent of the mightiest minds, the sincerest souls. He is self-sustained, self-satisfied. As he gives no aid to others, so he asks none for himself. Once a little child, when told that God made the whole world and everything therein, was seized with a strange compassion and suddenly exclaimed, "Poor God, with nobody to help Him." But your iconoclastic, religious radical excites no such sympathy. He asks no aid of God or man. He is not much at creating, to be sure, but he can destroy the heavens and the earth, in the twinkling of an eye.

Now, these extremes are mentioned simply in order to show that, while there is error in each, there is truth in both. On the one hand, there are in religion some truths which are old, essential, certain, unchangeable, everlasting; about which there neither now is nor ever can be any possibility of mistake. But on the other hand, there is both present and future possibility of growth, development, correction, improvement, in theology as well as in science and philosophy.

He who is to be the religious leader of the future, shall be the man who is great enough to grasp in their completeness, the truths of these two extremes, and to bring them together into one consistent, harmonious, God honoring, man-saving verity.

Christianity is greater than its forms or its creeds. Emerson was doubtless right when he said, "God builds His temple in the heart, on the ruins of churches and religion." Nor must we forget that when the seer of Patmos beheld in vision the heavenly Jerusalem he said, "And I saw no temple therein, for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it." And this certainly means that in the great and final day, the forms, ceremonies and creeds of religion will all have passed away, but its essence, the life of God in the saved soul, will be imperishable as God Himself.

I have endeavored to show you some respects in which either of the two extremes brings inevitable weakness, one-sidedness, imperfection of character, but the union of both makes a man strong, broad-minded, self poised, resourceful, great.

Other striking aspects of the subject might he presented, but I have already gone further than was anticipated, and much further, I fear, than your patience will justify.

I cannot quit the subject, however, without presenting, in a single illustrious example, the strongest possible evidence that perfection of human character consists in the harmonious blending of its opposite extremes. It need not be said that I refer to the only perfect man—the Man of Nazareth.

Jesus was strong, brave, intense, heroic, masterful; and yet he was gentle, sympathetic and tender as a woman's love. He was calm, dignified, self-centred, conscious of his in dwelling, infinite power. At the same time he was meek, modest, unassuming and easily approachable by the humblest of his followers. He was infinitely merciful, compassionate and loving; and yet he was a hater; he hated all manner of sin with an implacable hatred, and gave expression to the most terrible denunciations of the wicked that have ever found utterance in human speech. He was both a conservative and an innovator. He was neither ashamed of old truth, nor afraid of new truth. He came to fulfill the one, and died to establish the other. He believed in the old and came to fulfill it. He introduced the new and died to establish it.

Jesus was a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. In view of human sin and suffering he did often groan in spirit and weep. Nevertheless, he was filled with the essential joy of life. That record of Him must not be forgotten which says, "In that hour Jesus rejoiced in spirit," nor that other wherein it is even declared that "For the joy that was set before him he endured the cross, despising the shame," nor finally that remarkable experience when, in his last prayer to the Father, he goes to betrayal, agony and death, repeating the words "My joy, my joy."

In music, the finest effects are often attained by introducing dissonant chords and resolving them into a perfect harmony. And thus the life of Jesus touched all the discordant keys of human character and evoked from them the sublimest heavenly harmonies. He was divine indeed. God manifest in the flesh. And yet he lived a perfect, natural, human life—just such a life as you and I ought to live.

He always avoided extremes in action, but he embodied and harmonized within himself the widest extremes of character. So ought we. In so doing we may not achieve greatness as men measure greatness. But we shall attain what is far better, symmetrical, useful, perfect human lives. And what care we for the false estimates of the world, or the uncertain favors of fortune and fame? Let others bow at the shrine of the fickle goddess, if they must. As for us we will stand erect in our conscious manhood, and find and follow the "golden mean."

GEORGE S. MATLACK.

George Smedley Matlack was born in Chester county, on the 18th of August, 1851, and died on Wednesday morning, June 14, 1893, having not yet completed his forty-second year.

He came to Lewisburg while quite a boy—entered the University of Lewisburg (now Bucknell), and graduated on the 28th of June, 1870, not yet nineteen. While in college he was a member of the Theta Delta Chi fraternity and was regarded as a model young man with an ability of high order. In the year 1871 he became connected with the firm which eventually became P. Billmeyer & Co.—and after the death of Mr. Billmeyer, in 1885, the present firm of W. D. Himmelreich & Co.

A friend says of him: "That he did not suppose he would die so soon is evident from many things he did, but swift in its crashing force as the blow came, it found him ready to meet it. Perhaps since the great flood he has not been well, and he suffered at times from prostration, headache, sickness, but it was not known that the fell insidious disease, Bright's, had been sapping at the citadel of his life, until lately. And when discovered it was hopeless. It was a lingering but painless death, passing away at last as twilight on a starry night."

The funeral took place Saturday afternoon, the 17th inst., at 3 o'clock. Services were held at the house and were conducted by Rev. C. B. Austin, of this place, and Rev. James W. Putnum, of New York city, a school mate and life-long friend of the deceased. The pall-bearers were Hon. Cyrus Hoffa, Hon. Alfred Hayes, J. Foster Van-Valzah, James Halfpenny, John F. Duncan and Col. J. P. Brooke.

ON THE DEATH OF MR. GEO. S. MATLACK.

BY REV. GEO. WHITMAN.

As good a man was he as e'er drew breath,
From vicious deeds and petty meanness free,
Who only smiled at the approach of death,
And met the grim old monster manly.

A friend was he of every noble cause,
Who sought to right the cruel wrongs he saw.
Himself obedient to God's higher laws,
He aimed to win the world to God and law.

I called him friend, and in that holy name
Felt deeper meaning as I thought of him;
For his was friendship which remained the same,
Which time could not efface, nor distance dim.

Ah, happy days! when, in our school boys' prime,
We daily joined in study or in play!
When years run on in merry, measured rhyme,
And life was one perennial holiday.

And shall they e'er return—those hours of bliss—
So free from business, care and throbbing pain?
Shall we join hands in brighter worlds than this?
And in some heavenly class room meet again?

Faith answers boldly, Yes! And from afar
A voice sounds out divinely sweet and clear—
As soft and fluent as the music of a star—
That stills our hearts, and bids us not to fear.

Chill death does not destroy; it only breaks
The flimsy shell that sets the kernel free.
It does not palsy love; it only makes
The chain more strong that binds eternally.

So let us hush our woes, and calmly bide
Our time till death shall bring a sweet release.
Our friend has crossed the bar, and soon the tide
Shall bear us, too, into that part of peace.

BUFFALO, June 16, 1893.

Local.

R. D. Minch, '95, has accepted a call to preach at Hawley, Pa., during the summer.

Dr. E. Aviragnet, of the Bucknell school of music, will teach music at Elkland, this summer.

Many of our students will canvass during the summer, either in their spare time or as their regular work.

Subscribers wishing to communicate with the manager of the MIRROR during the summer months should address A. C. Lathrop, Camden, Delaware.

C. W. Derr, an ex-member of the class of '93, visited Bucknell during commencement. Mr. Derr's home is in Limestoneville, Pa.

Messrs. Harris, Oglesby and Vastine, all of the class of '95, will not be seen among us next year. Mr. Oglesby goes to Princeton, Mr. Harris to the University of Pennsylvania.

Alfred Hayes, Jr., class of '95, spent about a week at Princeton College the latter part of June. Mr Hayes took his examinations for admission to the Junior class next fall. We regret to lose so good a student.

Dr. Enoch Perrine attended the World's fair during the early part of June. The doctor has given the benefit of his trip, by means of lectures, newspaper articles, etc , to many interested people who cannot attend the fair.

A new fraternity, the Zeta Chapter of the Sigma Alpha Epsilon, was added to Bucknell s secret societies on the evening of June 14 A delegation of members of this order from State College initiated the boys into the secrets of the order.

A few complete sets of the Daily Commencement News remain on hand and we shall be pleased to mail the complete set of four issues to any address on receipt of 15 cents. Send postal note or stamps. A. C. Lathrop, Manager, Camden, Del.

One of the chief features of the commencement just passed was the unusual number of Baptist church secretaries founed among the visitors. There were present E. B. Palmer, D. D., of the Home Mission Society ; F. S. Dobbins, D. D., of the Foreign Mission Society ; W. H. Conard, D. D., of the State Mission Society ; Dr. Spratt, of the Educational Society, and Benjamin Griffiths, D. D., of the Publication Society.

A box recently received by the University museum from Shaw Loo, M. D , of Maulmein, Burmah, contained the following interesting articles : A Burmese sword, two silver idols, two buck idols, a lot of coin, a handsomely carved paper knife made of ivory, a Burmese scripture book, a gong used by the priests in calling to worship, and a Bermese bran bell. The box and its contents are regarded as very valuable, and Dr. Shaw Loo has conferred a great favor upon his alma mater by his contribution.

One subject of pleasant comment among the visitors at this year's commencement has been the excellent music furnished by the students. The University band needs to make no apologies for its music on account of the limited time it has had to practice. On the contrary, the question in the minds of many is how the band has been able to attain such proficiency in so short a time. As to the orchestra, composed entirely of students, under the direction of Mr. Sigmond, the quality of their playing is sufficiently attested by the fact that the late noble Senior class, after hearing them play, expressed regret that they had engaged outside talent for their graduating exercises. It is to be hoped that during the coming year our home talent will receive that encouragement and appreciation which are essential to its development.

The friends of one of our most conscientious students might have been greatly shocked had they seen him in swimming on a Sunday recently. Lest some should censure him for desecrating the Sabbath, we wish to state the cause of his natatorial performance The young man is possessed of a pair of exceedingly light pantaloons, which he is determined to keep spotless at any cost. Wishing to cross the river on his way home from Chillisquaque to Lewisburg, and fearing to run the risk of soiling those precious pants in a boat, he determined to walk around by way of the canal. An unexpected puff of wind, a new straw hat sailing majestically across the canal, and the student hastily divesting himself of his light pants made up a scene which followed and which explains all.

The annual prize exhibition in oratory of the Junior class, one of the chief features of the commencement program, took place in Commencement hall, Saturday evening, June 17th. The class found a good representation in those who appeared upon the platform, and the respective speakers acquitted themselves with much credit. The following is a list of the orators and their subjects : A. F Anderson, "The Dignity of American politics ;" Mary L. Bartol, "Mary Lyon ;" R. B. Davidson, "Grant, the Statesman ; ' R. J. Davis, "American Idolatry ;" Grace Guthrie, "The Power of Poetry ;" Mary B Harris, "The Melancholy Antonio" (excused); G. H. Waid, "The Public Schools ;" Jessie J Wheeler, "A Career or a Mission ;" J. R. Wood, "A Church Schism." The prize was awarded to Grace Guthrie.

The graduating exercises of the College Senior class took place in Commencement hall Wednesday morning, June 21st. The class appeared in the cap and gown. The music was furnished by the Stopper and Fisk orchestra, of Williamsport. The speakers and their orations were as follows : J. B. Cressinger, "Cola de Rienzi ;" Nellie W. Conard, "Authors as Influenced by Their Productions ;" J H Foresman, "Literary Criticism ;" A. F. Gardner, "The Scientific Spirit in Education ;" Carrie L. Geary, "Christianity and the Republic ;" C. A. Gundy, "The Struggle of the Middle Class ;" E. Heim, "The Scholar's Place in Politics ;" Carrie V. Lloyd, "The Conquerors ;" E. Maxey, "Government ;" E. C.

Pauling, "Is the Present Place Permanent?" E. K. Thomas, "The Divine Factor in History;" W. C. Weber, "The Triple Crown." The class was then addressed by Pres. Geo. E. Reed, D. D., LL. D., of Dickinson College. The prize, for excellence in oratory, consisting of a gold watch, was awarded to E. C. Pauling. The following other prizes were awarded: First, in psychology, to E. M. Heim; second to A. F. Gardner; chemistry prize to Miss Carrie Lloyd; Sophomore essay and Sophomore declamation prizes to Edward G. Kendall; the Freshman declamation prize to Miss May M. Wolfe; Freshman declamation prize for best preparation for college to Alexander Douglass.

The following honorary degrees were conferred by the Board of Trustees: H. Kirke Partee, Pittsburg, LL. D.; Miss Lucy Bliss, Chester, A. M.; Geo. P. Bible, principal of Stroudsburg State Normal school, A. M.; Chaplain T. A. Gill, of the U. S. navy, D. D.; Rev. R. W. Perkins, of Lock Haven, and Rev. J. E. Perry, principal of Peddy Institute, Hightstown, N. J., Ph. D.

At the annual meeting of the Board of Trustees held June 20, Prof. Lincoln Hulley, of the University of Chicago, was elected to the Chair of Hebrew and English Bible recently established at Bucknell.

ACADEMIC CORRESPONDENCE.

[J. M. WILSON, Correspondent.]

The Academy base ball team has won every game it has played this year.

In the croquet tournament held this month, Mr. W. H. Rodgers came out champion.

The Hermenia Literary Society gave a picnic to Blue Hill on the 19th. The members reported a good time.

Messrs. Wagner and Sandels drove over to Middleburg on June 3, and reported that they had a delightful time.

The Leas' prize contest in declamation by the Third Form came off in Bucknell Hall on June 10. Mr. E. H. Dutton was awarded the prize

The Adelphian banquet, which was to have been held at the Baker House, was held in the Academy dining room at 5:30 p. m. on the appointed evening.

It is to be feared that it will hereafter be very difficult to induce collegians to manage Academy teams if they happen to remember the fate of a certain Freshman who attempted to take the Academy base ball team to Bloomsburg on June 11.

The Fourth Form commencement exercises were held in Commencement Hall on June 30. The class consisted of fifteen, of whom six spoke. The Principal W. E. Martin prize for the best oration delivered on the commencement platform was awarded to Mr. Vincent B. Fisk, as was also Harry S. Hopper prize for composition.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

The public meeting of the Alumnae of Bucknell Institute was held in Bucknell Hall on Tues- afternoon, and was well attended. The program was short, but exceedingly interesting. Mrs. Harriet R. Bower, '73, read a class letter. The address of the day was delivered by Miss Cara Reese, the society editor of the Pittsburg Commercial Gazette. Her subject was the "College and the Daily Press," and was handled in an able and forcible manner. Miss Reese is a woman of more than ordinary ability and one of the peers among women writers for the press in this country. A class letter, of the class of '83, was read by Miss Katherine Dill. The music was all good, but a piano duet by Misses Alken and Harris deserves particular mention.

'92. Miss Annie Carlisle, the successful secretary of the Young Women's Christian Association of Pennsylvania, spent a part of this week here. She conducted the last Tuesday evening prayer meeting of the term. Those present will long remember her earnest words to us.

It affords us pleasure to present to our readers the cut of H. L. Wayland, D. D., who delivered the address before the graduating class of the Institute. In substance Dr. Wayland spoke as follows:

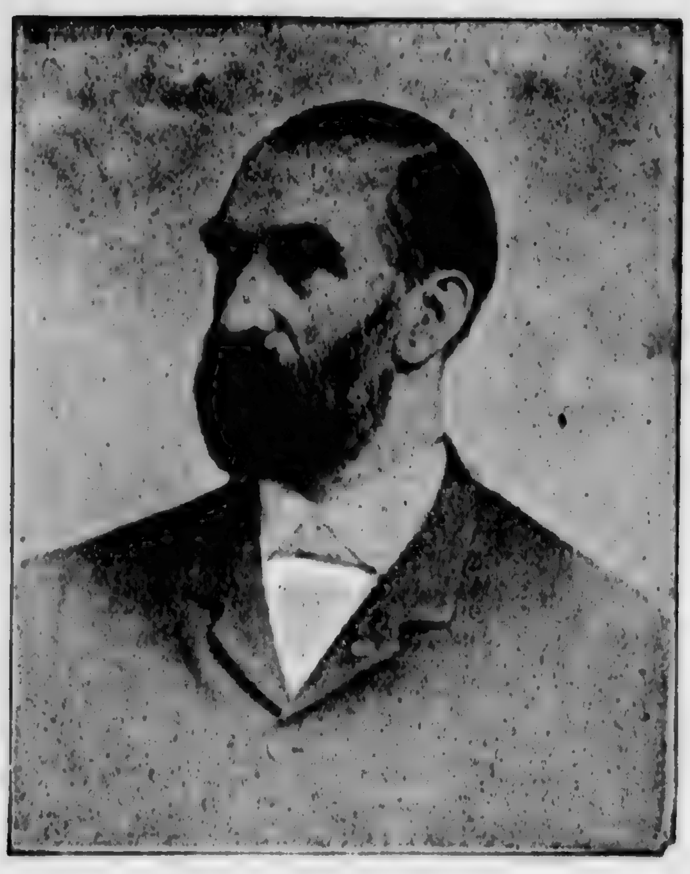
I regret that this duty has been assigned to me, and not rather to some of the eminent women of America who are able to clothe wise thoughts in graceful words.

The occasion is justly called commencement. It is not the close of your intellectual career, but the beginning. All has been preparatory for the large sphere in which you enter.

Therefore, study, read, learn, think. Read the best—not most abstruse books, but the best books of the kind, be it philosophy, history, science, poetry, romance. Read according to a system, with an object in view.

You ask, how is the time to be obtained? There is much education outside of books. A world of education lies about us. Your training has prepared you to use books or do without them. Study the open sky, the trees, the newspaper, the growing mind of the child.

And do not be deterred by obstacles. There are two classes of people—those who do, and those who are able to avoid doing, an unanswerable excuse for not doing. I beg you to be of that class that does something, rather than of that class that furnishes an excellent excuse for not doing. We may well banish the word "impossible" in reference to anything on which we may ask the blessing of God.



DR. H. L. WAYLAND.

Regard your body. I do not know whether we have entirely passed the time when bodily fragility is associated with intellectual acuteness. The body is not made to be trampled under, to be emaciated, nor yet to be despised. It is meant to be a servant and instrument of the soul.

Regard the object of all culture. Culture must not be selfish; must not end in itself. All is for others. Life is a trust—the one who uses life for selfishness is false to that trust. The great object of your culture is that you may in the highest degree and upon the largest scale reflect the life of Christ in the nineteenth century.

After the able address to the class by H. L. Wayland, D. D., of Philadelphia, the prizes were awarded. First Senior essay prize to Oriana Williams, Williamsport; second Senior prize to Lou Lane, of Huntingdon; the Senior scholarship prize to Ruth Sprague, of Lewisburg; the first fourth year essay prize to Mabel Thomas, Lewisburg; the second fourth year prize to Hattie Lewis, Lewisburg; the Craig Lippincott prize to Ruth Sprague and Oriana Williams; the elocution prize to Nora Greene, Saltillo; the music prize to Mary Harris, Lewisburg; the French prize to Beulah Hayes, Lewisburg. Diplomas and gold medals were given to all of the class, and diplomas and medals to Misses Thornton, Harris, Reid and Wittenmeyer, graduates in music.

Personal.

'63. Rev. H. C. Munro has become pastor at Beverly, N. J.

'64. Shaw Loo, M. D., of Maulmein, Burmah, recently favored the University museum with a box containing many interesting and valuable articles illustrative of the life, manners and customs of the people of India. Dr. Loo's gift is appreciated very much and prized very highly by the University.

Ex. 69. William H. Merrell, M. D., is a long established physician at South Branch, N. J.

Ex.'70. Rev. H. H. Leamy is pastor of the Baptist church at Warrensville, Pa.

Ex.'70. Prof. A. J. Phillips is teaching at East Northfield, Mass.

'72. Rev. R. W. Perkins, of Lock Haven, taught Latin and history in the State Normal school of that place during the spring term.

Ex.'73. Rev. George G. Croft, is now at Worcester, Mass.

'77. Prof. Edwin T. Trimble, president of Grace Seminary, Wash., and his wife were recently given quite an ovation at the closing of their school and their departure from the town. All the temperance organizations of the city held a grand banquet in their honor, and the people of the place gave them a very cordial social reception in the First Baptist church.

'81. Rev. Edward B. Correll is located at Rausonville, N. Y.

Ex.'82. Rev. B. L. Herr is living at 172 Court street, Binghamton, N. Y.

'87. Prof. J. W. A. Young has just received the degree of Ph. D. from Clark University, Worcester, Mass.

Ex '87. Miss Annie L. Hay is a teacher in Peddie Institute, Hightstown, N. J.

Ex.'87. Miss Lizzie E. Laning is now Mrs. Dr. C. E. Grove, and is living at Spokane, Wash., where her husband is in practice.

'88. William V. Hayes graduated last spring from one of the New York City medical college, and has secured a position as resident physician in the New York hospital.

'88. Rev. Geo. W. Hatch, of Easton, Pa., has been granted a two months' vacation by his church, the most of which time he will spend in visiting his aged parents in Dakota.

'88. We take the following from the Commencement News: "Prof. Lincoln Hulley, of Chicago University, has been appointed by Pres. Harper instructor in Hebrew and English Bible in the Institute of Sacred Literature. He has also been put in charge of Hebrew and English Bible at Lakeside Summer Assembly, in Ohio, for the summer."

Ex.'88. Isaac D. Moore was ordained pastor of the Baptist church at Palmyra, N. Y., May 24th.

'89. Rev. and Mrs. R. M. West, of Philadelphia, were recently blessed by the arrival into their midst of a charming little daughter.

'89. E. Heister Guie, Esq., and wife, of Seattle, Wash., are at present visiting the home of Mr. Guie's parents, at Catawissa. They expect to return West in July.

Ex.'89. W. E. Williams, C. E., is a member of the firm of Leete & Williams, civil and mechanical engineers and surveyors, Huntington, W. Va.

'91. John T. Hyatt, at present a law student in the office of Hon. S. H. Orwig, of Lewisburg, will go to Santiago, Cuba, in the fall, where he will serve as private secretary to his father, who was recently appointed U. S. Consul at that place.

'92. George Shorkley has been on the Columbian guard at Chicago, but has again returned to his home in Lewisburg.

'93. Ephraim M. Heim has been elected instructor in Latin in Bucknell Academy for the coming year.

Ex.'93. Charles D. Wolfe has returned to his home in Lewisburg from Chicago, where he has been serving on the Columbian guard. Mr. Wolfe has been engaged by one of the Michigan colleges to coach its football team next fall.

THINGS THAT GRIEVE US.

To know that all beggers are not worthy of charity.

To listen to a woman's criticism on a game of base ball.

To notice with what ease many people forget solemn vows.

To know that what some people consider fun is downright rudeness.

To know that many people will squander comfortable fortunes at the World's fair.

To hear of people who complained loudly last winter of the extreme cold, objecting to the warm weather now.

Editorial.

THE first number of our semi-monthly issue greets you and asks your friendly criticism and hearty support. A new board of editors has entered upon its task determined to maintain the present high standard of our college journal and to press on to greater heights.

ONE of the distinguishing marks of Bucknell's advancement is the prompt and efficient response to all reasonable requests of her students for new courses of study. The ear of our genial registrar, Mr. Wm. C. Gretzinger, is open to the slightest whispers of desire. The members of our faculty are able and willing to extend the work in their various branches of instruction. This feature is exemplified by the large number of electives offered to the Junior and Senior classes for the current term.

THANKS to some refining influence at work among our students, the "Texas Rangers," the "Night Hawks," and all such barbarous organizations belong to the past. No longer need the freshman retire in fear and trembling to dream of the terrors, or wake to the reality, of hazing. Yet some of our newcomers may, by their verdancy and attempts at undue familiarty with upper classmen, arouse from the shades the spirit of this monster.

P. S.—Scarcely was the ink dry when our prophecy was partially fulfilled.

OUR foot-ball team stands before us, as yet, an untried champion. Many of the old players are upon the team and some excellent new material also. Their practice is as constant and arduous as their school duties will allow. They are first students, afterwards athletes, willing and ready to represent us upon the foot-ball arena. We expect our team to be victorious. But whether they shall gain the laurels or not, they are our team, ours to support and encourage in every possible way. If victory crown their efforts, they will be feted and lavishly praised; but it is when defeated that they shall most need our support and encouragement. Some of the teams with which they will contend have much more time and money to put into the game. We are assured that our team will put forth their best efforts, and in so doing will deserve praise.

WITH the opening of the new school year fresh blood has been infused into the veins of our literary societies. They show every sign of healthful activity. That literary society work fills an important place in college life is admitted by all. We all feel the need of just such work as the literary society offers. We say all, all except a few finished orators, and even these few might kindly visit us sometimes to supply us with models.

Some Cassandra may cry "disaster and desolation," but know you, one and all, that such prophecy is empty babbling, if each remains true to his pledge. To the one who attends regularly and takes part in the work, literary society is always interesting. Allow no impulse to speak in debate to pass by unheeded and you will make good your resolutions and establish a habit of participation. To the upper classmen we may say that nothing has been responsible for the low ebb of society life in the recent past but our own indifference. On ourselves, who most need such practice, is the blame, on ourselves, too, lies the responsibility of re-invigorating the societies with a fresh impulse.

IT is not without reluctance that the present editors approach the task before them. The able manner in which THE MIRROR has been conducted heretofore and the increased responsibility imposed by more frequent issues, make the work one of double difficulty. However, to maintain whatever literary reputation our college paper may have acquired—perchance, if possible, to widen its influence—will be the constant effort of its editors, and "let not ambition mock their useful toil."

What is the aim of a college paper? Some journals, by their long array of "locals" and "personals;" by weekly and even daily issues of poor typography and poorer literature, seem to proclaim the answer "To furnish news." This is partly, but not essentially, true; for it represents but one side of student life, and the cheapest side at that. The true aim of the college paper must be to reveal the student everywhere, on the campus, in the class room, and, most of all, in the study; for there, if he be honest, he pours out his best self, that he may be filled with even a better essence. The "locals" and "personals" are still needed, but especially are wanted those productions of the student that are wrought out under the mind's full pressure, rounded and polished by the "labor of the file."

Further, the college paper must seek to represent each class of students fairly and impartially. "Tros Tyriusque mihi nullo discrimine agetur" is the rule for success in this line. On the other hand each student should feel interested enough to support the college journal, not merely by his subscription, but by his best contributions. We wish the students of Bucknell, of every department, to feel this personal interest in THE MIRROR and its success.

AMERICAN IDOLATRY.

It is a fundamental truth of human life that a man or a nation, controlled by one principle alone, however good, must inevitably fall, for

> "God fulfils Himself in many ways,
> Lest one good custom should corrupt the world."

Our country today is dominated by one principle, and that a perniciously bad one. Briefly stated, it might be put thus: "'Boodle' is the principal thing; therefore, get 'boodle.' And with all thy getting, get 'boodle.'" This is a principle which manifests itself in an all-consuming, virtue-sapping, soul-destroying covetousness for gold and silver, stocks and bonds, lands and houses. And somewhere it is written that covetousness is idolatry.

This is emphatically a national sin. Not the rich alone, but rich and poor together are found here as ardent devotees at the shrine of mammon. This is seen in the fact that there is, judging from the platforms of our two great political parties, but one purely national issue in America today: The tariff question. A question of dollars and cents. A very proper issue, indeed, for such a mighty nation to be playing with, provided there were no questions involving eternal principles of right and wrong, of vice and virtue crying aloud for settlement.

This national mammon worship is more than a proper mercantilism. He who casually looks at our well-nigh limitless domain, with its laughing harvests, groaning trees, and mountains bursting with mineral wealth, is apt to exclaim, "Surely here is a nation which must carry the purse of the world!" Yes, we do, but this very fact has so fired our sordid nature that for a few pieces of silver we are ready to betray humanity and deliver it up to be crucified. For so busy have we been with making money that we seem to have forgotten the appalling truth that mercantilism has ceased to be our servant and has become our tyrannical master.

The results already apparent from such a slavery are so conspicuous that the most bitter partisan need not mis-read them. The word corruption, with all the foulness of its deepest meaning, has become a synonym for our politics. The nations of the world point to our present political pollution, and prophecy a speedy downfall. Have they no reason, when a presidential election costs a million dollars, and seats in the national Senate chamber are knocked down to the highest bidder? Have they no reason, when, at every election, hordes of imported Americans are driven to the polls under the lash of the heap ward-politician? Have they no reason, when tens of thousands full-blooded American citizens are ready to sell their votes for a mere pittance? The politician in office is no better than the voter at the polls. There is no reform that he will not block, no wise measure that he will not oppose, no improvement that he will not withstand, unless it bears the stamp of shining silver on its face.

The effects of this idolatry are as prominent in our social, as in our political life. America's sixty-three billions of dollars are rapidly being centred in the hands of a few successful slaves of mammon. Twenty years ago capitalists owned sixty-three per cent. of the nation's wealth; and the proportion has been increasing steadily ever since. Europe has her aristocracy of blood, but America has her plutocracy of wealth. An exclusive, ruling plutocracy, who live in boundless luxury, indulge in gilded sensuality, attend church regularly, during Lent, and mercilessly scorn the poor, save now and then some conscience-smitten Crœsus founds a hospital, builds a church, or endows a college.

Meanwhile, hear the threatening murmurs of those worshipers who cannot get so near the golden calf—the poor. Small wonder, if as they compare their hard-earned coppers with the unearned millions of the Wall street king, they clench their fists, grind their teeth and openly talk of anarchy and blood. This revolutionary element will always rant and tear, and, perhaps, do little harm; but the sober-minded of their kind are forming into party, and already in the west are beginning to shape things to their own ends. But mark well that the demand of the workingmen, as by blood or ballot they force themselves to the front, is no longer for food and clothing merely. Many of them have these and are not satisfied. But, taken by the same fever as the rich, they claim an equal share in the wealth of the land. Here again we see our deification of gold producing effects which threaten radical changes in our government.

If we find, in our political or social life, any force opposing this baneful worship of gold, it will be in Christianity as practised by the Christian church. But where is the church today? Foremost among the devotees of mammon. Jay Gould was a "consistent member in good and regular standing," and the majority of his kind are enrolled as humble followers of Him "who had not where to lay His head." The Christian church of America holds an accumulated fortune of over twelve billions, to which she annually adds the small sum of five hundred millions. Of this annual increase of five hundred millions she gives, as a result of endless begging and dunning, the astonishing sum of twelve millions for the spread of Christianity at home and abroad. So far then, from exercising any restraining influence on this national idolatry, the church is immeasurably weakened by it. It is universally admitted that she has practically lost her hold upon the masses of workingmen. Not long since a large assembly of American laborers greeted the name of Christ with cheers, and that of the church with hisses. She further shows the weakening effects of her sin by shunning all reform. There are slaves today whose fetters are far more galling, although unseen, to whom life is more miserable and death less hopeful than ever negro knew—slaves of monopoly, driven and beaten to the very death by hunger's knotted cord, poor but beautiful girls, slaves to the lust of the silver fiend, noble men and promising boys, slaves to that most hideous, lowest hell-born of all mammon's children—the beer saloon. All these are slaves, and cry aloud for freedom, yet the Christian pulpit, followed closely by the Christian church, "passes by upon the other side."

Beyond all question, then, we must conclude that America is taken with a burning fever of that covetousness which is idolatry; that this fact rests as one of the fundamental causes of our political corruption, social unrest, and Christian lethargy. What then of the future? Must idolatry take its course and end in the overthrow of this, the flower of all civilizations? Are there no "castles of hope'' along our horizon? As many as we have faith to see. Wherein lies the cure for our disease? Education! First, secular; that our schools may be more than places to learn the best methods of making money. Education, secondly, Christian; that the church, which alone possesses the cure for all the ills of humanity, may first leave off her own abominable idolatry, and then teach men with unceasing voice and holy life that ''the things that are seen are temporal, but the things which are unseen are eternal.'' Then shall those counteracting principles be set to work under the united influences of which America will spring forth into the centuries with the elastic bound of a healthy athlete.

''DEAR BUCKNELL!''

I invoke the especial blessing of Almighty God upon the students of Bucknell. May they, in their last days on this earth, know how immeasurably great is God's love to them who trust in Him. And may they know how great is the strength given to the believer in the hour of trial, AS I DO—bless His Holy Name!

E. A. MORLEY.

To the older students, now in the University, the name affixed to the above invocation will recall pleasant memories of one who formerly moved about among us, and who, by his consistent and exemplary life, won the friendship and respect of all with whom he came into contact. Mr. Morley was a student in the Academy during the school year of '89–'90. Because of severe illness, contracted in the too ardent pursuit of his studies, he was forced to remain at home during the next year. For a few weeks, at the beginning of the Fall term of '91, he was again with us, but it soon became evident that the strain of constant study was too great for his only partially restored health. Accordingly he returned to his home about the first of November.

The bitter disappointment at thus having to give up the career, for which his course at Bucknell was the preparation, had much to do with hastening his death, which occurred April 9, 1892.

To how great an extent he had Bucknell and her interests at heart we may see from his prayer for her which was written on April 8,—just the day before he died.

Athletics and Chess.

SCHEDULE OF FOOT-BALL GAMES.

Shamokin, at Shamokin, September 30,
Franklin and Marshall, at Lancaster, Oct. 7.
University of Pennsylvania, at Philadelphia, October 14.
Gettysburg, at Lewisburg, October 21.

With this number of THE MIRROR we begin a new department which shall be devoted exclusively to foot-ball, base ball, tennis, chess and inter-collegiate games. It will not only be the aim to keep the readers of THE MIRROR posted on Sports at Bucknell, but to give them some information about our opponents with whom we have to deal. The semi-monthly issue of the paper enables us to keep up to date with the news. We shall try to keep this department as spicy as possible and not serve one but please all.

Faithful practice is essential to win.

Parker is captain of the Freshmen team.

The Academy team had a game at Selinsgrove, Saturday, September 30.

The class of '97 brought with it some of the best foot-ball material in the College.

''Doc'' Mount, who did good work in foot-ball two years ago, is back and hard at work on the field.

Among the promising new players are Jennings, Bunnell, Collins and Wilson, '97, and Firth, '96.

With the presence and coaching of Riggin, '94, and Catterall, '91, on the field every evening, the boys are ''getting on'' to the game. ''Jolly'' takes great pride in the second team.

Excellence only should be the aim before all men so that there may be a chance to get on the team at any time. It is the purpose of the management not to have anybody as a fixture.

The manager of the second team is in correspondence with Bloomsburg Normal, Shamokin, Wyoming Seminary, Williamsport Y. M. C. A. and Wilkes-Barre, and hopes to get games with them. It is his intention to get dates with the lesser teams throughout the country.

A meeting of foot-ball enthusiasts and aspirants for the team was held in Theta Alpha Hall at 9:30 September 16. After a speech by Mr. Riggin encouraging the boys, the meeting proceeded to the election of a captain for the first team, and a captain and manager for the second team. The former resulted in the choice of H. F. Smith, '94, and the latter in Jackson, '95, captain, and Portser, '96, manager.

At present the first team will be composed about as follows: Centre, Burns Smith; guards, Schub and Hollinshead; tackles, Jennings and Lesher; ends, Megargee and Kaufman; quarter back, H. F. Smith; half backs, Marsh and Wolfe; full back, Barclay; subs, Bromley Smith, Bunnell and Mount. The captaincy and management of the first team is now in the hands of H. F. Smith.

Everybody should come out on the field every evening and do all in their power to encourage the boys, not only by their presence but by their cheers on individual plays, and if possible should don a suit and help on the perfection of the first team. A great many new outfits have been secured this season, and there is ample room for practice and a place on the team. Everybody's help is needed to insure success.

The chess club will be reorganized October 6, when a new schedule will be made out and, if possible, games arranged with other colleges.

Local.

Twice a month!

Welcome to new students.

Nelson Davis is assisting Dr. Groff in Mineralogy and the Organic Sciences.

Wilson, '95, preached morning and evening at the Lutheran church on the 25th ult.

Prof. Perrine talks of building a cottage at Wildwood, the Baptist Seaside resort.

Frank Simpson has been engaged by the Library committee to assist Professor Loomis.

Messrs. Frank Rogers and H. Burns Smith have been initiated by the Sigma Chi fraternity.

A recent number of the Popular Science Monthly contains an interesting article from Dr. G. G. Groff.

Prof. Hamblin and bride spent a few happy weeks in the New England states during the summer.

Jackson's Version: Thou shalt not steal. (Grapes, apples and watermelons are exceptions to this rule.)

The students, as a body, came down handsomely with the shekels when the annual foot-ball message was presented.

Did you see that box "Mac" received from Jersey? A young lady made the cake and the fruit grew in her father's garden.

"Doc." Mount has returned, after a year's absence, much improved in health. He talks of completing a course with '97.

B. B. Ware and H. T. Colestock represented our Y. M. C. A. at the World's Student Conference held at Northfield, Mass.

NOTICE: Freshmen who are taking honor work in Puck and Judge are not expected to devote more than half an hour per day to it.

Raymond Davis is acting pastor of a Sunbury church. His parishioners demand two sermons every Sunday and a talk on Wednesday evening.

During the latter part of the term our "Prohibs" will give an oratorical contest. The winner will meet men from other colleges of this state.

J. B. S. recently treated several of his friends to fine canned quinces. It is believed that they were canned expressly for his use by one of the young ladies in the Institute.

Before the Chemical and Physical Society Prof. Owens recently gave an interesting account of things observed by him in the Electrical building while at the World's fair.

Freshman talking to some Sophomore friends: "You ought to have been in the Geometry class today; Prof. sat down on one of the girls to beat all." Suiter: "My! I wish I had been in Prof.'s place."

Professor in the Chemistry Class: "What effect does lowering the temperature have on water?" Bright Student: "Causes it to freeze." Prof.: "Yes; but what happens before it freezes?" B. S.: "It gets cold."

The "Students' Series of Latin Classics" was enriched during the summer by an edition of "Velleius Paterculus." Prof. Rockwood, the author, is happy because his work has been received with favor by teachers and because his classes are showing an enthusiastic appreciation of its merits.

The class in "Surveying" is perplexed. Upon the approach of Miss ——— the compass immediately begins to dance the serpentine. Various theories are advanced. Sunspots and magnetic ore in Venus are the favorite causes.

Owing to the skill and ingenuity of Messrs. Ware and Suiter the stag social was a very pleasant affair. Though very short notice was given that the usual reception in the chapel would not be allowed this year, still an interesting program was arranged and carried out successfully.

Junior talking to lower classmen: "I think it is a mistake to place the admission to Col. Bain's lecture so high. Many will not attend, owing to the price of the tickets; yet I dare say that he will have a select audience—I expect to be there."

The regular meetings of the Y. M. C. A. are well attended. No student can afford to miss the benefits derived from these Tuesday evening gatherings. The excuse made by some who do not attend that they do not have time for the service, is really no excuse at all. For the students who attend regularly affirm that time is gained by "having a little talk with Him."

The entire University was enshrouded in the gloom of sorrow a few days since upon hearing of the sudden death of Miss Annie C. Carlisle at Beaver Falls. Since her graduation from the Collegiate department in '92 Miss Carlisle had been engaged in the Young Women's Christian Association Work as State Secretary, and it was while in pursuance of these duties that she was so suddenly overtaken. Those who knew her here remember her as a kind friend, a cheerful helper, a diligent student, a person of most exemplary life—in a word, a Christian. The interment took place from her home in Williamsport, Friday, September 29. Memorial services will be held in Bucknell Hall, Sunday, October 15. A biographical sketch will appear in the next number of THE MIRROR.

At the Fall election of MIRROR editors, the following were chosen by the Association: George Waid, Thomas Fretz, Frank Strayer, J. Rob'ts Wood, class of '94; Herbert Pease, Ezra Allen, Bromley Smith, class of '95; Lewis Walkinshaw, Harry Colestock, class of '96; Carl Summerbell, class of '97. For the positions of the editors on the staff, see head of editorial column.

The term elections by the Literary societies resulted in the choice by Euepia of Riemer, President; W. Carey, Vice-President; Firth, Secretary; Jackson, Critic; F. Finn, Treasurer.

Theta Alpha, chose: Strayer, President; J. Davis, Vice President; Suiter, Secretary; Douglas, Treasurer; Hughes, Critic; Schuyler, Censor; Kaufman, Curator.

A meeting of the University Prohibition Club elected, Colestock, President; Dutton, 1st Vice-President; J Davis, 2nd Vice-President; Kunkle, Secretary: Powell, Treasurer.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

[NORA M. GREENE, Correspondent.]

Mrs. Guthrie, of Pottsville, recently visited her daughter.

Miss Frances Montgomery, of McEwensville, beamed on us one day last week.

Two new girls,—Misses Godard and Wells—are the happy possessors of bicycles.

Miss Louise Lane is busily engaged in school work at her home in Huntingdon.

A picnic to Blue Hill on Fair Day is looked forward to with much eagerness by the members of the Institute.

Misses Nellie Conard and Martha Goldy, well known at Bucknell, spent several weeks very pleasantly at the Fair.

Announcement cards have been received of the marriage of Prof. Lincoln Hulley to Miss Eloise Mayham, of Stamford, N. Y.

We regret that owing to the prolonged illness of Miss Mary Kreamer, she is unable to resume her duties as teacher among us.

A reception was tendered the University Band recently by their enthusiastic instructor, Dr. E. A. Aviragnet. After discoursing some "sweet strains," the members repaired to the reception room, where refreshments were served by the new girls.

The improvements at the Institute this year have been mainly within the building. The floors of the various class rooms have been freshly painted, the walls of the school room nicely tinted, and the ceiling finished in hard wood. The furniture in many of the rooms has been treated to a fresh coat of varnish, and an air of comfort and cheer prevails.

Miss Carrie G. Reese, of the class of '78, delivered a very able lecture in July, in the Assembly Room of the Woman's Building, Chicago, on the theme, "We,—the women." There were many in the audience, among whom were some who have learned to appreciate her earnestness of purpose and convincing manner of expression in addresses she has kindly given before the Bucknell Alumnae at Commencement.

A meeting of the Current News Club was recently devoted to "World's Fair Notes." Adjectives were lavishly used in the descriptions. A question arose as to the most interesting place visited. While some concluded the Art Palace and Woman's Building most attractive, others stoutly maintained that the varied pleasures of the Midway Plaisance,—the famous street of Cairo, with its dusky inhabitants, and the dizzy heights of the gigantic Ferris Wheel—were more alluring.

Miss Mary Lois Thomas, of the class of '86, daughter of Rev. W. P. Thomas, of Lewisburg, was married to Dr. Weber L. Gerhart, on September 14, by Rev. J. T. Judd, of the Baptist Church, assisted by the Rev. E. C. Crumbling, in St. Paul's Evangelical Church. The church was prettily decorated and filled to over-flowing with guests. Miss Mabel Thomas, sister of the bride, acted as maid of honor, and Mr. Rolfe Gerhart, as best man. A reception at the residence of the bride's parents followed the ceremony.

The social life of the Institute was inaugurated on the first Saturday evening of the term by a delightful little reception, given by the young women of the Christian Association, to the new students who have come among us. An informal program was rendered, consisting of a piano solo, by Miss Aikin; a violin solo, by Louise Lawshe; a reading of one of Richard Harding Davis' inimitable stories, "The Swan Boat," by Mrs. Larison, and "The Story of Patsy," by Miss Armitage. The genial spirit of sociability was further promoted by light refreshments, conversations and games. The "good-nights" were at last said with a feeling of "Auld Acquaintance," and the reception was pronounced a great success.

Cheering, indeed, is the outlook for the year; so many new girls, earnest and eager to get started aright in their work. The dining-hall resounding to the merry din of voices,—the Senior class so large that their table must be extended to nearly twice its usual size. The school room and the students rooms, in the main building, all newly fitted up. Girls passing swiftly to and fro around the grounds on their noiseless wheels Classes in Physical Culture working in the gymnasium. Seventeen additions to the Christian Association. A beautiful chant has been added to the chapel services,—all these improvements speak of an advance which is inspiring.

Rain in the morning, doubled in the afternoon, compound interest added in the evening, but even that did not prevent a goodly number of people from gathering in the Baptist Chapel on the first Wednesday evening of the term. After some matters of business had been adjusted, the pastor gave a short address of welcome, in which he requested that each person present should shake hands with every one else. After this all settled down to ice cream, cake and conversation. The two former were supplied in abundance by the ladies of the church, and each person was expected to furnish a share of the latter. But in this respect some were more generous than others. The people were not allowed, however, to tire of each other's company, for at nine o'clock all were dismissed by the pastor, with a cordial invitation to visit him in his own home.

The reform of the French Orthography, having been officially decreed by a circular of the Minister of Public Instruction, on the 27th of April, 1891, Mr. Greard, one of the eminent Ministers of the French Academy, read a report on the subject before the committee of the French dictionary, at their meeting on January 26, 1893, and the conclusions of the report were adopted. Dr. Aviragnet asked immediately for the documents, as he wanted to adopt the change in his classes immediately. The French Orthography has now become very simple, being based on the phonetic system. Many difficult rules of grammar and syntax also disappear. Dr. Aviragnet intends giving very soon a lecture on the changes decreed, for all those who are interested in French, in Bucknell Hall.

ACADEMIC NEWS.

[S. J. CLEELAND, Correspondent.]

It does not always pay to be a "kicker," except in foot-ball.

Mr. Shuhardt is now attending Temple College in Philadelphia.

Implements often used to effect a capture—curling iron and rouge-pot.—Howard Lampoon.

A number of the Cadites have taken to playing foot-ball, in which they show great interest and zeal.

Students having items for THE MIRROR, will please hand the same to the correspondent as soon as possible.

Those who heard our well-known friend, Mr. Warren, declaim in chapel, certainly had the pleasure of a hearty laugh.

We are glad to welcome Prof. Heim among us, who, no doubt, will do all in his power to make Latin pleasant and interesting.

It has been rumored that Mr. Conrath is now an editor of a paper in Western Pennsylvania, at a salary of twelve hundred a year.

The inactivity of trade during the past summer kept many students from being successful with the goods they handled. Great things are expected by them next summer.

Mr. Chas. Pierce has been called home to go west with his parents. The gentleman was respected by all and was very sorry to sever his connections with us. He expects to resume his studies next year again in the Academy.

The Hermenia Literary Society this term have elected for officers, viz: Mr. Dutton, President; Slifer, Vice President; First Critic, Perrin; Second Critic, Hobbins; Secretary, Harvey; Librarian, Elliott; Sergeant-at-Arms, Bower, the Third.

The following officers have been elected in the Adelphia Literary Society for this term: President, Anderson; Vice President, Flint; Chaplain, Bayard; Secretary, Koser; First Critic, Lindemann; Second Critic, Bell; Treasurer, Warren; Censor, Cober; Curator, Saul; Sergeant-at-Arms, Meeker.

The Annual Reception of the Y. M. C A., was held in the reception rooms of the Academy September 16th, at which quite a number were present. After listening to speeches from different brothers, refreshments were served in the dining hall, which were partaken of with pleasure. Those present, after spending a season of social intercourse, expressed themselves as having a very delightful evening.

Many changes have occurred since this time last year. New men have come among us to take up studies in the Academy, some from near, others afar.

Last year's Seniors in the Cad. are now Freshmen in the college, but their mounting a step higher has not deadened the interest they manifested while Preps. A cheery "Good morning" and "How do you do," has shown us that they are not afflicted with a very common disease, "Swelled Heads."

The students of Bucknell Academy have much to be thankful for in having for instructors such a fine body of men. Not only are they competent in teaching, but also possessing that essential qualification which draws professor to student and student to professor. There are not many schools in which the teachers show so much interest for the student like Bucknell Academy. Again, their characters are such as should be emulated. Let us, fellow students, give them our sympathy by showing interest in the work before us.

Personals.

'64. Dr. Chauncey B. Ripley, of Westfield, has been invited by Mr. Theodore Butterworth, the Chairman of the Committee of Arrangements of the Good Roads Congress of the World's Fair, to deliver an address in Chicago on improved public roads during the sitting of the Congress between the 10th and 20th of the present month.

RECORDS OF COLLEGE GRADUATES.

President Thwing, of Adelbert College, has very carefully gone through "Appleton's Cyclopædia of American Biography," keeping an exact record of the men who have graduated from college, and those who have not. Out of 15,142 persons who have become noted enough to have their names and lives in this work, 5,326 are college graduates and 941 of the remainder are graduates from some academy. About one-third are college men. The ratio of college graduates who are mentioned in "Appleton's Cyclopædia" to those who are not thus mentioned is one to forty, while that of non-college men who are mentioned to those who are not, is about one to ten thousand.

Editorial.

THE present number may be regarded a memorial to our lamented friend and late fellow-student, Miss Carlisle. The various commemorative articles have, to some extent, crowded out several other items of interest in this and other departments We trust, however, that by pausing now and then to reflect the life and virtues of a fallen comrade, THE MIRROR may be, not less interesting, but more instructive.

THE memorial services held in Bucknell Hall, Sunday, October 15, were a fitting and due tribute to the life and work of Miss Anna C. Carlisle, of the class of '92, College. It is good for us to turn aside and reflect upon the sweet Christian graces of one whom Providence removed in the opening of a promising life. Such reflection may sadden, but it also makes glad, if we can but discover the secret of power and the underlying motive which gave to her life its strength, usefulness and beauty.

THE establishment of a course in journalism at the University of Pennsylvania is one of the signs of progress in the newspaper world. The power of the newspaper in guiding the formation of public opinion is growing. To be a guide, the editor must know more than those he would guide; he must be learned in all that pertains to man, especially in that which directly affects mankind financially, socially and morally.

The editor, of all men, has need of the broadest education, his eye must compass the whole round of human activity, his judgment must be quick and keen, his love of the truth and right an abiding and ruling emotion.

The course established seeks to fulfil the intellectual requirement by building upon the firm foundation of disciplinary study common to all colleges in the first two years of the course, a superstructure rich in the elements of studies pertaining to economics and sociology.

The point to be emphasized is the admitted need of a broad, general education for those who aspire to distinction in the journalistic field.

OF THE many clubs and organizations to which college life gives rise, none hold the same relation to student life as the Christian Association. Other organizations are somewhat selfish in their aims, and work especially to promote the interests of their own members.

The Christian Association desires the welfare of all. To give work to the strong; to nurture the weak; to arouse the indifferent; to present Christ to all students is its mission. The methods of work vary with circumstances, but the fact that man has a physical, a mental and social nature is not overlooked, and many students are reached in this way who would not be by less skillful means.

Only when relations of friendship and confidence have been established can we successfully make personal appeals to our fellow-students. The provisions of the Christian Association assist in making this relation possible.

The importance of the work is clearly seen when we consider that much of the final moulding of character occurs during college life. A student can be approached by a student as by no one else.

Student life breaks through all shams, all disguises; we stand out before our fellow-students as we are; no cloak will suffice to hide our weaknesses and inconsistencies. Herein lies one danger. Would we influence a fellow-student, we must show and feel interest, not within the association rooms alone, but everywhere, nor should we allow any barriers of social or scholastic inequality to interfere.

The fact that so great a percentage of our college students are Christians is in a large measure due to the activity of Christian Associations.

THE recent action of the Senior class in deciding to have, if the faculty permit, an orator at commencement instead of the time honored orations by the class, has much in it that is commendable.

The decision was unanimous and prompted by unselfish motives. It will prevent the injustices likely to occur in the selection of a few from a large class, the embarrassment of the many who are not permitted to speak. It will give more entertainment to, and interest a greater number of the general public.

On the other hand, it may be urged that the selection of speakers would be as just, and afford as perfect a presentation of the best talent in the class, as is possible; that the alumni, friends and interested public would prefer orations by the class, as affording, at least, a partial display of the mental attainment of the graduating class, and a hint in regard to the character of work done by the college.

There are arguments of weight on both sides of the question. Much depends upon who the orator is, and upon the circumstances of each individual class.

Literary.

OFF IN THE ''GYIAO-TZ.''

Up among the hills, near the eastern coast of China, a little party of us were gathered for the summer. We were all crowded into one small house, our sanitarium—ten of us in a building which could rightly boast of but four rooms. But we made curtains do duty for walls, and the two rooms down stairs—one for each family—were dining room, store room, sitting room and parlor combined. In fact, we were virtually ''camping out.'' Dr and Mrs. Master shared their apartments with the two young ladies, and our family, comprising father, mother, Wayland, Margeret, little May, and myself, quite filled our small quarters.

One day it was decided that a picnic would be necessary to complete the summer's program. We were all to go in ''gyiao-tz,'' or sedan chairs, for a distance of seven or eight miles, to a certain spot famous in the regions around for its beautiful scenery. The plans were all made and arrangements completed for an early start the next morning; and we children were almost wild with impatience for the day to come. But Father Time, unmoved by our longings, drove steadily on, and at the proper time ushered in the wished-for day.

I took a silent survey of the weather indications—beautiful sky, no clouds to be seen, air bright and fresh—all augured well. Then, breakfast over, began the bustle; servants busily engaged in strapping up the large lunch baskets for the coolie to carry; mother going hither and thither, performing the last bit of work before leaving for the day; chair-bearers looking to see that the chairs were all ready for use, or tying on a new pair of straw sandals for the journey, or, perchance, smoking their pipes in contented waiting. Would we never start?

At last the word came to go. A coolie headed the procession, with the lunch and extra shawls and rubber blankets slung over his shoulders on either end of a bamboo pole. Nearly all had mountain chairs. You don't know what they are. They have the regular two long bamboo poles, fastened at each end by a cross piece which rests on the coolie's shoulders. A board fastened across these poles about midway between the bearers, serves for the back ; the seat is a board slung on a rope, between the poles, and the foot-rest a similar board still lower. These chairs are designed for lightness so that the bearers may not be so burdened while toiling up the mountains. Comfort for the occupant is a matter of minor consequence.

Can you see the long procession in motion? The bearers, in their exuberance of spirits, stepped with more elasticity than was their wont, and increased the peculiar up and-down movement of the chairs. Coming, as we did, at the very rear, Margeret and I found the spectacle a mirth-provoking one. The long line, formed by seven or eight sedan chairs, resembled a huge dragon pursuing his undulating course. Every one was in the best of spirits, and wit was tossed back and forth, much to the amusement of our native bearers, who understood not a word of what was said, yet found the laughter contagious.

So the happy party wound merrily along ; now on the narrow foot-paths between promising rice-fields, which stretched up the entire mountain side in terraces of the most exquisite, tender green, now beside bamboo groves, which, at a distance, had given the appearance of a soft feathery cluster of ferns, now following a bright, sparkling stream, which bubbled over the stones and, with its gentle murmur, invited us enticingly to linger by its side, now through some rocky gorge ; but we were not afraid, for the bearers were sure-footed. Now and then we all alighted at some "liang-ling" or resting place for a drink, and, on the part of us children, an investigation ; for the natives always had at least one idol set up in each liang-ling, and we found it interesting to note the stages of decay into which these deities were passing.

But, before we had reached our picnic spot, the sky, which in the morning had been so remarkably clear, had become overcast with dark, ominous clouds, which very soon let down upon our poorly protected party a perfect deluge of rain. We took refuge, in all haste, in the nearest temple, and on finding that no one was wet enough to be harmed, we decided to stay and have our picnic there.

Of course a crowd of natives gathered around to see the foreign wonders, and followed us curiously as we went about the temple examining first one idol and then another. The remarks made by this crowd were extremely amusing to us ; for while we understood every word they said perfectly, they were ignorant of the fact and commented freely on every thing pertaining to us.

"See how small their shoes are. How can they get them on?" (Their own high shoes are after the pattern of our rubber boots.)

"See how white their faces are, and their hands, too, just look !"

"Which is girl and which boy?"

"That one is a boy with the robe on."

But they were considerate, and left us pretty much to ourselves while at lunch. This we took on some stone benches on the veranda, where we could at least be out in the open air. Lunch over, we had hoped it might clear away and thus allow us still to go to Z——. However, the rain still fell. So, although we considered ourselves able to put up with much that was disagreeable, nevertheless we thought it wise to defer this pleasure trip till some time when Father Sun would smile on us approvingly. Accordingly, with spirits only heightened by the rain, we set forth on our homeward way, through the same beautiful scenery, even more beautiful in its freshness, and welcomed at last the sight of old Larchfield once more.

Kao Kae-tih.

THE MELANCHOLY OF JACQUES.

One of the most forcible and influential elements of a man's life is contrast. Similarities are frequent; differences are rare. Day and night are the widest of diversities, but seldom noticed as such because one blends into the other by the most imperceptible shadings; they are not distinct in clear outlines. Seldom do we find two men of the same character, but the contrast is lost in similar exteriors.

If we now apply this rule to the literary side of life, we shall find that the most powerful weapon of the orator, the most influential means of the teacher, and the most effectual expedient of the writer, is the ability to set arguments, doctrines and characters in sharp contrast with one another. And we may search the productions of both ancient and modern literary efforts in vain for a more forcible and perfect contrast than that which Shakespeare has given us in the relations of the melancholy Jacques with the other characters of the famous play, "As You Like It."

To fully appreciate this relationship it will be necessary to first get a definite idea of this so-called "melancholy" of Jacques. According to his own description it is not that of the scholar or the musician, the courtier or the soldier, the lady or the lover; "but it is a melancholy of mine own, compounded of many simples, extracted from many objects, and, indeed, the sundry contemplation of my travels, which, by often rumination, wraps me in the most humorous sadness." We learn that Jacques had sold all his possessions to satisfy a desire that has no doubt entered the breast of every young man,—to see the world. He had drifted to Italy, the very mother of vice, had wasted all his property in "riotous living," and at last advanced years had reaped the natural harvest of sin—only remorse and sorrow for his past iniquities. Herein, then, is to be found the cause for his "sadness."

Still, in his own estimation, Jacques has not spent life entirely in vain. For he tells us that he "had gained his experience," or, in other words, a knowledge of human nature which he has found so empty, so unsubstantial, so unreal, that he calls "all the world a stage, and all the men and women merely players."

But if we stop merely with a definition of Jacques' character, we shall have lost its greatest force, its highest purpose, and the very object for which the inventive brain of Shakespeare conceived it. Notwithstanding the fact that "As You Like It" is an ideal play, yet life for each one of those characters, except Jacques, is intensely in earnest. No love could be deeper than that of Rosalind and Orlando; no misfortune could be more severe than that which befel the Senior Duke, however preciously he may have treasured his find of "tongues in trees, books in the running brooks, sermons in stones, and good in everything." Each character, except Jacques, felt that there was something in life to which they might look forward, some cherished object which they perhaps might win, and some fond hope which might some day be realized, however dim might seem the prospect, however distant might be the goal.

On the other hand, when we examine the character of Jacques, we find absolutely nothing in his life except bitter satire and sullen cynicism. Unlike Orlando, "the something that nature gave him" has, not by the influence of hostile relatives or friends, but by a career of his own choice, been so thoroughly poisoned (if not utterly exterminated) that the only business seemingly for which he is now capable is to preach the emptiness of human hopes, and the utter depravity and treachery of mankind.

But with what receptions are his sallies met! It is just as useless for him to attempt to embitter those three glad hearts, which form the very life-beat of the entire production, as it would be for him to reform his own deep-rooted habits, or cleanse his own foul heart.

Brief, indeed, is his conversation with Rosalind, in whom he strives to inculcate the idea that "'tis good to be sad and say nothing!" How humorously she asks him if then "'tis good to be a post," and defines the melancholy of which he boasts as something worse than the most degraded conditions of intoxication or the most excessive transports of merriment! How sarcastically she speaks of him as "a traveler," informing him that to have "seen much and have little is to have rich eyes and poor hands;" dwells upon his traveling for experience that makes him sad, and finally bids him adieu by reminding him "to chide God for making for him that countenance!!"

Again, what a greeting he receives from Orlando! The latter flatly refuses to join with him in "railing against our mistress, the world, and all our misery." How wittily he responds to all of Jacques' remarks about Rosalind, suggesting that there was no thought of pleasing him when she was christened.

But still greater are the banterings which he receives from the Senior Duke, to whom he expresses his expectation of becoming a moralist or a reformer. The Duke frankly tells him that in the first capacity he will do no good whatever, and that in the second he would only disgorge into the general world "all the embossed sores and healed evils" which "a libertine, as sensual as the brutish sting itself, could catch," rather than bring his fellow creatures to a higher standard of moral excellence. But Jacques seems to exhibit such a shallowness of intellect and meagreness of comprehension that he is wholly unable to appreciate the jests made at his expense.

After receiving similar receptions from the other characters of the play, "Monsieur Melancholy" takes his exit, with the determination to court the company of penitent Junior Duke, in whom he will find, no doubt, a more appreciative listener to his dissertations on worldly emptiness than those with whom he had been recently associating.

Thus it is that Jacques is brought out in sharp contrast with the main characters of the play—a huge black monster set up, as it were, against those three pure, spotless dispositions, in order to present them in a still greater degree of integrity, and a still purer state of morality.

Picture painting and word painting are much the same. The writer and the artist are separated by a very slight distinction, for a touch from either's brush will reproduce the human emotions in their truest possible workings.

And so, if we compare the famous painting "The Angelus" with "As You Like It," it will be found that in one point they are precisely alike.

Two peasants, a rough field, the scattered potatoes, the green heath stretching out in the distance, the setting sun—what do these signify? Yes, we discern a reverent awe imprinted upon the countenance of those two laborers, an attitude of prayer; but yet we fail to see the object. Ah! away off there in the distance is dimly seen the spire of the humble little chapel, and we fancy we can hear the faint, faint toll of the bell pealing out the time for vespers—the time of "The Angelus." But suppose that spire was not there. The reverent laborers, the wave-like moorland, the distant hamlet, the rustic scenery, the tints of the sinking sun would mean nothing.

Just such a case do we find in "As You Like It." Little would the force of the play have been felt had Jacques been left out; little would the charming character of Rosalind, the gallant spirit of Orlando, and the contented disposition of the Senior Duke, have merited our applause or approbation. Merely by the introduction of a character so entirely different from them, which was occasionally bringing into contrast the spirit engendered by true happiness and by an unfaltering faith in mankind, with one soured by experiences of the vilest kind and embittered by a loathing of every conceivable object, we feel the force of each character, the full teaching of the moral, the intrinsic beauty of the entire play, and exclaim unanimously "Divine Shakespeare, thou who couldst, by a touch so delicate yet so striking, produce a perfect and sublime painting instead of a gaudy and empty picture."

ANNIE C. CARLISLE.

Annie Catherine Carlisle was born at Laurelton, Union county, Pa., April 6, 1862. She began her school life in Philadelphia. In 1875 she moved to Williamsport and entered the public schools of that city, graduating with distinguished honors in '81.

She immediately began to teach in the city and continued the work for seven years. At the end of this time she resigned the principalship of the Clay building to enter the Freshman class of Bucknell University. The Board of Directors paid a fitting tribute to her as a teacher when they permitted the public schools of the city to be closed on the day of her funeral.

During her college course she held an honorable rank in her class; taught some classes at the Institute; for three years held the Presidency of the Y. W. C. A. of the Institute; was an active worker in the Sunday School, and a leader in the religious work of the Institution. An exemplary college career.

"I came to Bucknell," she said, "to prepare myself to do more efficient work as a teacher." She accomplished the object for which she came and more. Often a student gets more out of his college course than he expected, because he enters college with a purpose. After her graduation in '92 she could have done more efficient work as a teacher in the class room, and for this very reason the Y. W. C. A. work of the state needed her. In September, '92, she accepted the state secretaryship of the Y. W. C. A., and continued in this work until the hour of her death. While making a tour through the state in the interest of the association, she went to Geneva College at Beaver Falls. On the evening of the same day on which she arrived she addressed the young ladies of the school at 6:30, and two hours later she was seized with a violent pain in the head; immediately she became unconscious and died at 9:30. This occurred September 25, 1893. A post-mortem examination showed that the cause of her death was cerebral hemorrhage.

She was buried in Williamsport, September

29, '93. The funeral services were conducted by her pastor, Rev. S. G. Reading. Prayer was offered by Llewellyn Phillips, her class mate, and addresses were made by Rev. S. G. Reading and Dr. Harris.

She was, preeminently, a Christian. Her life was governed by Christian principles. To her mother on leaving home for the last time she said: "I try to live every day as though it were my last day." While staying at home last summer during her vacation, she said to her pastor: "Give me some work to do." The work was assigned, and she began to do it when her summons came. To one of her friends she said: "I have selected as my motto, 'Study to shew thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the Word of Truth.' "

SCHEDULE OF FOOT-BALL GAMES.

Gettysburg, at Lewisburg, Oct. 21.
Haverford, at Haverford, Nov. 4.
State College, at Lewisburg, Nov. 11.
Dickinson, at Harrisburg, (Thanksgiving) Nov. 30.

SECOND TEAM.

Williamsport, at Williamsport, Oct. 28.

What has become of Reno on the foot-ball field?

Bucknell defeated Milton at the Lewisburg fair grounds on Friday, Sept. 29, by a score 30–0. It looked much like a practice game.

The second team does good work on the field every evening. On one occasion they made a touch-down and goal and on another they pushed the first team within two yards of their own goal.

'97 has challenged '96 to a game of foot-ball, and '96 has accepted, on condition that it be played after all regular games are over, on account of the first and second team practice every evening. Many of the men from both classes are on these teams.

The Academy team is in touch with foot-ball this year. They have an active spirit, and Captain Elliott has put forth his efforts to make a good team. Their first game was a victory of 6–0 against Selinsgrove on Oct. 7. They go to Williamsport Oct. 14.

Much to the disappointment of the manager of the first team, a telegram from University of Pennsylvania arrived just as they were to start for that place on Friday, Oct. 13, saying that they would have to cancel the date on account of having to play another team on that day. They offered a forfeit to be released and it was accepted.

Bucknell 10, Shamokin 6. The first regular game of the season was played at Shamokin, Saturday, Sept. 30, with the result stated. The teams were pretty well matched. Shamokin contains many old college players, and Bucknell's team were not all there. Twenty-minute halves were played, and in that time the large crowd present yelled itself almost hoarse. Megargee, Bunnell, Marsh and Barclay made good plays for Bucknell. The teams lined up as follows:

Megargee	left end	Frances
Smith, Burns	center	McCall
Collins	right guard	Schadt
Lesher	right tackle	Bartolette
Smith, Bromly	right end	Marr
Mount	quarter back	Lewis
Marsh	left half	Potts
Barclay	right half	Brewer
Bunnell	full back	Jones

Franklin and Marshall 10, Bucknell 6. Such is the score that represents our first defeat at Lancaster on Oct. 14. There was a great deal of wrangling and hard playing during the game. Kaufmann and Jennings did some fine playing for Bucknell. Thirty-minute halves were played. The teams lined up as follows:

Franklin & Marshall.	Position.	Bucknell.
Kirk	left end	Mount
Hartman	left tackle	Kaufmann
Stover	center	Burns Smith
Hower	right guard	Schub
Krick	right tackle	Jennings
Stroup	right end	Megargee
Cremer	quarter back	Cap. H. F. Smith
Lantz	left half	Marsh
Long	right half	Barclay
Skyles, Capt.	full back	Wolfe

The Chess club met in Euepia hall on Saturday Oct. 7, to elect officers for the ensuing year. The following were elected: president, Waid, '94; vice president, Allen, '95; secretary, Stock, '97; treasurer, Walkinshaw, '96; Board of Directors, Hughes, '94, Cregar, '95, and Sprague, '97. It was decided to change the name to "Chess and Checker" club, to admit those who are interested in checkers. A tournament is to be arranged between the members of the club.

We are also glad to note the interest taken in Tennis at this time of the year. Wood, Allen, Davis, Anderson, Harper, Bayard, Colestock, Ware and other old and new students are seen on the tennis courts regularly. Let us have a tournament next year.

Local.

We have a small Freshman named Birge,
Who was seized by his chums on a splurge;
He soon felt a bump,
Which left quite a lump,
And now he goes singing a dirge.

Williams, '97, has been initiated by Phi Kappa Psi.

Parker has become a member of Sigma Alpha Epsilon.

Wilson, '95, is convalescing from an attack of mechanics.

"Jimmy" Hughes preached in Ashland early in the month.

Get your "oi—l" of McLaughlin, Monday and Friday afternoons.

The plumbing of the gymnasium bath room needs prompt repairing.

Macnab & Co. are making mineralogical cabinets for the students of geology.

The college students were well represented at Bain's lecture on the "Masses."

The annual whiskers of '94 are blooming. Schub has harvested his first crop.

Mr. Dillon, a rubicund Freshman, has great success in heating the "gym." water.

Dr. U. G. Beek, of Milton, made a pleasant call on some of his friends here a few days ago.

Dr. Harris preached the dedicatory sermon of the Lebanon Baptist church on the 8th inst.

We are glad to note that Anderson, '94, is about again. He was sick, being confined to his room for a few days.

Powell is acting agent for the Danville Steam Laundry. He gathers the "wash" Monday afternoon and evening.

The Susquehanna affords good opportunities for boating. Some of the boys are treating their lady friends to an occasional row.

Phi Gamma Delta has initiated Messrs. Stanton, Bunnel, Sprague and Rivenburg, of the class of '97, and Jackson, of '95.

Dr. Aviragnet has ordered some new instruments for the band. Improvement is his watchword, and this means success.

A few days ago Macnab captured a live snake. He has developed such a liking for this one that he intends to enlarge his collection soon.

At a recent meeting of the Camera Club the following officers were elected: Sheddan, President; Cregar, Vice President; W. H. Carey, Secretary; Brick, Treasurer.

Prof. Bartol's new Geometry has been received with much favor by the students. It is neat, compact, and adapted to the time usually given to this study in Bucknell.

Prof. Perrine addressed a congregation of the Grant Street Baptist church in Wilkes-Barre on the morning of the 8th inst. In the evening he preached at Maltby.

A graduate fellowship in the Chicago University has been established by a friend for the benefit of Bucknell students desiring to pursue a special course there.

The members of Theta Alpha Literary Society have repapered their hall and in other ways beautified its appearance. The members are justly proud of their attractive hall.

Professor in the Chemistry class: "Name the three kinds of carbon." Mr. Hall: "Diamond, graphite and lumbago." (Hall was unable to see why the class roared with laughter.)

The French class should study their lessons in evening. Why? Because of the soporific effect. Some of the members of the class get so sleepy over it that they have to go to bed in the afternoon.

In accordance with the suggestion of the President and Board of Trustees, Dr. Perrine is about to send circulars to the alumni of the College. In these he will give a list of the books most needed in the department of Literature, together with the publishers' prices. Inasmuch as the alumni have voted to sustain an alcove in our library, it is high time for them to have even a passable representation.

The class of '95 has decided to publish L'Agenda. At a meeting for the election of editors, the following were chosen: Allen, Pease, Paullin, Kaufman, W. Carey, Smith and Miss McLaughlin. Messrs. Jackson and Simpson will manage the business department.

On Thursday evening, November 2, Dr. Perrine will lecture in Bucknell Hall on "The College Days of Daniel Webster." The entire proceeds will be given to the College Y. M. C. A. The lecture is highly spoken of. Let everybody turn out and give the Doctor a large audience.

F. W. Brown, '96, presented to the Laboratory a case of thirty-two different specimens of petroleum. Mr. Brown also gave an interesting talk about petroleum before the Chemical and Physical Society. For several years he was connected with the Franklin refinery, which is said to be the largest in the world.

At midnight, on the 13th, a howling tornado ripped up half of the tin roof over the East Wing. The rain soon leaked "on the just and the unjust." Palmer and D. Webster Phillips were soaked by the cataclysm. Dr. Gretzinger, with his characteristic hustle, had temporary roofing in place before the boys returned from breakfast.

Gilbert Beaver, assistant secretary of the Y. M. C. A. State Work, made our Association a pleasant visit recently. Mr. Beaver is a young man whom our members delight to meet. He spoke not only with reference to the State Convention, but more particularly about the religious awakening which is being experienced in the colleges in many parts of the country. Shall we have a repetition of last year's experience?

Memorial services were held in Bucknell Hall Sunday afternoon, October 15, for Miss Annie C. Carlisle, '92, who died at Beaver Falls on the 25th of September. After a funeral march was rendered by Dr. Avirágnet's orchestra, Scripture was read and prayer offered by Rev. J. T. Judd. Excellent addresses were delivered by Prof. Llewellyn Phillips, Mrs. K. B. Larison and Pres. J. H. Harris, and letters from class mates and friends read by Miss Jessie Wheeler. The music consisted, besides hymns, of a quartette and duet by members of the University.

Prof Aviragnet directed a successful musicale in Bucknell Hall, October 12, for the benefit of a series of open air concerts to be given by the band. The following program was rendered:

PART I.

Sweet Dream Serenade	University Band
Grande Fantaisie for Violin and Piano	Misses Louise and Josephine Lawshe
The Courier of Moscow	Mr. R. Davidson
Aragonaise for Piano	Miss Julia Aikin
Saved From the Storm	Miss May Morgan

PART II.

Andante and Allegro of 1st Symphony	Misses Juliet Aikin and N. Suiter
Valse Poetique for Mandolin and Guitar	Messrs. B. Martin and Moyer
The Mission of the Rose	Miss May Morgan
Sarnnambula Fantaisie, for Piano	Miss Julia Aikin
Quartette--Stars of Summer Night	Misses Morgan and Davis, Messrs. Bunnell and Davidson

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Miss Mabel Wittenmyer has returned from a two weeks' sojourn in Chicago.

Among our students are representatives from the Empire, Garden and Hoosier States.

A pleasant Christian Endeavor social was held at the home of Miss Mary Owens on Oct. 14.

Miss Bronson, with her sister, is teaching in a boarding and day school in Providence, R. I.

Misses Rush and Mary Larison and Frances Montgomery, of McEwensville, are visiting the White City.

Miss Mary Morgan, of the conservatory of Syracuse, has the position of vocal teacher in the school of music.

The Choral Society, under the direction of Dr. Aviragnet, will shortly begin a new operatta, "Enthusiast," by Hewitt.

We are glad to have with us this year Miss Goddard, daughter of Rev. J. R. Goddard, of Colgate, N. Y., who gives us charming descriptions of life in China, as her childhood was spent in that distant land. All, no doubt, will be interested in her sketch "Gyaio-tz," found in another column.

The Shakespeare Club, which meets on Friday evenings, has entered upon the study of "Twelfth Night" with great enthusiasm.

Emerson says, "They who live with the good, find life glad and nutritious." True it is that the good are always profitable company. Those of us who were in daily intercourse with Miss Annie C. Carlisle during the four years she spent at Bucknell, will bear testimony that her life was a constant inspiration. To know that another is living nobly, is an electric touch, and no one can so perfectly impart this, as our companions. "Annie C.," as we girls called her, was always in sympathy with our social life. She helped us plan picnics and boat rides. She was happy in arranging the details of a social or a reception, yet we shall oftener remember her as presiding over our Y. W. C. A., or leading the Tuesday afternoon prayer meeting. When we think of her, our hearts are full and we thank God for the benedicdion of her life.

An intended burlesque—meeting of the Current News Club:

Pres.—"Now, girls, you know that this year the club is to be run on strictly business principles. Our officers were elected last week, and by the constitution each person must be present with an interesting and helpful bit of news. The secretary will please call the names, and you can respond with your items."

No response.

Pres.—Why, who is secretary?"

A long pause.

Pres.—Well, whoever was secretary pro tem, or whatever you call it, can read the names of the officers."

A chilling silence.

Pres.—"Why, who was it? Some one must have been, or it would not have been business-like. I think it was C—, and, anyway, she may call the names."

C.—"Miss B—."

Miss B.—"I really forgot the club was to meet to-night."

Pres.—Well, C—, read from the constitution the rule for such cases. (Aside) That sounded real business-like"

C.—"Why, I don't think we have one yet."

Pres.—Well, never mind, we had one last year, and she'll have to pay a fine anyway. Go on."

C.—"Miss L—."

Miss L.—"Oh, there isn't a single bit of news."

Misses M—, N—, O—, reply ditto, in answer to their names, but Miss W— redeems the honor of the society by saying, "Well, girls, I read that a great man is dead. I forget what his name is and where he lived and when he died, but everybody knows him, for there were two whole columns in the Ledger about him."

Pres.—"Now, girls, that's something like it. Oh! there is the study hour bell. Haven't we had a lovely meeting?"

ACADEMIC NEWS.

[S. J. Cleeland, Correspondent.]

C. L. McQuistion can be seen working hard on the campus every afternoon.

Thos. J. Davis is at present employed in Texas. He sends his best wishes to the students.

The Saturday evening Bible class thus far has been well attended by the students of the Cad.

The Y. M. C. A. meetings are well attended and full of life. Let us see more students attending them.

Mr. Edward Flint's smiling face is missed in the Fourth Form this term. He will resume his studies at the beginning of next term.

The Academy has put some good men on the foot-ball field. Our big friend Craig is about to try his hand at the game. Big things are expected of him.

Elliott possesses the fearless characteristic of a good foot-ball player. The manner in which he leaps upon the advancing V. is surprising and crushing.

The Academy team has secured an able manager in Mr. Purdy, who is arranging dates with other schools, and doing all he can in general for the good of the team.

Principal Martin was called away a few weeks ago to attend the funeral of his brother, Thos. B. Martin. The deceased was well known, and his death is mourned by relatives and friends. Principal Martin has our sympathy in his loss.

Mr. Anderson has tendered his resignation as President of the Adelphia. Lack of time and the many duties pertaining to the Y. M. C. A. work have prompted this action. The presence of Mr. Anderson will be sorely missed if the gentleman's resignation is accepted.

About ten o'clock Saturday evening a victorious cry was heard ringing through the tall trees surrounding the Academy. The Cad team had played and won the first game of the season. The game was between Selinsgrove and Bucknell Academy, played upon the former's grounds. First half started with the ball in the hands of the Selinsgrovers, who, being unable to make any advance, the ball became the Cad's, which was greatly advanced by two long runs by Smith and Elliott, then pushed over the goal line for a touch down by Slifer. Ball kicked by Elliott and goaled. Selinsgrove again made a V, which was broken and nothing gained; after a fumble by them it was secured by the Cad, who advanced it to the ten yard line, when time was called. Second half commenced with the Cad making a V and gaining ten yards. Selinsgrove secured the ball and made a little advance, but gave the ball to the Cad who carried it ten yards. Ball was again turned over to Selinsgrove, who nearly made a touchdown. Our boys, after a hard fight, gained five yards from centre of field. Ball was in our territory when time was called. The Selinsgrovers put up a good game and treated the boys like kings. The game was characterized with many brilliant plays on both sides. Slifer, Elliott, Koser, McQuistion showed up in fine form for the Cad. This is our first game and victory this year. May many more be added to the list.

Personal.

Ex. '52. John A. Grier, Esq., has lately taken up his residence at 358 Maple street, Englewood, Ill.

Ex. '54. Hon. Henry C. Ford has again been elected president of the state fish commission, a position which he has filled for several years.

Ex. '59. Capt. John H. Owens has charge of a large exhibit of bronze monuments at the World's fair.

'63. Rev. Henry C. Dunro is preaching at Beverly, N. Y.

'66. Alfred Taylor, Esq , with his wife and child spent the summer in Europe.

'69. Rev. F. M. Baker is pastor of the Presbyterian church at Dauphin, Pa. His son has recently entered the Freshman class at Bucknell.

Ex. '70. Prof A. Judson Philips is teaching with great acceptability in Mr Moody's school at Northfield, Mass.

'71. The State Normal School at West Chester, Pa., opened this term with an attendance of 557 students. This speaks well for its principal, G M Phillips, Ph. D.

'80. Rev. Frank H Cooper has accepted a call from the Memorial Baptist church, Binghamton, N. Y.

'82. Rev. Henry Madtes has resigned the presidency of Hall Institute at Sharon, Pa., and has accepted a call to a pastorate in Cleveland, O.

Editorial.

SINCE our last issue this institution has lost a staunch friend and wise counsellor, in the person of Rev. Benjamin Griffith, D. D. A short sketch of his life and work appears in another column.

OUR football team has been doing some excellent team work lately, preparing for the engagement of the season—the game with State College. All are anxious about the result, but confident of at least making a fair showing. A fair day, fair play, and a hotly contested game are all we ask.

WHATEVER may be the general effect of prizes the proposed prize for debate, offered to members of the Junior class, seems to be having a good result. Many of the Juniors may be observed taking a more active part in literary society debates than heretofore. All who take part regularly, whether Juniors or not, may win power in public debate, a prize more valuable than the few dollars to be won at the contest.

EARNEST, successful work in instruction deserves more than pay in dollars and cents, and we feel that we should acknowledge our indebtedness to Dr. E. Perrine for the course of lectures, Six American Authors, which he recently delivered to the Senior class. For unity of purpose, clearness of analysis, purity and beauty of diction, and power of suggestiveness, they equal or surpass any lectures which we have received during our course. In saying this we express the consensus of opinion of the class of '94.

WE are wont to hear among the students criticisms upon the sermons delivered in the various churches of the town. Let us consider this matter and see wherein lies the cause of complaint, and the remedies applicable.

The pastors of the respective churches for obvious reasons are not the most eminent men in their profession. They are men of more than average ability, and are rendering effective and satisfactory service to their several churches.

The student is, or should be, a critic; finding not the imperfections alone, but searching out also the kernels, the meat, of a discourse. Observing the imperfections that he may avoid them in his own speeches, the kernels of truth and wisdom that he may be strengthened thereby. Especially in religious services should this latter process predominate.

The criticisms, if we may so call them, which one hears are somewhat as follows: "My! but ——— preached a dry sermon," "——— put me to sleep," "——— was no good," and so on to the end of the list. This is not criticism. Criticism is active, mental effort, expressing itself in specific statements. Such expressions as the above show the absence of all mental effort, even the attention necessary to passive receptivity.

Many of us must plead guilty to just such expressions of complaint at some time in our course. Such are the facts; now the causes and remedies.

We overlook the fact that the pastor's foremost consideration is due to his church. He must provide suitable pasturage for his own sheep, before he begins to cater to the wants of the goats and stray sheep which may be temporarily with his flock. The effects of late hours during the week, and on Saturday night in particular, are too often charged against the sermon.

If we attend some one church regularly, and assist in its maintenance, going there in the proper physical and mental condition, we shall doubtless receive our meat in due season, finding much to praise, to accept, and to practice in each sermon we hear.

THE need of physical exercise in college life is at once apparent and acknowledged. In the regulation of our exercise we may have one of several different ideals before us. The Greek ideal of grace and beauty in physical development does not appeal strongly to our practical age, nor can exercise for strength appeal largely to students who expect to lead sedentary lives and do intellectual work. The ruling idea in the matter of general plan of exercise is exercise for health.

Certain physical conditions, pure air, sunlight, variety of exercise in kind and degree, together with the mental conditions of cheerfulness, animation, vim, determine largely the value of any exercise. Exercise taken with a wry face, no matter what the aim, loses half its value. The great value and prominence of athletic sports in our colleges arises from the fact that they fulfill the most favorable conditions of exercise. One enters into a game of tennis, base ball, or football from love of the sport, or, more exactly, from love of excelling, of cheerful companionship, of physical exhilaration. He has no thought as to what muscles are exercised, or what the effect will be on his digestion.

Participation in college athletics gives an abiding love for out door sports, and as a result we have a judge who can play base ball, a professor happy in the football canvass, preachers, lawyers, doctors, and business men who can participate in and enjoy viewing athletic games, and who perform their several functions with more vigor and efficiency because of athletic recreations.

Literary.

REV. BENJAMIN GRIFFITH, D. D.

[Address delivered at Memorial Services in Bucknell Hall, Oct 28.]

PROF. ENOCH PERRINE, LITT. D.

Homer's chiefs, as they die in battle, fall down and loud their armor rings. David, lamenting over Jonathan, wails: "How are the mighty fallen!" The Indian, mourning the departed brave, exclaims: "He fell like the tall oak of the forest." These expressions, taken from widely different sources, serve to show that when some men depart, the shock is far greater than when other men go to their long home. To-day we hear the ringing of the armor and the crashing of the oak because a great man, a prince, has fallen in Israel. The work given to most of us is, from one point of view, so ordinary, so commonplace, so like what others are doing well, that when we die we may be greatly missed, but there is no doubt that the work will go on just as well, that the banner will be picked up from the very spot where we drop it and be carried on as though nothing had happened.

But in some cases the work appointed is so peculiar, so special in its nature, and so delicate, so important and far reaching in its results, involving so many interests where mistakes would work ruin—in some cases the work is performed with such consummate skill that when we die men say: "Where shall we look for another? How can the work go on? Help, Lord, for the faithful fail from among the children of men!"

The Rev. Benjamin Griffith, D. D., because of whose death on Tuesday last we pause this morning in our daily task, was such a faithful worker, and his work was of the kind to call for special sorrow now that he is no more on earth. Born in Juniata county of this state, on October 13, 1821, he entered Madison (now Colgate) University in 1840, and was graduated in 1846. Sent out by the Missionary Society, he was ordained to the ministry at Cumberland, Md., where he organized a Church, built a meeting-house and remained four years. He began at the bottom, was not afraid of hard work and was never compelled to climb downward, as is the case with some who proudly begin at the top. From 1850 to 1858 he was pastor of a Church which has since grown to be the Fourth Baptist Church in Philadelphia—then an interest by no means great and inviting. During this period he married Miss Elizabeth Crozer, the daughter of Mr. J. P. Crozer, thus connecting himself with that family whose wealth and influence have always been at the service of the Baptist cause. In 1858 he became, and he has remained ever since, the corresponding secretary and business manager of the American Baptist Publication Society, in which he found his life work. The National Baptist expresses the opinion of all when it says: "It is hardly too much to say that for the last 35 years the history of the society has been the history of his life." When we remember what a large place the society has filled in the development of our denomination—that it sends out 67,000 copies of the Scriptures annually, has aided over 6,000 Sunday schools with books, has distributed over 1,000,000 religious books and over 40,000,000 pages of tracts, that it has organized 9,500 Sunday schools and supplied many pastors and missionaries with all their intellectual food, has established 1,000 Churches and helped very effectively to unify our sadly diversified denomination — when we remember all this and then know that the society's history is the history of Benjamin Griffith, we can begin to see why we are here with the dirge upon our lips and why it does seem that a pillar of our denominational edifice has fallen down. Contrast the narrow and dingy rooms on Arch street, which served for the society's headquarters, with the magnificent edifice on Chestnut street, familiarly known as 1420—an honor to the city as well as the denomination, in the building of which he was the leader—and you have some conception of the change wrought in the internal affairs of the society by the man whose face we shall see no more in this place. Since 1858 he has been the editor of the Young Reaper, that paper we have so often carried home from Sunday school in childish glee, whose founder, Dr. Shadrach, was for many years the staunchest friend this University ever had. From its foundation he has served as trustee of the Crozer Theological Seminary. As far back as 1854 he was elected Curator of the University at Lewisburg, and since 1882 has served on the Board of Trustees of Bucknell University. His has been a familiar face at almost every commencement, and none who heard his speeches here will fail to remember how he inspired all with his high hope and how he infused new determination into us through the contagion of his buoyant spirit. However dark the skies were to some, they were bright to him; however difficult it might be for others to plan, he was able to suggest a remedy that could be applied with good results—and there are those of us who cannot forget his kind words of appreciation spoken, from time to time, out of a heart that was never given to fulsome flattery. When, in 1864, this University bestowed upon him the degree of Doctor of Divinity he had long passed the point where a degree would stand for anything else than the crowning of deeds that were worthy.

But these were not the only directions in which his energy ran—these that make his loss especially great to us. He was interested in missions, in the Pennsylvania Baptist Education Society, of which he was one of the managers, helping many who now hear me and many who have long since distinguished themselves in the Lord's cause; in the Baptist Orphanage, where he had on Sundays for a long time taught the children and for whose support he plead in the last public address of his life before a great gathering of Baptists the other day in Philadelphia. He redeemed the time because the days were evil, and he was anxious to do his part in dispelling the night of ignorance and sin that has settled upon humanity—he would contribute not one whit of darkness to make the gloom still deeper; he would open the door that sunshine with healing in its wings might enter.

Now, why is it that men are so sad because Dr. Griffith has gone the way of all flesh, and why do they ask: "Who will take his place?" Because, after all the influence of Christianity these many years, the qualities for which he was distinguished are still very rare, and the world can hardly afford to bury them in the grave.

First of all, he was devoted to his work, as every man must be who does not want, at some time, to be ashamed of what he has done. He was not a slave, working because he was compelled to—from all that degradation he had been happily relieved; he was not an hireling, working for mere wages and taking his pay only in the dollars he received—men have told me that had he devoted himself to mere money-making his ability in that direction would have made him very rich; he chose to spread by the printed paper, tract and book the good news of the Gospel, and in so doing he found "his exceeding great reward." But he could not have been so devoted to his work unless he had believed in it—believed that it was his duty to herald the news of salvation, believed that the "old story" would bring the rebellious son back in tears to his Father's house, from which he ought never to have gone. And he was not only devoted to his work, which was that of holding up Jesus to the world, but, as you see, his was a devotion to the very highest ideal which he early in life sought for. He would have had no sympathy with the notion sometimes expressed: "Oh! it doesn't make much difference on what your devotion is expended, only so you're devoted." He said by his life: "Covet the best gifts," and "Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ." He lifted his eyes to the stars and kept on marching thither.

And in the second place, he was thoroughly furnished, both by nature and application, for that work to which he was devoted. He directed the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars—for though he was engaged in the Lord's business, yet it was business all the same. He must know what to do and what to leave undone, when to publish and what, and whether to reject—in short, he must conduct a successful business enterprise and yet do it without catering to the baser desires of purchasers, as many publishers do; he must do it all as under his great Task-Master's eye. And so it was necessary that he should possess—and he did possess them in large degree—great common-sense that refused to let him run after every will o'-the-wisp mistaken for Heaven's lamp; abundance of tact, that subtle power which enables one to bring things to pass just at the right moment and forbids him ever to say the right thing at the wrong time; and a persuasive eloquence that, never exerted to make the worse appear the better reason, was able to unite opposing forces and bring them with exultant step under the one banner of the Lord Jesus.

It is impossible to bury such a man as this, for, though his body be laid at rest, he lives on in a kind of double immortality—here through the influence he exerts, and there among the just now made perfect. Time cannot kill his influence, for God guides and amplifies it; and though, as the days go on, bringing other men and other forces to the front, he may seem no longer active upon the earth, yet so large was the place he filled and so many the streams of influence flowing from it everywhere, that he will really live on here—a perpetual benediction—though more or less out of our sight; and looking at that stage on which he played his part, between which and us the curtain has now been dropped, we can exclaim with one of our own poets:

"He nothing common did, or mean,
Upon that memorable scene."

THE FUTURE OF AFRICA.

A huge continent, washed by the same waters that bathe our eastern shores, shone upon by the same sun that lightens our fair country, a land luxuriant in vegetation, rich in resource, ample in climate—such is Africa, toward which the eyes of the civilized world are now turning with intense interest. This great wilderness has lain long unnoticed ; but a prophecy of her brilliant future is seen in the fact that now, when the public mind is most capable of utilizing and controlling forces for the highest good of mankind, a mighty hand lifts the misty mantle from Africa and reveals untold riches beneath.

The growth and development of so vast a continent cannot fail to affect the trend of human thought and lend impulse to the evolution of science. At first, the important commerce is the only interest that tempts a great nation to prize and preserve a claim in a barbarous country. England and Germany, in East Africa, France in Comoro and Madagascar, Belgium in the Congo State,—all see such interests worthy of their protection. In the immense quantities of ivory, India rubber, gums, fibers and every tropical and sub tropical fruit in the richest profusion, they see wonderful possibilities for that country when penetrated by railroads and brought under the influences of civilization.

Germany seeing this is now surveying for two railroads in her African province. Following closely upon the locomotive must come education for the African race, and the destruction of the slave trade.

For ages Africa was infested with plundering bands of Greeks, Romans, Arabs, Moors and Turks, some of them penetrating far into the interior to seize slaves. Yet with all these raging fires of barbarism Africa and the African have not been consumed.

But what of the future of the African race? Is not the African capable of rising to take his place among the foremost races of men? Let us see what Europe was at the beginning of our era, with christianity in its infancy. There we find polygamy, slavery, terrible savagery, often worse than anything seen in Africa. "Christianity was introduced in no feeble and halting spirit, and notwithstanding the many corruptions of the church of those days, the change wrought has been most marvelous. It is from the naked savages of Albion and Germania that have sprung such names as Newton and Shakespeare, Handel and Goethe."

Christianity is no longer in its infancy. Civilization is no longer weak, and these strong arms exerted in behalf of Africa certainly will exterminate barbarism and crime and establish instead truth and righteousness. We will not witness again the tragic tale of America and the Red man, in Africa and her dusky race. The world is learning a better way than extermination.

The nations have had all the past from which to learn how to treat this tardy daughter of civilization so that she may become the fairest offspring of liberty. We look, then, toward this far off land with bright hope. We see over-crowded cities relieved of their congested state and the flood of immigration pouring into Africa ; capital and labor happily combined, felling the forests, bridging the streams, building cities ; we see Progress, her great wheels turning with unvarying precision, unimpeded by past errors; we see, most of all, the light of the Gospel of Peace dispelling the dark shadows of superstition, just as the bright star in the east foretold to the wise men a Savior.

Upon the treatment of Africa by civilized nations, hang the destinies of two hundred millions of human beings. The world of Africa is in our hands, as clay in the hands of a potter. We may mould it into a vessel fit for the Master's use, or into a vessel of dishonor. Hope peers anxiously into the future to read the fate of this fair land, and as she looks, Lo! the sunlight breaks through the clouds of ignorance that have so long overhung. She looks again – and Africa's sky is clear.

SCHEDULE OF FOOTBALL GAMES.

Swarthmore, at Swarthmore, Nov. 1.
Haverford, at Haverford, Nov. 3.
State College, at Lewisburg, Nov. 11.
Dickinson, at Harrisburg, (Thanksgiving), Nov. 30.

Smith's drop kick in the Gettysburg game was something fine.

The financial success of games at Lewisburg depends largely on the support of the students.

For students to see a game without paying admission is dishonorable for them and discouraging to the management.

A scrub team, composed mostly of "Cads," went to Williamsport, Oct. 14, and were defeated 6 to 4. The Bucknell boys outplayed Williamsport, but a few tricky plays gave the latter the lead.

Football is certainly gaining popularity among the students, as is manifested by the number who practice on the field every evening. The line of the first team is improving wonderfully, and the backs are developing quickness and snap in their play. One evening there were thirty-two men out for practice. Keep it up.

The Academy team still continues to win with good scores. They played Bloomsburg Normal, at Bloomsburg, Saturday, Oct. 28, and defeated them 32 to 6. The game was alive with good plays. Barclay and Marsh distinguished themselves by 30 and 40 yard runs around the ends for touch-downs. The "Cads" outplayed Bloomsburg, although Bloomsburg at times played fast and hard. The first touch down, by Marsh, was made in five minutes. Bloomsburg used the "flying V," but did not gain much by it. The Academy boys are to be complimented on the game they put up. They were treated finely by the boys at the Normal. Riggin umpired.

Bucknell 2d 6, Williamsport 0. The second team won their first game at Williamsport on Saturday, Oct. 28, according to the score given. Bucknell made twenty-five yards on their first V, and after a little hard playing Harris broke through the line and made a touch down. The ball changed hands frequently during the rest of the game, neither side scoring. Hollinshead made fine openings at center whenever Captain Jackson wished the ball to go through at that point. The teams lined up as follows:

BUCKNELL 2D.	POSITIONS.	WILLIAMSPORT.
Smith	left end	Thomson
Wilson	left tackle	I. Sanford
Jennings	center	Armstrong
Collins	right guard	Willman
Rohland	right tackle	Smith
Firth	right end	Dean
Harris	quarter-back	C. Young
Carey	left half	W. Young
Bunnell	right half	E. Sanford
Jackson, Capt.	full-back	Crocker

Bucknell 23, Gettysburg 0. Our first game with Gettysburg resulted in a victory represented by the above figures. The game was one of good individual plays and team work on both sides. Bucknell's interference was excellent, and was intermingled with good plays by H. F. Smith, Kaufmann, Wolfe, Mount and Barclay. The ball started in Bucknell's possession, and in two minutes Barclay made a touch-down. The remainder of the first half consisted of well balanced play on both sides, with the ball changing hands many times. When time was called it was within ten yards of Gettysburg's goal. In the second half Wolfe made the first touch down, and Mount the second. When time was about to be called in the second half, and Bucknell was within fifteen yards of Gettysburg's goal, Smith kicked a goal from the thirty-yard line. Aukerman and Moser played well for Gettysburg. The teams lined up as follows:

BUCKNELL.	POSITIONS.	GETTYSBURG.
Smith, Burns	center	Rank
Lesher	right guard	Nicholas
Schub	right tackle	Trimmer
Mount	right end	Landen
Smith, H. F., Capt.	quarter back	Apple
Marsh	left half	Capt. Aukerman
Barclay	right half	Keefer
Megargee (Bunnell)	full back	Mottern

Hollinshead frequently occupies the pulpit of the Rush Baptist church, Snydertown.

Jackson has covered himself with glory;—he is at present wearing his arm in a sling.

Several whist and euchre clubs have been organized to while away the study hours.

Mr. X. Y. Z. Sinton has opened a barber shop and toilet room in the west wing. He shaves according to your capillarity.

Sheddan has been unanimously elected a member of '95. Several more are in prospectu.

Prof. Martin is seriously hampered in his work by the scarcity of books in the Alumni alcove.

T. S. Fretz preaches at Winfield. His Friday night lectures on "Marriage" are well received.

Barnar and Stephens go to Chillisquaque every Sunday. Their efforts at the mission are rewarded by large attendances.

The Lock Haven Baptists had Dr. Harris with them on the 29th. The Doctor noticed many substantial improvements in their church.

R. J. Davis is suffering from an abscess on his upper lip. A. H. Wynkoop preached last Sunday at Sunbury in the place of Mr. Davis.

Riemer was called home on the 20th to attend the funeral of his father. His student friends have expressed their sympathy by suitable resolutions.

The collateral reading and reporting system used by the foremost educators is gaining a strong following in Bucknell. It is a relief from the old text-book "grind."

The literary societies are doing good work this term. By varying the programs and by introducing new features occasionally, more interest is incited in the work.

Is the class of '97 in a state of "innocuous desuetude?" That class spirit which does as much as anything to make a man love his Alma Mater, seems to be lacking.

Last Saturday and Sunday the Y. P. S. C. E. convention of Union county, was held in the Baptist church. Several of the University students were on the program.

His speech is slow and dismal,
And Methodist his face;
He's been to see a Sem. girl,
Who set too hard a pace.

The annual elections of '95 resulted in the choice of Pease, president; Brick, vice president; Loomis, secretary; J. Carey, treasurer; Jackson, historian; Allen, poet.

Ezra Allen and B. Ware held missionary meetings at Bloomsburg Normal on the 29th. They are endeavoring to awaken an interest in the Student Volunteer movement.

Several members of the second football team attended a meeting of the Gamma Epsilon literary society of Dickinson Seminary. They returned with a determination to make the college societies equal to those of Prepdom.

Considerable interest is manifested by the students in the Chemical and Physical society. F. M. Simpson favored the members at the last meeting with a talk on diamonds.

Bromley Smith reported for the Scranton Republican while at the Y. M. C. A. convention. He played "tackle" for the Wilkes Barre athletic club against a heavy team from Bethlehem.

The Y. M. C. A. convention at Wilkes-Barre was well attended by our members. All the delegates report a profitable session and no one seems to be able to praise Robert E. Speer too highly.

The Sunday school classes are arranged as follows: Prof. Perrine, Seniors and Juniors; Prof. Phillips, Sophomores; Prof. Bartol, Freshmen; Prof. Hamblin, mixed class in Greek Testament.

The second Sunday in November and the week following, has been set aside as a time for general thanksgiving to God and to pray for the continuance of His blessings on the Young Men's Christian Associations of North America.

Rev. E. B. Palmer, D. D., of Philadelphia, has presented the following books to the college library: British India, Burke, (nine volumes,) Presbyterian Review, God in Human Thought, (two volumes,) the Geography of the Sea, and two old and very valuable volumes of Priestley.

Dr. Avignet announces that, authorized by Dr. Harris, he will give an advanced course in French pronunciation and French elocution, followed by the changes introduced by the French Academy in Orthography. The course will begin on Saturday, November 11, in the Laboratory at 11 o'clock, a. m.

The following books have been purchased for Prof. Catterall's department: Eliot's Debates, Schouler's History of United States, Von Holtz, (four volumes,) Curtis' Constitutional History, Stanwood's History of Presidential Elections, Fiske's Critical Period, and Documents Illustrating American History.

Did you hear how near Firth came losing his overcoat? Saturday evening while coming down from Williamsport he placed his overcoat on the back of one of the car seats. As the hour was late, one of the fair occupants of the car fell asleep, using the overcoat as a pillow. As the train drew nearer Lewisburg, Firth began to feel uneasy for his property. Of course his sense of chivalry would not permit him to disturb the fair sleeper. Fortunately Lewisburg was the young lady's destination and she awoke as the train pulled up to the station ; otherwise—

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

A chocolataire will be given by the Senior class, in the Institute parlors, on Nov. 10.

The lecture, "College Days of Daniel Webster," by Dr. Enoch Perrine, was thoroughly enjoyed by the Institute.

The president of the Y. W. C. A., Miss Jennie Davis, was sent as a delegate to a convention held in Lancaster recently.

A number of last year's students manifest their interest in Bucknell's doings by sending in their subscriptions to the MIRROR.

An enthusiastic member of the psychology class on being asked her age, replied "My soul has affirmed to itself the fact of having existed through eighteen revolutions of this terraqueous globe around the sun."

Considerable money has been expended in the last two years in refurnishing the gymnasium. Parallel bars, Indian clubs, and chest weights have been ordered for class use. The interest in calisthenics this term has increased greatly.

A delightful outing was given by the Phi Kappa Psi boys to their friends on Saturday, Oct. 28. After a drive of round-about ways and many miles Blue Hill was reached. The sound of a dinner bell was not needed to suggest lunch time, and sardines, olives, fried chicken, and cherries, were discussed with unchilled enthusiasm. After dinner the pavilion afforded shelter from the—yes, from the sun, for there was not much rain. The sky cleared for a lovely moonlight drive back to town.

ALUMNÆ NOTES.

Miss Katharine Baker, class of '92, has entered the Woman's College, Baltimore.

The late Mrs. Ella Quimby Weeks, of '64, left a collection of beautiful poems, which have been published in book form.

Miss Williams, '93's rising poet, has classes in German and English literature at her home in Peckville.

Mrs. I. H. O'Harra, '83, has returned with her husband from an extended tour in the Adirondack mountains.

Miss F. May Showers, '85, has accepted the position of teacher of music in Richmond College, Richmond, O. She is meeting with great success.

Misses Margaret Thomson and Sarah Johnson, class of '92, are engaged in teaching, the former at Clearfield, Pa., and the latter at Lumberton, North Carolina.

Mrs. S. D. Bates and Mrs. J. C. Bucher, '28; Mrs. M. B. Wilson, '60; Mrs. W. E. Martin, '62; Mrs. V. B. Hyers, '65; Mrs. E. B. Williams, '66; Mrs. E. B. Matlack, '69, and Mrs. Alice J. Chambers, '74, still evince their loyalty to their alma mater by each sending a daughter to the Institute.

The class of '78 is fortunate in having two members who have achieved literary fame. The daily productions of Miss Cara G. Reese, in the Pittsburg Commercial-Gazette, are attractive features of that paper. We note in the September number of Worthington's Magazine, of Hartford, a pleasing poem by Mrs. Dora E. W. Spratt; and in a late number of the Household a very excellent article on "Extinct Birds," by the same author.

ACADEMIC NEWS.

[S. J. CLEELAND, Correspondent.]

Manager Purdy would like to see the Cad's football men at practice every day.

The fellows who subscribed to the Cad football team should not be bashful about paying.

The Third form has elected for officers, viz : President, Harvey; vice president, Elliott; secretary, Warren; treasurer, Cleeland.

Teacher, in English class—"Why is the sentence 'There ain't any apples on the tree,' incorrect?" J——b.—"Because there ain't no such a word as ain't in the English language."

Mr. Wrag did not return with the Y. M. C. A. delegates from Wilkes-Barre. The boys were afraid he had fallen down the shaft of a coal mine or got lost. Their fears were dispelled, however, by a letter telling of his whereabouts, and that he was in good hands.

The Adelphia literary society has elected Mr. Bayard as president, Mr. Anderson's resignation having been accepted. Mr. Wrag was also elected to fill the office of vice president, made vacant by Mr. Flint's absence.

The delegates at the Y. M. C. A. convention, held in Wilkes-Barre, were: Messrs. Dutton, Harvey, Warren, Kulp, Meeker, Bayard, Mitchell, Sherman, Wrag and Cleeland. These delegates represented the Y. M. C. A. of the Academy.

Mr. Charles Meeker was called home very unexpectedly, a short time ago, to shoulder part of his parents' burdens. We admire the willing and loving spirit, shown by Mr. Meeker, in being so ready to give up his school work so that he might help the old folks at home. Mr. Meeker expects to return to his school duties next term.

Of all the conventions, the Y. M. C. A. convention held at Wilkes-Barre recently was the best. Over 400 delegates, from all parts of the State, gathered there to tell of the work done during the past year in their several associations, and to be instructed in the Y. M. C. A. work. Wilkes-Barre's beautiful and spacious Y. M. C. A. hall was open day and night for the entertainment of the delegates. The Cad boys who were there will never forget the many blessings received from those who talked to them, and showed them how to do more effective work for the Master.

Should Academic students play football? If college and university men can play this game with propriety and good results, certainly the younger student should receive a similar reward for indulging in it. Football develops the physical body. It is eminently a muscular game. Physical exercise is just as essential during our earlier course of mental training as during our later years. By Academic students the game is not so hard fought and less accidents result. By football the student secures a corresponding development of all the muscles of the body. This game develops perfect control of the varied movements of the body and secures quickness of action. These results would be obtained to greater perfection if development should begin before our bodies are matured. Football develops the powers of endurance. If the student, during his preparatory course should harden his muscles and develop the powers of endurance, he would be able to withstand the mental strain caused by hard study without injuring his health. Football develops courage more than any other fall sport. Fearlessness is best cultivated during our younger years, before our characters become fixed and our habits formed.

'83. Rev. S. B. Meeser has resigned from his charge in Paterson, N. J., and has accepted a call to the Second Baptist church, Wilmington, Del.

'84. Franklin Pierce Lynch is at present located at Mukimuika, Congo Loando, Southwest Africa, where he has charge of the sanitarium and hospital of the American Baptist Union.

'85. S. Z. Batten has been called from his pastorate at Manayunk, Pa., to New York city.

'86. Prof. W. W. Kelchner has been elected superintendent of the First Williamsport Baptist Sunday school.

'86. L. S. Walter, Esq., of Mt. Carmel, owing to his increasing law practice, is contemplating moving to Sunbury, the county seat.

'87. Howard L. Calder, Esq., of Harrisburg, has formed a co-partnership in law with A. Wilson Norris, of that city.

'88. J. P. Pontius, M. D., is specializing on diseases of the eye and ear. He is located at 1204 Chicago street, Memorial building, Chicago.

'89. Frank B. Hargrave has removed from Greensburg to Latrobe, Pa.

Ex. '90. T. J. Purdy is reading law at Sunbury, Pa.

'91. H. W. D. Kirkendall was recently ordained to the ministry. He occupies the pastorate in Indiana county left vacant by Robert B. Dunmire, '91, who has entered Crozer Seminary.

'91. Paul Tustin is attending Moody's Bible Institute, Chicago.

'92. Elkanah Hulley is professor of Greek in Keystone Academy, Factoryville, Pa.

'92. Warren L. Kauffman has a position as teacher in the Normal school at Stroudsburg, Pa.

'92. John U. Wagner is principal of one of Scranton's high schools.

'93. A. F. Gardner occupies the Latin professorship in Peddie Institute.

'93. J. B. Cressinger, C. A Gundy, and W. C. Weber are studying medicine at the University of Pennsylvania. They all entered the second year class on their diploma from Bucknell. This speaks well for B. U.'s laboratory work.

Editorial.

WE are called upon to chronicle the death of our distinguished alumnus, Chauncey B. Ripley, LL. D., '64. Mr. Ripley for years was the staunch friend of THE MIRROR, helping the managers most effectively to place it upon a sound, financial basis, and from time to time contributing to its columns. In thus practically assisting us he showed himself a true friend of the Bucknell students, who will ever remember him with the most tender regard.

THE game of the season is over and the victory belongs to State College. Beyond the loss of the game, which was expected, we have little to regret. Our team acquitted itself nobly. Nor is it possible to say this or that one played the best game; nearly every one specially distinguished himself and no one shirked his duty. The unfortunate injury to Schub in the first rush necessarily weakened our team, but despite this they did excellent work.

There has been much said about "mean playing." In our opinion the game put up by both teams was about as fair as football usually is, while the interference of the crowd on the campus and, especially, on the streets was, to say the least, disgraceful. We commend our students, however, in taking no part in such proceedings except to protect our visitors.

WE are now in the midst of reviews in our different branches of study, the busiest time of all the term. Reviews may be of use in two ways. We may crowd our minds with all the minutia of the subject in hand, retaining by any and every device of memory all the headings, points and sub-points given in the text-book, holding all in readiness to flow out upon the examination paper, a mass of undigested material, discharged from the mind completely as an irritant. Or during this period we may relate and subordinate the various parts, giving prominence to the essentials and reducing accidentals to their proper subordinate positions, in other words gaining a proper perspective view of the subject in the correllation of its parts and its relation to other branches of knowledge.

It is easy to decide which method will give the more lasting mental acquisition, and discipline of greater value.

WE are living in an age of rapid transit, an age of hurry. We have scarcely time to live or to die. This restless, eager spirit is found in our schools as elsewhere. We have no time for the beauties of Homer or the finely turned sentiments of Horace, but must on to the practical, scientific studies. We want the greatest possible knowledge in the shortest time. This haste to know, causes some of us to be so busied with our studies that we have little time for anything else. Ability to do work is doubtless gained, but much of the culture to be derived from a college course is lost. Not only is leisure for study essential, but leisure for thought, for its elaboration, for its interchange and for social intercourse, is equally essential to the highest culture.

In our race after the practical we are too apt to consider the grosser material elements alone, neglecting the purer, more ethereal and enduring elements which constitute the truest culture.

THE time was when writing of Latin verse was one of the requirements of a college course, and some creditable stanzas were produced. Many a poet and novelist of renown began his work during his college course. Has Bucknell no embryo writer of fiction or poetry? If she has, we would gladly assist them to appear before the public by giving their best productions a place in the college journal. Further, is the literary spirit, which is supposed to pervade a literary college, extinct? If we may judge from the general feeling towards essays and orations at Bucknell, we must say that literary spirit is on a decline.

Many of our prominent, scientific schools are noteworthy for the lack of literary spirit. So much is this the case that professors in scientific departments complain of the general inability of students to write a thesis or make a report of work done. It is a common experience that interest in scientific work is accompanied by lack of interest in literary effort. There is no inherent antagonism between scientific work and literary effort, unless it be the insatiable demands of scientific work upon the student's time. There is no natural antagonism between doing and telling. Many of our most prominent scientists have left productions which will live as literary works after their contents may have been superseded by the discoveries of succeeding generations.

Our haste after knowledge has much to do with the lack of literary spirit. In neglecting the culture of this part of college work, we neglect the most important part for most of us. Very few of us are likely to be discoverers of new truth. Most of our work will consist in presenting old truths, and our ability to make these presentations in forms of beauty and power, will constitute largely the measure of the success and endurance of our work.

IN MEMORIAM.

CHAUNCEY BOLIVAR RIPLEY, LL. D., BUCKNELL, '64.

The many friends of Chauncey B. Ripley, a prominent Alumnus of this University, were shocked to hear of his death, which took place Sunday, Nov. 12, in his room in the Hoffman House, New York city, where he was temporarily living.

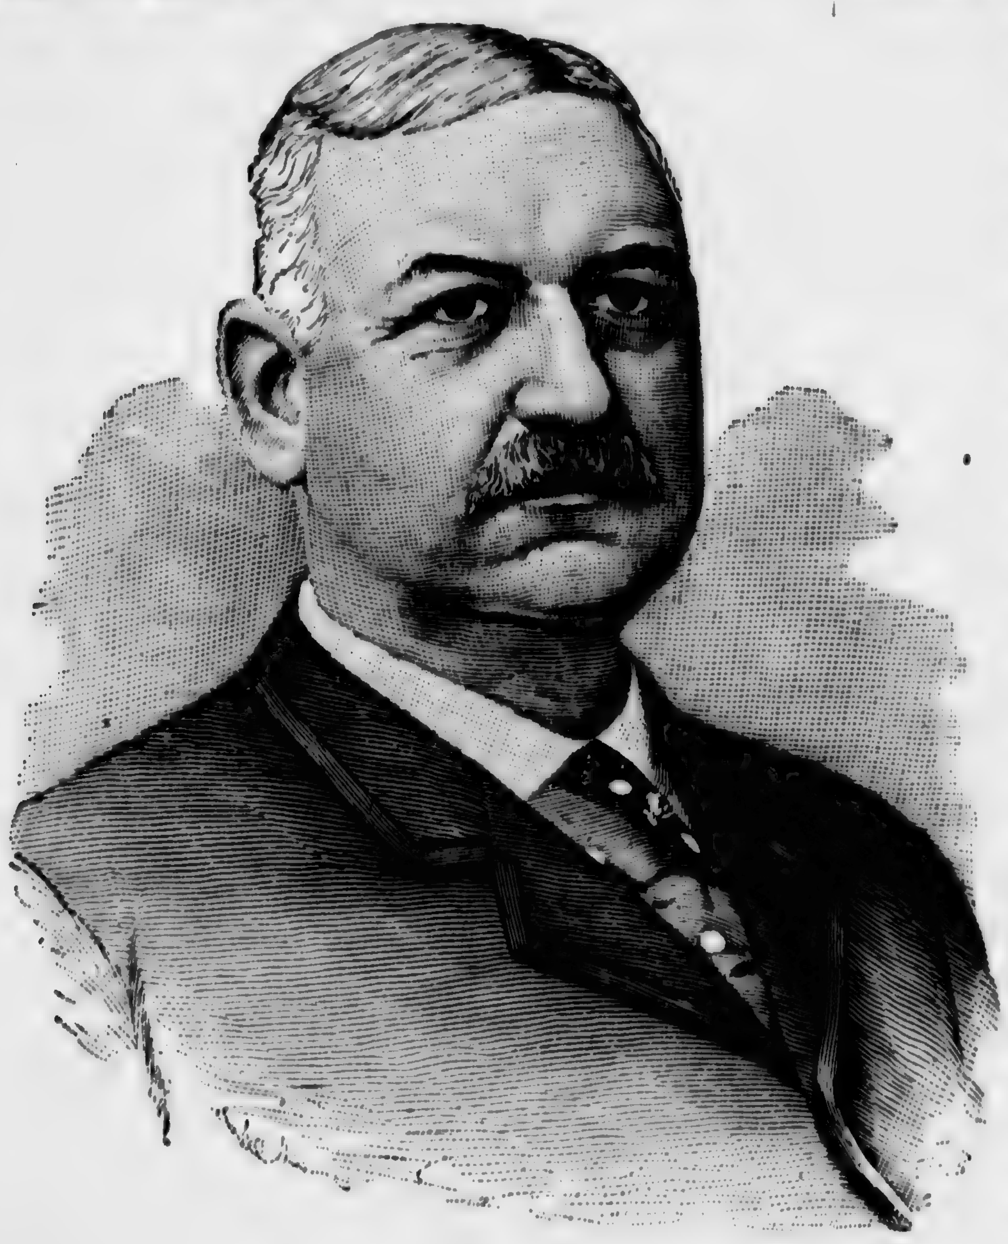
Dr. Ripley was found dead in bed, and a Coroner's jury, upon the opinion of several high medical authorities, found that the cause was cerebral apoplexy.

As an Alumnus of this institution he was one of the most loyal and enthusiastic of Alma Mater's sons. He frequently used his pen in her behalf, and wherever he could drop a word that might help the University he would do so. Dr. Ripley was a great friend of the Bucknell undergraduate body, and whenever appealed to would cheerfully respond, sometimes with a check for a neat sum to tide the MIRROR over a stormy financial sea, or again help to advance some form of athletics.

Dr. Ripley was greatly interested in the advancement of higher education, and it was through his influence that Bucknell secured access to the press of New York city; and through his efforts the institution received attention from prominent high class educational magazines.

Whilst in college here he was a member of the Sigma Chi fraternity, in which he became prominent as an authority on fraternity history and government. When President Cleveland was admitted to this organization last winter, Dr. Ripley was selected to conduct the initiatory ceremonies. He was deprived of this high honor, however, as he was taken seriously ill a few days before the ceremonies were to be performed. A faithful picture of Dr. Ripley hangs in the hall of Kappa chapter, and is the pride of every Bucknell Sigma Chi.

From time to time Dr. Ripley has contributed to the various publications of this University, and whenever the editors of Bucknell publications were short of "copy" an appeal to "Chauncey Ripley," as he was best known among the students, would always bring a prompt reply on some timely subject. Altogether Chauncey Ripley loved the boys at Bucknell, and they in turn loved him for the many courtesies they received at his hands; and now that he is gone there is a vacant place in the heart of every Bucknell man who knew him, either personally or through his great love for the college that bore him. His name will pass into Bucknell history as a shining example of a son's devotion and love for the college that gave him.



Yours Truly,
Chauncey B. Ripley.

SKETCH OF DR. RIPLEY'S LIFE.

Chauncey Bolivar Ripley was born in 1835, and received his earlier education in the Connecticut Literary Institution, where he afterward became a teacher. At different times he taught in Windsor Locks and East Granby, Hartford county, Conn., and later at Scotch Plains and Westfield, and became principal of an academy in Springfield, N. J. His first step toward a graduate's degree was taken in 1860, when he began preparatory studies under the Rev. James Fuller Brown, D. D., now of Mullica Hill, N. J. Then he entered the University of Rochester, N. Y., in the fall of the year, remaining there two years. About this time he occupied the chair of mathematics at Flushing, L. I., and in 1863 joined the senior class of Bucknell University. In 1864 he graduated as a Bachelor of Arts, with honor, taking his Master's degree in 1867. In 1864, after leaving Lewisburg, he began the study of law in the University of the City of New York, also entering the office of Benjamin Vaughn. In 1865 he took the degree of LL. B., and then for twenty-three years practiced law in the old Times building, moving in 1888 when the structure was demolished. He then went to the "Potter" building, where he remained until his death.

The trustees of Bucknell University conferred the degree of LL. D. on him in 1888. He was twice President of the New York Alumni Association of Bucknell University, and served several terms as President of the New York Alumni Association of the law department of the University of New York City. For more than twenty years the trustees of this University annually appointed him one of the committee for the examination of candidates for degrees in the law department and for scholarship prizes. He delivered the address in behalf of the Alumni at the inauguration of Dr. Howard Crosby, as Chancellor of the University, in 1870. In 1891 Rutger Female College bestowed on Dr. Ripley the distinguished title of Literary Doctor.

Dr. Ripley had a fine stock farm at Westfield, N. J., and was very much interested in road building and the development of that town. He was chairman of the Executive Committee of the National League for Improved Roads, of which Senator Manderson is President. Dr. Ripley also served as a Commissioner in the Roads department of the World's fair and was on the Executive Committee of the National League for the Improvement of Roads. On the roads and avenues of Westfield, N. J., where he was an extensive owner of property, he had spent about $100,000.

His wife died in 1883, and he leaves no family. His burial took place at Westfield, N. J., Tuesday afternoon, November 14, 1893.

ANTONIO'S MELANCHOLY.

When Antonio, in the "Merchant of Venice," says: "In sooth, I know not why I am so sad," he strikes a chord in every heart, for every one has experienced a similar feeling.

For, a man in Antonio's position, a wealthy merchant with valuable cargo at sea, unmarried, the natural causes for melancholy would be anxiety for his property—continual worry lest his ships be wrecked; as Salario expresses it, "Every object that might make him fear misfortune to his ventures would make him sad;" or he might be in love, in which case some petty quarrels or jealousies might have darkened the days for him. But he distinctly denies these causes, imputed by his friends; to the first answering that his whole estate is not ventured upon the fortune of this present year, concluding with the words, "Therefore, my merchandise makes me not sad." The latter reason he sets aside as utterly improbable, and we find nothing in the play to support such a view. He apparently contradicts himself in regard to his property when he says to Bassanio, "Thou know'st that all my fortunes are at sea; nor have I money nor commodity to raise a present sum;" and in the unfolding of the plot, Antonio does exhibit anxiety for the safety of his cargo. Yet we know it is from purely unselfish motives, and under circumstances entirely different from those at the beginning of the play.

So unless we find this melancholy explained by the character of the man himself, we, like Antonio, have still to learn

> "What stuff 'tis made of, whereof it is born."

If Antonio's character were to be estimated by that of his friends to whom we are first introduced, it might be somewhat depreciated. The conversation of Salarino and Salario, who appear first, protesting friendship for their wealthy companion, is rather common-place and indicates men of refinement, but of little reflection—men who take only a superficial view of the life about them, and are, perhaps, for that reason, satisfied with life as they find it. His friends are not coarse—that would be inconsistent—but being men of rather more than ordinary culture, Antonio's superiority to them almost isolates him from the society about him.

Antonio's answer to the jests of his friends concerning his melancholy, reveals much of his true character and relation to his associates:

> "I hold the world but as the world, Gratiano,
> A stage, where everyone must play a part,
> And mine a sad one."

His has been no passing glance, but he has judged the world with critical eyes, estimating pleasure at its true worth. No doubt he has fathomed the affection of his companions, and found how little real comfort is gained from ordinary friendship.

Yet Antonio does not avoid contact with men, hiding away in "moping melancholy;" a subtle sadness steals over him which he himself cannot analyze.

At this time, Antonio had no business demanding his constant attention which might have diverted his mind from its sad thoughts. He has only to wait for his ships, and anxiety at their delay but increases his melancholy. Perhaps the reason his melancholy became so noticeable just at this time of the play, is because before his cargo was shipped, he had that to keep his mind from sad reflections.

Antonio's business relations with such men as Shylock have not raised his estimate of men, and in these, too, he has judged with unerring keenness. He gives the result of his observations when he says:

> "Mark you this, Bassanio,
> The devil can cite scripture for his purpose.
> An evil soul producing holy witness
> Is like a villain with a smiling cheek;
> A goodly apple, rotten at the heart;
> O, what a goodly outside falsehood hath!"

And when he, wishing to believe the best possible of men, has again been persuaded by the Jew's pretended admiration, he learns still more thoroughly how a "man may smile, and smile, and be a villain."

When the trial comes and Antonio sees that his life is in danger, his attitude changes. He no longer passively bears a sad part in the drama of life, but awakes to action, even attempting to make the despised Jew relent. Yet the trial discloses no weak point in Antonio's character; something of vital importance was necessary to bring into prominence his strong manliness, and the trial does that. When Antonio realizes that nothing but his death will satisfy the Jew, he calmly says:

> "I do oppose
> My patience to his fury; and am arm'd
> To suffer with a quietness of spirit,
> The very tyranny and rage of his,"

knowing that half of Shylock's pleasure would be to hear the Christian beg the Jew for mercy.

Neither does Antonio utter one word of regret. He might have overwhelmed Bassanio with reproaches for bringing him into such peril, when pleasure was the only gain. But instead he says: "All debts are cleared between you and I, if I might but see you at my death;" and again: "Repent not that you shall lose your friend, and he repents not that he shall pay your debts."

Then Antonio's clemency, when the property and life of Shylock were in his power, shows another side to his character. That his hatred of the Jew was genuine can be easily seen—the antagonism between every philanthropic man and one who is successful at the sacrifice of others. Johnson said he loved a good hater; yet it is a mark of a "good hater" that he cannot injure an enemy whom circumstances have placed in his power. It is at variance with the nobility of his own nature to give back measure for measure, and although he may not forgive, he relents, judging that any injury received is as nothing compared with his own self-abasement, should he fight upon his enemy's level.

What cause, then, do these salient points in Antonio's character, give for his melancholy? They show a man of reflective nature, who has expected to find all mankind as generous and noble as himself. He has been disappointed in his friendships, seeing how much pecuniary considerations enter into them. He has been deceived, too, in man's honesty. Many a man who has prejudged the world and afterwards discovered how far short of his ideal it has fallen, has withdrawn entirely from intercourse with mankind. How much nobler, then, is Antonio, whose nature is no less sensitive, whose ideals have been equally shattered—how much nobler is he in bravely facing realities, and in endeavoring, so far as is in his power, to right the wrongs he finds in the society about him, and in exerting his influence, however small it may be, to bring the world up to his pre conceived standard.

Yet his mind, freed from business cares, takes retrospective glances and reviews the sad steps by which it reached its present condition. At such a time the play opens. This is proved, too, by the fact that at the time of the trial, when not his merchandise but his life itself is in peril, no trace of Antonio's melancholy appears, because his mind is intent on the present affairs and has no leisure to review the disappointments of the past. Pope says, "Remembrance and reflection how allied!" Especially true is this in Antonio's case; as soon as his mind is free to reflect, memories of the past in companionship with despair for the present and forebodings of an equally unsatisfying future, come to him—and then it is that he says, "In sooth, I know not why I am so sad."

THE POPULARITY OF LONGFELLOW.

(An Outline.)

INTRODUCTION:

A popular poet sometimes a mediocre one; this is not true in the case of Longfellow. J. W. Westlake in 1876 calls Longfellow "the most popular of living poets." E. P. Whipple in 1876 says: "Longfellow is probably the most popular poet of the country." E. C. Stedman writes: "In extent of popularity Longfellow is the central figure in American literature."

THEME:

To show Longfellow's popularity as seen in his writings.

DISCUSSION:

I. Mastery over rhyme and rhythm:
  A. Variety in verse:
    1. "Miniature epics."
      Evangeline,
      Hiawatha,
      The Courtship of Miles Standish, characterized by
          a. Purity of language.
          b. Clearness.
          c. Sweetness of imagery.
          d. Sympathetic story.
    2. Lyrics:
      To the River Charles,
      The Belfry of Bruges,
      The Bridge,
        characterized by
          a. Vividness of detail.
          b. Melody.
          c. Choice of epithet.
    3. Ballads:
      The Skeleton in Armor,

Paul Revere's Ride,
Saga of King Olaf,
The Wreck of the Hesperus, characterized by
a. Vivid detail.
b. Picturesqueness.
4. Sonnets :
Gioto's Tower,
Hymn to the Night,
Victor and Vanquished,
characterized by
a. Unity in themselves.
b. Regularity.
c. Delicate imagery.
d. "Song"
e. Sentiment.
5. Translations :
Dante's Divine Comedy,
characterized by
a. Preservation of style of original.
b. Preservation of sense of original.
c. Preservation of metre of original.
B. Variety in Versification :
1. Dactylic Hexameter :
The Courtship of Miles Standish,
Evangeline.
2. Trochaic Dimeter :
Hiawatha.
3. Iambic Dimeter :
Excelsior.
4. Iambic Pentameter :
God's Acre,
Hymn to the Night,
and others.
II. His characteristics in writing :
1. Clearness.
2. Simplicity.
3. Vivid Imagery.
4. Productiveness of Imagery :

"His thoughts were twin-born ; the thought itself, and its figurative semblance in the outer world. Thus through the quiet, still waters of his soul each image floated double, swan and shadow."

5. Regularity of metre.
6. Humor :

Scarcely noticed ; take this from Kavanagh, speaking of a servant as "being engaged to a travelling dentist, who, in filling her teeth with amalgam, had seized the opportunity to fill a soft place in her heart with something still more dangerous and mercurial."

And in the Courtship of Miles Standish, this :

"Archly the maiden smiled, and with eyes over-running with laughter,
Said in a tremulous voice : 'Why don't you speak for yourself, John?'"

7. Purity of language.
8. "Moral."

Stedman says : "The great characteristic of Longfellow is that of addressing the moral nature through the imagination, of linking moral truth to intellectual beauty." "Little sermons in rhyme."

9. Erudition
10. Pathos.
11. Naturalness.
12. Imaginative power.
III. Breadth of his sympathy, due to
a. Education.
b. Puritan element in nature.
c. Kind-heartedness.
d. Cultivated taste.
e. Life abroad.

CONCLUSION :

Longfellow not what we call an original poet. E. C. Stedman says : "His genius was not creative, but the fosterer of taste and ideality" The materials for his longer stories, either historical, or stories were given to him. A German critic says : "We shall look in vain for any special originality in Longfellow if we are not willing to perceive it in his fascinating depth of heart."—Tribute to Longfellow as a teacher of the people.

MARY BARTOL.

AD ASTRA PER ASPERA.

Along that ever-winding path,
That mystic journey of the soul
Into the Future, unknown—unseen,
That we, for want of better name, call life,
How often in the gloomy vale
Of deepest sorrow, we look up
And see above the everlasting hills
Unchangeable in mighty majesty.
"How can we, dare we, hope to scale
Those frowning battlements!" we sigh,
"But shall we sink and cease to breathe
In that dread valley of the pit
Where ray of sunlight never fell?"
When suddenly a clear voice rings,
Like music falling from the sky,
"Look up, for all is light above ;"
And echoes chime it through the startled air.
And lo! those mighty frowning peaks
With glorious sunlight are lit up,
And when in feebleness we strive to climb,
The path before us opens step by step,
And what at first seemed useless to attempt
Grows easier day by day.

SCHEDULE OF FOOTBALL GAMES.

Mansfield State Normal, at Mansfield, Nov. 25.

Dickinson, at Harrisburg, (Thanksgiving) November 30.

Riggin is playing football again.

Schub is confined to his room with a sprained ankle. He will be unable to play any more this season. It is thought that if Mr. Schub had not become injured we would have won the game of football with State College.

Dissatisfaction, arising among the members of the team on their return from Swarthmore and Haverford, resulted is the resignation of H. F. Smith as Captain and Manager. In his place Barclay was elected Captain and Portser, Manager.

Swarthmore 36—Bucknell 0. Another defeat is recorded to us by the above score. Swarthmore seemed to show, and indeed had, better training, and, by quick playing, made several fine runs around the ends for touch-downs. They also used the revolving V to advantage, and Bucknell's boys seemed unable to do anything with it. The result displeased the student body on account of sending away such a good team. Let Bucknell profit by this loss.

Bucknell 26—Haverford 0. This represents a victory from Haverford college, November 3, at Haverford Only 30-minute halves were played on account of the heat, and in that time Megargee, Marsh, Barclay and Mount had made five touch-downs and H. F. Smith had kicked three goals. H. F. Smith, Mount, Marsh, Barclay and Schub put up the game for Bucknell. Schub broke Haverford's V's in a fine manner, and the tandem work of H. F. Smith and Megargee through center counted for good gains. For Haverford, Alsop, Conklin, Thomas and Blanchard played the best game. The teams lined up as follows:

BUCKNELL.	POSITIONS.	HAVERFORD.
Smith, Burns	center	Goodman
Schub	right guard	Kirk
Lesher	right tackle	Morris
Mount	right end	Captain Strawbridge
Smith, H. F., Capt.	quarter back	S. Thomas
Bunnell	left half	Blanchard
Marsh	right half	A. C. Thomas
Barclay	full back	Hamlin

State College 36—Bucknell 18. The game between State College and Bucknell, on November 11 at 2:30 p. m., was one of the most exciting that has been played on the campus for a long time, owing to the rivalry between these two colleges. Bucknell's team was materially weakened after the Swarthmore game, and, with only two days' practice, met their rivals nobly. State College came here with the intention of not letting us score, but had we played as well in the first as in the second we would have won the game. Schub was injured in the first rush, which materially weakened the team at this point, but Collins filled his place well. Jennings' first game at centre was just as good as his opponent's, and he played a fine game. All of the team are to be complimented on the game they put up, and Bucknell is just as proud of her team as if they had won.

The features of the first half were Haley's plunges through center, and in the second Barclay's brilliant runs and Wolfe's run of 60 yards around the end. Haley's action was so rough at times that the crowd rushed upon the field to take him off. Touch-downs for State were Atherton, Haley 2, Fisher, Harris, Stewart and Dowler; goals, Atherton 3. For Bucknell, Barclay 3; goals, H. F. Smith 3. Young, Bucknell's full-back, distinguished himself with honor and offered valuable assistance in coaching in the two days' practice before the game. Whenever he bucked center he always made good gains. The teams lined up as follows:

STATE.	POSITIONS.	BUCKNELL.
Harris	left end	Wolfe
Dunsmore, J. A	left tackle	Kaufmann
Fisher	left guard	Hollinshead
Hoskins	center	Jennings
Dowler	right guard	Lesher
Dunsmore, W	right tackle	Collins, Schub
White	right end	Mount
McCaskey	quarter-back	H. F. Smith
Haley	right half	Megargee
Stewart	full-back	Young

Referee—J. M. Wolfe, State.

Umpire—C. H. Bernheisel, Cornell.

Ten members of the Chess club have entered the tournament for this term. Each is to play fifteen games, and not more than two with each individual. A tournament in checkers has also been arranged, and four so far have entered. Let all, who can, join these tournaments.

FOOTBALL ETHICS AND STATE COLLEGE.

November 13, 1893.

EDITOR OF THE MIRROR:

Dear Sir—Apropos of the recent State College game, a few words on football may not be out of place.

The treatment of State's team by the "muckers" of the town, and a few brainless "muckers" of the college was most regretable. It is my purpose to examine the grounds advanced for that treatment. It is claimed that State played a dirty game, and did considerable slugging, and that consequently the crowd had a right to mob them. I admit the slugging, question the dirty playing; and, in any case, the inference is totally indefensible.

As to dirty play, I can bear witness to this fact: State College has always played a rough, hard game, and, as football goes, a fair one. As to slugging, football ethics are in a very sad state indeed, simply because we all approve of it when we do it, and disapprove of it when our opponents do it. It makes a mighty difference whose ox is gored. The same statement will apply to every college in the country. I will bring a few instances in evidence of this. The following rules are said to be posted up in the Bowdoin football quarters:

"Never line up without kicking somebody's shins."

"Never get out of a scrimmage, if possible, without giving a man a black eye."

"When you down your man, fall on him; remember, the more you use him up, the sooner you'll get the ball."

"In slugging, strike quick and hard with the bare knuckles; never mind the referee; keep your eyes on your man."

A recent letter from a friend, one of the best football players on the field, gives this advice: "Tell the guards not to be afraid to take hold of their opponents. It is a foul, of course, but they will never be caught. They will probably get slugged for it, but that don't matter." I made this happy suggestion, and I have heard it more than once heartily approved as being conducive to good football. Another notable football player assured our team that the way to play ball is to do your best to "knock your man out the first rush." One of the State College men said to me after the game that "a player of ours fouled more than half the time," and then added, "but that is the way to play football." The latest and best authority on the game is a little work by Messrs. Stagg and Williams. Everyone knows Stagg. He is a perfect gentleman, a model of kindness, and an earnest Christian. In this little book one of the authors says, "The methods usually employed in getting through the line are striking the opponent in the chest quickly and hard, and following it up with a shove to one side when he is off his balance," i. e., the first method recommended is slugging, "quickly and hard."

And now I will simply ask anyone who has ever listened to college men talking with admiration of their team's slugging ability, if slugging is not recognized as part of the game, at least if we do it? and not only by the boys themselves. For instance, a very kind and well disposed gentleman, who is not a student, condemned the hard and rough play of State College in the warmest terms. A moment later I asked, "But did you see how X— did up his man? Dropped the ball once and caught him right in the eye." A smile broke over my friend's features, developing into a pleased laugh, which said as plain as words, "Ah, but that was fine." Another instance, a State College man, cursing our crowd, stopped on a remark made to him about one of their players, and said, with a show of pride and satisfaction, "Why that man is the worst slugger on the team. He was knocked senseless at the University of Virginia."

I say, then, that fouling and slugging are recognized elements of the game, and generally commended when we do the fouling and slugging. I go further and declare that slugging is sometimes excusable. A case in point happened in the State College game: Haley was tackled but not thrown. He called "down." Now, according to the rules, he could not be further interfered with. But no football player would allow a man to stand and yell "down." That is not football. A man with the slightest knowledge of the game knows that touch-downs are not infrequently made after the runner has called "down." He must be thrown, then. But no one has a right to touch him, and, moreover, it is decidedly unpleasant to be thrown on your neck when you are doing nothing. A man with a spark of self-respect is bound to resent such treatment. This was Mr. Haley's case; he struck, and was justified in doing so. Slugging is inevitable, too, where there is holding in the line; but holding is "good football."

I come to these conclusions: Under the present conditions of the game slugging is inevitable; it is approved of by the only public opinion which might be efficient in stopping it, viz.: the public opinion of a man's own college. But slugging by anyone else is highly reprehensible. Now so long as these ethics prevail honest football is impossible, and the feeling between colleges is bound to be intolerably bad. I conclude, too, that slugging is sometimes excusable, and we must recognize that fact. Finally, the crowd must not be permitted to interfere. There is an umpire to look after fouls. The crowd is perfectly irresponsible and can never tell the rights of the matter because it is governed by a blinding bias. The crowd of last Saturday acted like madmen; our respected "copper" made a show of himself by attempting to arrest a player, and some of the toughs slugged a State College man. Now, if the crowd is to be allowed to take a hand in this fashion, the game of football is doomed. It cannot stand such treatment as the mob accorded State College here on the 11th, as the Lancaster mob accorded Swarthmore on the same date, or as Pennsylvania students visited upon Princeton the day of the Manheim game.

As to the "muckers" among our students who attempted to foment a riot, one has the satisfaction of knowing that they are poor animals in all respects, neither good students, gentlemen nor athletes. They are too cowardly to play football, and too brainless or dissipated to study. I am glad to be able to state that there was a strong contingent of the best men in college who opposed these fellows from start to finish, and who went to see our guests off in the full determination of fighting, if fighting had to be done, for State College.

In conclusion, let me say that a change in football ethics is absolutely necessary; next, the umpire must be something better than the mere dummy that he now is, and, finally, the crowd must be made to know its place. I might suggest remedies, but space forbids.

RALPH CATTERALL.

Local.

Ike Greene was in Philadelphia on the 30th ult.

Simpson's birthday came election day. Twice happy man!

Rev. Frank Dobbins preached in the chapel November 19.

Prof. Catterall's brothers made a flying visit to Bucknell on the 11th.

Pease, Ware and S. Wood take an active interest in the Sunday School at Pine Grove.

E. C. Kunkle attended the B. Y. P. U. convention recently held at Williamsport.

The class of '97 has failed to show a color or give a yell. Has the breed of noble bloods departed?

B. K. Brick read a paper before the C. P. S. at a recent meeting. His subject was "Sugar Refineries."

Mr. "S." Vastine treated his club to an oyster supper not long ago. Such is the fate of the election better.

Miss Nellie Connard, C. E. Folmer, "Fatty" Vastine and other friends came to see the game on the 11th.

Reno has a sword which his grandfather used in the war of 1812. Marks of blood can still be seen upon the hilt.

There would be one advantage in wearing a long beard—it could not be easily seen whether or not one had completed his toilet.

The American Baptist Publication Society recently sent about fifty Sunday School books to enrich the literary department.

A great revival in art study is noticeable among the college men. The Paris Figaro is attracting considerable attention every evening.

Owing to the amount of work which he desires the class in Chemistry to cover, Prof. Owens has made the remainder of the experiments optional.

At the Union county convention of Christian Endeavor Associations, Messrs. Palmer, Sprague, Lewis, Suiter, Hall, Allen, Colestock and Fisk gave addresses or read papers.

Monday evening, December 4, Rev. J. M. Hare, '85, of Burlington, N. J., will lecture on the Columbian Exposition. Illustrations will be a feature. Admission by card only.

The Freshmen have elected for their class officers the following: President, Fisk; Vice President, Miss Sprague; Secretary, Parker; Treasurer, Stock; Historian, Miss Hanna; Poet, Miss Taylor.

Three Bible classes have been organized under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association. No Christian can afford, during his college course, to neglect a systematic study of the Book of books.

In the annual report of the Baptist Educational Society the names of some thirty-eight college students appear. The high rank our ministerials take in their classes is surprising. Very few receive marks below "Ex."

The Y. M. C. A. room, with some new chairs and a new carpet, presents an inviting appearance. The committee that had the matter in charge did their work quickly and well; they deserve the hearty thanks of the Association.

Dr. Groff has published in the circulars of the State Board of Health an article on "Dairy Hygiene" and an illustrated pamphlet on "Emergency Hospitals." In recent numbers of Science he has written very pointedly on "Science Teaching in Secondary Schools."

Dr. Aviragnet's lectures on French pronunciation and French elocution are well attended. His auditors appreciate the fact that what they hear comes from one well versed in the subject. Perhaps no other instructor connected with the University devotes as many hours to his department as does Dr. Aviragnet.

The literary editors acknowledge with thanks the volume of commencement speeches and proceedings of Pierce Business College, Philadelphia, from 1882 to 1892. The volume is tasty, well printed, and comprises addresses by many eminent men. Those who desire access to these will find the book in the College library.

Our library is sadly in need of additions to the department of American history. A full supply of "State Papers" and "Registers of Congressional Debates" would please Prof. Catterall and his class in Constitutional history.

The festive Callathumpian made Calvin take up his bed and walk on Hallow e'en. The dormitory privileges of a St. George street backyard were not sufficient to restrain Mr. C. In revenge, it is said, he strove to ignite "one of the University buildings" with Vastine's mattress. Kind friends have interfered to settle the growing feud.

A certain trivial incident which occurred at Chapel a few mornings ago seemed to afford some of the ladies especially an occasion for considerable mirth. The various articles of a masculine costume are not valuable according to their utility only; on certain occasions any man would without doubt exchange even his overcoat for so small a thing as a cravat.

Rev. S. A. Field, pastor of the Baptist church of Tioga, Pa., visited friends here a few days ago. Mr. Field would have been graduated with the class of '93 had he not terminated his course during his Freshman year. Mr. Field states that the act of severing his relations with the University before completing his college course was one of the great mistakes of his life.

Thursday evening, November 2, Dr. Perrine gave his lecture on the "College Days of Daniel Webster." A large audience greeted the lecturer as he mounted the platform. The presence of a goodly number of students showed the Doctor's popularity even more than the generous sprinkling of townspeople. At a meeting of the Y. M. C. A. a motion was passed, expressing the thanks of the boys for the interest Dr. Perrine had taken in helping to secure a carpet for the Association's hall.

In the winter term, 1894, there will be offered to the Junior class electives in Latin, French, German, Hebrew, Logic, Differential Calculus, Quantitative Analysis, Animal Histology, History of England and the Bible in English. The Seniors will have as their regular work the course in Ethics, four hours per week, and in the History of Philosophy two hours per week, one lecture and one of Collateral reading. The Seniors will be offered all the electives of the Junior year, and also Greek, Roman Law, Economics and Comparative Anatomy. Prof. Hulley will give courses in the History of England, in Hebrew and the English Bible. Principal Martin will instruct the class in Logic.

Calderwood's Handbook of Moral Philosophy will be used as the basis of instruction for the Senior class in the winter term, 1894. This book was issued in 1872, and has run through many editions. It has recently been re-written, so as to bring it up to the present state of the science. Older editions cannot be used; students will need the sixteenth edition. In Philosophy proper, instruction will be by lecture and reading in the works of the great Philosophers. Through the liberality of the daughters of the late William Bucknell the library is well supplied with works in that department. The honor work offered will be in the Philosophy of Education, the work of Rosenkranz under that title forming the basis. This work made an epoch in the treatment of educational theory. This course will be open to the Juniors.

One of the members of '96 was recently made the victim of a practical joke. According to the latest rumor the affair stands about as follows: A certain one of the members of the class of '94 of the college, doubtless feeling somewhat piqued because he was not invited to the chocolataire given by the fair members of '94 of the Institute, plotted revenge. He sent (according to the rumor) an invitation, purporting to have come from the Senior class of the Institute, to one of the Sophomores, inviting him to attend the Senior reception at the Institute. As the writing was disguised and as the bona fide invitations were class invitations the recipient of the counterfeit, being unable to detect the hoax—and ignorance surely was bliss—sent in his acceptance and in due time put in his appearance at the reception. Of course he spent a pleasant evening, and came away feeling that the gods had been propititious. The plot worked to a charm, but it would seem that the crafty schemer missed his mark.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

A pretty French story, "Balthasar," by Antole France, is being translated by the advanced French class.

Miss Bessie Noyes was summoned home to attend the funeral of her mother, and on Saturday evening, Nov. 11, Miss Mench received word of the death of her grandfather in Mifflinburg.

The Senior reception and football game were the means of bringing back many former students. Misses Martha Goldy, Louise Lane, Bertha Wittenmyer, Frances Montgomery and Blanche Pursell were guests of the Institute.

The first reception of the season was given by the class of '94, in the Institute parlors, Nov. 10. In the informal arrangement of refreshments it pleasantly resembled a five o'clock tea. The little program cards announced a chocolataire.

"'Tho' chocolate and cakes are the chief of our diet,
A Senior reception can never be quiet," remarked the class poet, remembering "Mother Goose." "Ye sorrowfule piece," was given by Miss Gertrude Sieber, and the character ballad of "Raggedy Man,"—"ye funnye piece," by Miss Greene. Miss Swengel, accompanied by Miss Suiter, sang Schubert's Serenade. Miss Mabel Wittenmyer's guitar solo was, as ever, followed by a request for more. The Seniors are to be congratulated for the very pleasant and unique entertainment.

The following poem was kindly sent us by Miss Orie Williams, well known in Bucknell's literary realm. It is to be hoped that the class of '94, for whom the poem was written, will recall as many pleasant memories of school life as the author of

"GREETINGS TO NINETY-FOUR."

One, who one short year ago,
Stood where you are standing,
On the Senior pedestal
Lofty and commanding
Sends you greeting. Take it though
From the world that lies below.

Greetings, yes, and sympathy
For your tribulations,
For even Seniors, strange to say,
Have their botherations.
Even Seniors are not gay
Everywhere and every day.

But I must not gloomy be,
Cranky grow or crusty
Just because my fun is through
And my pen is rusty.
Trials should forgotten be,
Pleasures live in memory.

For my pleasures certainly
Far outweighed my trials,
Remembered frolics far eclipse
Any self denials.
As you doubtless will agree
When you're looking back like me.

Then here's to merry Ninety-four,
May they always have prosperity,
And may the fame of their career,
Be handed down to posterity.
With a hundred good wishes less or more,
I'll end with "Success to Ninety-four !"

ALUMNÆ NOTES.

The Bucknell Alumnæ, of Philadelphia, will hold its annual meeting Monday, Nov. 27. Miss Cara G. Reese, '78, is to be the invited guest, and Mrs. Dora E. W. Spratt, of the same class, is president of the club.

'84. Mrs. Ra-Chella Scott Beale's little daughter, Katharine Larison Beale, is a most "winsome lassie," and will enter the Institute as a student at the earliest possible date.

'91. Miss Mary L. Bartol has been appointed by the Lewisburg Alumnæ club to report to the Philadelphia Alumnæ club matters of interest connected with the University.

'91. Miss Blanche Schreiner, who since her graduation has resided in England, contributes to various papers. The following is a selection taken from her recent poem, "Edith at Hastings," in the Philadelphia Press, Nov. 12 :

"She sat a woman lone in all that vast array,
And watched with strained dry eyes that bloody battle fray ;
Far off she sees the ocean, breaking along the shore,
But her heart is in the battle, in the battle's rush and roar.

For he, whom she has loved so well, her Saxon Harold brave,
Is fighting for fair England, on the dark brink of the grave.
She takes her beads with trembling hands, and stills her heart to pray,
That God will save her king, from the bloody battle fray.

* * * * * * * * * *

The stars rise softly overhead, the moon shines pale and clear,
And Edith, as she sees the dead, tries hard to still her fear.
The wounded and the dying lie ghastly on the ground,
She passes them with sick'ning dread, her Harold must be found.

At last the monks who follow her, are startled by a cry,
'Tis a cry wrung from the bitterness of deepest agony,
For he, for whom she has searched, is lying cold and dead.

* * * * * * * * * *

"Go! Go!" she utters passionately, "I tell you he is mine!
For death has knit us soul to soul, in unity divine!"
The nobles and the courtiers bowed low, with reverent head,
And turning, left her in the night, alone, with Harold, dead.

* * * * * * * * * *

Oh, Hastings' bloody battle field! Oh! Saxon lying dead!
'Tis Edith's arms that cling to you, when others all have fled.
And heart to heart united, in the shadows, cold and gray,
Are Edith's king, and Harold's love, found thus at break of day."

ACADEMIC NEWS.

[S. J. CLEELAND, Correspondent.]

Cober is doing great work in a football suit.

What's the matter with Bayard? Why, "he's all right."

Mr. James T. Dobbins attended the B. Y. P. U. meeting held at Williamsport a few weeks ago.

Have you seen Warren and Cleeland's little money jug yet? If you have not, look out for them.

Mr. Charles Pierce sends his best wishes to the students of the Cad. He is now teaching school in Idaho.

Can the Preps shout? Did you hear them at the State College football game? They were out in full force.

It certainly is very amusing to see Bower, the second, grab the bottom of his coat when he recites in class.

The Cad boys were very much pleased with the Y. P. S. C. E. convention, and feel that it has done them good.

Mr. Charles Meeker's letter was very encouraging to us. We are glad to know how nicely he is getting along.

Mr. Saul was made to shed tears by the application of too much mustard upon a piece of meat. Mr. Saul said "it was hot stuff."

Professor—"Now, young man, please tell me what kind of a question ne implies?"

Pupil (after long pondering)—"An interrogative question."

Mr. Perrin is quite a philosopher, and can ask some questions that would cause the moon to wink. Oh! Mr. Perrin, come up from the cellar when you reason; you are too deep.

Prof. Phillips filled the pulpit of the First Baptist church of Williamsport, November 5, in order that Dr. Woods, the pastor, could address the Y. P. S. C. E. convention held at Lewisburg.

One way to acquire a good, strong, round voice is to shout as much as you can. A remarkable change in the voice can be detected by all those who try shouting. Therefore, let us shout more at football games.

At the twenty-first annual session of the Union County Sunday School Association, held in the Union church at Mazeppa, October 25, 26 and 27, Prof. Stewart made an address, entitled "Unsuccessful Teaching—Its cause and cure."

The Nation calls attention in an editorial on the "glorification of athletics" to the "swamping throughout the entire year of every other undergraduate ideal by the one predominant and overwhelming athletic ideal," and says that this is the greatest evil which the modern development of college athletics has brought in its train. "We know of no compensating advantage to put over against the distorted conception of life, and particularly of college life, the false standard of individual and college distinction involved in the increasing glorification of athletics." Is not there a tendency here to magnify the "athletic ideal," to make that one a hero who excells in athletics, tho' he may have none of the essential qualifications of a hero? Those most prominent in athletic affairs expect rightly the whole University to manifest great interest in athletics, and gauge a man's loyalty accordingly, while they pay little attention to other interests of the University that are just as necessary. It would be out of the question to expect that men be as enthusiastic over any other one thing as athletics, but we do think that just as all of us are united on this question, so the whole student-body ought to be interested in other things that really are the most important of college life, and that some of them be not met with a sneer or slight remark. "In some way the present mal-adjustment of college ideas ought to be corrected, so that a good scholar need not apologize for attention to his studies, or a lover of letters or sciences be obliged to point to some physical infirmities as his sufficient excuse for not having done his part in upholding the true glory of the college in the scrimmages of the football field."

Editorial.

A MERRY CHRISTMAS and a Happy New Year to all our readers.

The secret of a merry Christmas, mirth and joy for the soul as well as body is suggested by the following lines from Dickens:

"Christmas is a time in which the memory of every remediable sorrow, wrong and trouble in the world around us should be active with us." A few more days of sore trial for us undergraduates, and then the "preliminary" and final examinations over we will unbend, as only students can.

IN SOME of the southern colleges it is said that so strong is the sense of honor among the students at recitations and examinations that a dishonest student could not remain in the school. This is as it should be. In many of our northern schools, alas, it is different; too often it is looked at as a game. Any help is legitimate. Detection is crime. There has been some reform in this matter in some places and certificates of honesty in examination have come into use as a prop to bolster up frail humanity. Like many other props this too is of doubtful utility. The only stay of use is a backbone of pure upright honesty.

Among the many New Year's resolves which will be made by our alumni and students we would suggest that those who are not subscribers resolve to take their college paper. It may not be a paper of very great literary merit; it may not contain the news of the world; it may not be the organ of your party or of any party; but yet it furnishes the best means of keeping alumni in constant touch with the progress of their Alma Mater and showing students what is going on outside of their own circle.

THE football season of '93 is ended. Bucknell's team did creditable work during the season. Whatever be the state of football ethics we are proud to claim among our players some whose Christian grace restrained them from slugging under the most favorable opportunity and the strongest provocation. If the state of football ethics is as bad as portrayed in our last number, and we have every reason to credit the gentleman's statements, no amount of physical benefit can counterbalance the moral detriment derived from participation in the game; better "down" the game at once and reform it, or keep it down.

Football is the all absorbing topic during its season, it gives us the wild excitement which we Americans crave. If introduced from the proper quarter, would not Spanish bull-fights or Roman gladiatoral contests prove equally fascinating?

Football has reached such a stage of development that it seems to need defense, and is defended on various grounds. It is said that football advertises the college; so it does, and according to the argument advanced students will flock to the school which has the best football team, then woe be to the small college. The most unique and practical defense which we have seen lately appeared in one of our leading illustrated weeklies. The author pointed out by specific instance how football players might find a suitable occupation and be a great value to the commonwealth by joining the police force after graduation, and making use of their scientific methods of tackling in catching thieves and other criminals.

WITHOUT presuming to criticise those who have planned our curriculum we may say a few words concerning the order of studies. In the classics a student may take required or elective work in Latin or Greek, or both, during every term of the college course. Mathematics and the Sciences, Organic and Inorganic, are recognized in all the courses as of equal value with the classics. To many of us great advantage would result, if the same advantageous sequence and cumulative effect could be secured in mathematical and scientific line of study. There is so much sameness about language study that breaks or lack of sequence in this line is not as harmful as in the others mentioned. The comparatively small number of students pursuing the classics throughout the whole course is additional argument for a change favorable to mathematical and scientific lines of study.

THE COURSE in Philosophy of Education offered for the winter by President Harris is a beginning toward supplying a long felt want. The number of prospective teachers in our College is increasing. Perhaps no other profession receives so many novices, destitute of even theoretical training. Pedagogics on its philosophical side, as a field for the application of the principles of psychology and ethics, contains much of great value to a general education.

To be sure undergraduate work in this department should not and cannot take the place of a professional course of study, but many who intend to teach cannot take a professional course at once, and such a course as the above, while of advantage on the side of general education, is of double value to the prospective teacher, giving him a knowledge of what is to be accomplished and of the means which have been employed. Quite a number have elected the study for the next term.

A FOOT-BALL GAME.

FIRST HALF.

Groups of townspeople were scattered everywhere. On the corners men stopped to talk over the news. Matrons gathered on the marble steps before their houses to discuss the matter pro and con. Crowds of boys and girls assembled in the school-yards at recess to exchange ideas on the subject. All seemed so equally well-informed that the conversation was, chiefly, on the strangeness of the news.

At five o'clock in the morning, on the twenty-first day of November, 18—, according to their custom, the inhabitants of Utopia had mounted their reading towers, and turned their opera-glasses toward the center of the town. There a huge four-sided bulletin board had been erected for the convenience of the public. At suitable distances, large stereopticons were stationed to throw the daily news upon the board. With the aid of their glasses, the people of the whole city could thus read the doings of the world from the same newspaper.

Amazement came upon the features of the readers as they looked at the enormous headlines:

"CHALLENGE EXTRAORDINARY!

THE GLOVE THROWN DOWN!!

Brobdignag and Lilliput!!!

"Fantasia, Nov. 20.—On account of certain depreciating remarks and the patronizing air lately assumed by the inhabitants of Brobdignag, the foot-ball team of Lilliput hereby challenges a team from Brobdignag to a game of foot-ball on Thanksgiving day, subject to the following conditions:

"1. The center of the field shall be one hundred feet from one end and one mile from the other.

"2. The Lilliputians may use artificial means of playing.

"3. The Brobdignagians shall not trample upon the Lilliputians.

"4. The ball shall weigh two grains."

About eight o'clock in the evening, the Utopians again assembled in their reading towers to see whether this remarkable and, seemingly foolhardy, challenge had been accepted. A large picture representing a giant assaulted by fleas occupied the center of the board, while beneath were the words, "Omne Rectum."

Forthwith preparations on a gigantic scale were begun. Provision must be made to feed the influx of visitors. In empty fields whole oxen were roasted; a dozen fowl were spitted at once; and enormous "Washington" pies were baked. The breweries ran day and night. Flag poles were erected to bear the colors of the rival teams. Dry good stores were crowded by throngs purchasing bunting, ribbons, and material suitable for public and personal decoration.

Out on the suburbs of the city, men were busy in the athletic park arranging "bleachers," rolling a part of the field, and building stalls for the visitor's horses.

On one side of the playing ground a huge grandstand of aluminum was erecting. Immense cranes swung the metallic braces into their places. Hundreds of men were carefully handling plates of glass to be used as a covering for the whole area in case of rain.

The field itself was well rolled for about two hundred feet; the rest was made as rough as possible. Goal posts were placed at proper distances and lines were drawn proportionate to the respective halves of the field.

All preparations being finished, on the eve of the game, the populace gathered in the public square to listen to orators who instructed them in the principles of the game, and gave its history, mentioning, especially, the popularity of the sport among the most intelligent classes of highly civilized nations. The people then quietly dispersed to their homes.

SECOND HALF.

Toward noon on Thanksgiving day the Brobdignagians began to appear in the streets of Utopia. Hungry and covered with dust they sought the refreshments kindly provided by the Utopians. Seizing huge slices of bread and the side of an ox, they would make a sandwich, then, grasping a pie, they would stroll toward the park, eating as they went. Before two o'clock several thousands of the giants had taken their seats on the grandstand. They laughed and coarsely joked, though praising the diligence and hospitality of the townspeople.

The Utopians themselves gathered in coaches, and lined the ropes stretched about the field. Some brought movable grand stands for the use of their families. All had opera glasses.

Suddenly there was a whirring noise, a darkening of the air, and, amid the surprised and loudly applauding people, the Lilliputians landed from their air ships.

Immediately their team trotted out upon the field. By the time they had reached the center, they were almost lost to sight. The opera glasses were brought into use to discover the ball as it was punted in the air.

Forth from their dressing rooms came the mighty Brobdignagians. Tremendous shouts rent the air, colors were waved, but, somehow, the whole audience pitied the wee Lilliputs. To put the giants on a par, the Utopians gazed through the large ends of their glasses.

The multitudes were silent while the captains tossed a coin for the ball. "Riese," quarterback of the Brobdignagians, won, and took the ball.

The umpire and referee were two prominent Utopians who had seen a game of foot-ball as played by the educated youth of foreign countries.

Time was called at quarter past two. The giants formed a "V," Rub-dub-dub holding the ball between his fingers. A quick movement and the huge mass started forward. In their endeavors to avoid trampling on the Lilliputs, the giants fell over their own feet, and down went the whole "V." The ball rolled ten feet away, where "Daumling," full-back for the midgets, caught it. Under the protection of "Parvolus," he ran cautiously around the heap of giants, and, by hiding between blades of grass and stones, advanced within ten feet of the goal-line before he was discovered. At this point he would have made a touch-down had not "Bumpernickel," full-back for the giants, accidently dropped his chewing gum on "Daumling's" head, nearly killing him.

The ball was "down;" the sides "lined up;" the ball was put in play, being thrown to "Sneewitchen," half-back, who, dodging adroitly between the feet of a floundering giant, made a touch-down. Score, 6-0.

Again the Brobdignagians took the ball with no better success than at first. However, they stopped the dwarfs by lying down upon the ground, thus preventing an advance, for the Lilliputs were unable to crawl under, or climb over them. The umpire being appealed to declared the play legitimate, although it looked somewhat like tripping. Thus the first half ended; the giants being unable to score.

After fifteen minutes of rest, the teams again met in the center. "How are the Lilliputians going to run over that mile of rough field?" was on everybody's tongue. The giants would surely score again and again with only a hundred feet to gain. The "pill" was in the hands of the midget's center-rusher. Forward surged the two bodies. In and out the Lilliputians dodged. No gain. On the fourth down they lost the ball. Now for a score,—the whole multitude of Brobdignagians arose and cheered. But where were the dwarfs? No one had seen them depart. The referee ordered the game to go on. Rub-dub dub began to advance, when there came a shrill, whirring sound, and he fell to the ground, struck behind the ear by an areoplane. Quick as a flash, a Lilliput snatched the coveted ball and sailed down the field. The giants now became angry and claimed unfair play, but the condition—that artificial means could be used—was read to them.

In the next "line-up" they began to injure the midgets, for which several of them were ruled off the field. Seeing that the game was hopeless, the captain called his team from the field.

Wild with joy the pigmies rushed forth to greet their heroes. No more would they be objects of scorn and derision. Brains had conquered matter. The choicest viands of the Utopians were brought forth in honor of the victory. For the giants even, there were a few words of pity.

But they, poor monsters, were overcome with shame. All their vaunted glory gone, laid in the dust by these seemingly infinitesmal beings. They slunk home, objects of laughter. Proud boasts no more were theirs; self-complacency had received its death blow.

And when, late at night, they arrived at home, a good old father met them at the city gate, and whispered softly in the ear of each, "My child, don't talk too much."

"THE GARFIELD MEMORIAL."

A few miles eastward from the centre of the city of Cleveland, on one of the most elevated and beautiful mounds in the cemetery, stands the beautiful "Memorial" dedicated by the American people to the memory of James A. Garfield. To find the entrance to this cemetery, we pass out Euclid avenue, known as one of the most beautiful avenues in the world. From the entrance we follow a broad stone walk which winds around the hillside with graceful curve, until we near the top. Here we are obliged to ascend two or three flights of stairs until we reach the door of the Memorial.

We approach the building from the west, and from that standpoint we will view it for a moment. The base is square and is built of brown stone, while the length of each side is possibly fifty feet. This base continues to about half its height. Around the top of this square base are engraved in the stones, a series of scenes which represent the different periods of Garfield's life. The first of this series is on the northern side, and represents him as a teacher. On the western side three scenes follow in the order of lawyer, general, statesman, and on the southern side is depicted his death bed scene. Above the base the building is of a circular, tower-like shape, and is built of brick and capped with a dome-like roof. This part of the building contains little or no decoration.

At the entrance of the building we find a heavy oaken door and above this is the inscription indicating the purpose of the building, and by whom dedicated. Having entered, we find ourselves standing face to face with a life size statue of Jas. A. Garfield. This is hewn from a block of solid marble. He is standing in position, as one in the act of speaking, with the empty chair behind him. As we approach the railing, which keeps us from this statue, we find that it stands beneath a beautiful dome, which rings upon the utterance of the slightest sound.

This dome is decorated with inlaid Mosaics in colors richly mingled. This dome is formed by five or six arching pillars, but about half way between the floor and the top of this dome, the pillars seem to come together for a space. Around the solid walls thus formed, various prominent historical scenes are represented, which have a prominent bearing upon the life of America. A fact interesting to notice is, that all this coloring and all these representations are made by inlaid work. The work has been so delicately performed, however, that one would scarcely think it possible that it was any other than the work of a painter, and only after close observation can the difference be distinguished.

We leave this floor, with its bright and beautiful dome, for a more gloomy place. We have scarcely realized ourselves in the home of the dead. We pass down a dark, narrow and winding stone stairway for about twenty feet, and find ourselves in the presence of the casket which contains the ashes of our honored dead. The casket is of bronze and is hermetically sealed, so that no odor can escape it, although our imaginations would at first make us think so. Although we know that the ear within is dull, and the eye dim, yet as we enter the room, with small barred windows, our voices become hushed, and our hands seek to lift our hats as we stand in the presence of the dead. The withered wreaths upon the casket and the shadowy darkness, all vie in making this place gloomy.

Having viewed these two rooms there is little left to see of the building itself, but above the inner dome, there is a room unfinished and undecorated, from which one can obtain a view of some beautiful scenery. To the north, the broad expanse of Lake Erie; to the west, the delightful city of Cleveland, and in the other directions a large district of farming land.

Having viewed this structare in its grandeur and beauty, we would indeed pronounce it a fitting "Memorial from a grateful people," and although its walls are strong and its arches firm, yet the spirit of love and gratitude which will be handed down from generation to generation, will make a far more enduring monument to the memory of James A. Garfield.

THE RIVER DAME.

A quaint old dame,
With a real Scotch name,
Dwells down by the rippling river.

Secretary of the Navy,
One might call her, maybe,
Though other appellations we could give her.

"Brittania" certainly
Would suit her to a "T,"
For at "L" she surely rules the wave.

Lo! see her boat,
Every day afloat,
Manned by student oarsmen brave.

A conversationalist,
Of no mean gifts,
She is, I can assure you.

A sample of her style,
Philosophic—without guile,
With the greatest pleasure, I'll assure you.

Apropos of "spoony" pairs,
Who were liberal customers,
Ensued this moralizing.

"There's a time for everything,
'Cording to my reckoning,"
She affirmed with emphasis surprising.

"For garden sass to grow,
For the river to get low,
And for the same its banks to overflow.

"And it's time for a weddin', I calkilate,
When a nice young lady gradooates
Simultaneous with her beau.

Athletics and Chess.

Mr. Will Young, of Williamsport, coached our team prior to the Dickinson game. The boys were well pleased with him and profited by his good advice.

The Chess club received a challenge from the Keystone Academy Chess club to play a series of three games by mail. It was decided to accept the challenge and play the games next term.

The Thanksgiving game ends the foot-ball season and Bucknell has acquitted herself well. She may not have played a winning game at all times but she did play one which showed science and good training and which did as much credit to us as a victory. Let us take our defeats as becomes us and when the team lines up next fall we hope that there will be a bright outlook and a good thing in store. The class of '97 has certainly contributed well to our team this year and its members on the foot-ball team have held their own. Nor must the Second and Academy teams be laid aside, for they have also carried off laurels, not having lost a game. The men in those teams are promising material for next year's team in the College.

Whoop 'er up for the Freshmen-Sophomore game, now since all regular games are over. Heretofore these two classes have hardly known each other, as may be judged from the commotion produced by them. Let us enliven class spirit by such meritorious contests.

Laying aside outdoor exercises we shall now go to the Gymnasium and show our muscle and skill there. Drills are voluntary after Thanksgiving, and compulsory for the winter term. The directors look forward to good classes and hope to be able to give two exhibitions.

Bucknell 20, Dickinson 12. Our Thanksgiving game with Dickinson College on neutral grounds at Harrisburg resulted in a good victory. Everybody seemed happy that we had won the last game of the season. The game was a hard fought one, and everything seemed doubtful to us in the first half, when the score was 6 to 0 in Dickinson's favor. But Barclay received a long pass from Smith, and made a long run of 55 yards for a touch-down, thus tieing the score. Smith kicked the first goal. In the second half Bucknell made three touch-downs, from which Barclay kicked one goal. Megargee made long plunges through center at times, and Wolfe's playing was something fine. Dickinson did not make any brilliant plays, but made their touch-downs by short advances. Dickinson tried the revolving V, but did not gain anything by it. Bucknell's massed interference worked well. Several men were slightly hurt, but all through the game was fairly played. The teams lined up as follows:

BUCKNELL.	POSITIONS.	DICKINSON.
Kauffmann	left tackle	Beall
Jennings	center	Hockman
Lesher	right guard.	Bechtel
Collins	right tackle	Ford
Mount.	right end	West
Bunnell, (Smith)	quarter	Lincoln
Marsh	left half	Thomas
Megargee	right half	Vail
Barclay	full.	Morrison

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., Nov. 29, 1893.

Editor of the MIRROR.

DEAR SIR.—Referring to the article "Foot-ball Ethics and State College," published in the MIRROR of Nov. 25, 1893, I quote the following:

"Now. if the crowd is to be allowed to take a hand in this fashion, the game of foot-ball is doomed. It cannot stand such treatment * * * * as Pennsylvania students visited upon Princeton the day of the Manheim game."

Now, Mr. Editor, the statement and its implications are incorrect and unjust, and in view of the fact that a number of Bucknellites are attending the University here, such statements are decidedly unpleasant coming as they do from our Alma Mater. At the Manheim game there was no collision between Princeton and Pennsylvania men. On the trains to and from the games, the rival factions rode together in the same cars without any bad treatment being "visited" upon either side.

A few personal encounters took place in the the evening between students who had imbibed too freely, but there was no mistreatment of Princeton men by Pennsylvania students as a body.

As a nunmber of Bucknell's graduates attend the University of Pennsylvania and as some of those who are at present attending Bucknell are expecting to enter the University here, I hope that the mistaken statement will be promptly and willingly corrected. Sincerely yours,

JOHN B. CRESSINGER,
U. of P., Medical, '96.

Prof. Aviragnet lectured during November on the "Origin and Pronunciation of the French Language." His December lectures will be confined to "French Elocution" and "The Changes in French Orthography."

Professor—Mr. H., what can you say of John Brown's early career?

Mr. H.—When quite young he married. His wife became the mother of seven children. Soon after the birth of the oldest, she died.

The annual meeting of the Bucknell University Club of Philadelphia was held at the Colonnade Hotel on Monday, December 4th. Officers were elected and the general interests of Alma Mater were discussed. A suitable collation was served.

The annual contest in oratory of the Inter-Collegiate Prohibition Association of Pennsylvania will be held at Lewisburg on February 22, 1894. It is expected that at least a dozen colleges will be represented. To choose our orator for the above occasion a contest has been arranged for and will take place about the middle of January.

On Friday evening, December 1, a most novel and entertaining social gathering took place at the Institute. The invitations, of colonial style, had made the guests expect to meet descendents of the Pilgrim Fathers in quaint attire; but such a company of queens and peasants, characters of history and romance, of fairyland, of fable and nursery rhyme as were introduced was an entire surprise. Five tableax were excellently presented, especially "The Telling of the Secret" and "The Artist's Dream." Refreshments in harmony with the occasion were served. A solo by Miss Morgan deserves mention. The gentlemen present found the ladies of former days of equal interest with those of the present time. Much credit is due to those who planned and those who so admirably executed so unique an affair.

Services were held every evening during the Y. M. C. A. week of prayer. On Friday evening Dr. Harris led the meeting, and gave a forcible talk on the subject of "The Power of a Guilty Conscience." On Saturday evening the Quaker Evangelist, John Dean, conducted a service in the Chapel. While all the meetings were fairly well attended and on the evening that Dr. Harris spoke many extra chairs had to be brought in, yet many of the students were unable to attend the services because of the pressure of their studies. Without doubt this was used simply as an excuse in some instances; and yet it does seem that if the lessons were shortened somewhat during such occasions more interest would be taken in religious work. An untold amount of good might be the result if the Christian workers in the college could receive from the faculty a little more sympathy and co-operation in their work.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Dr. F. W. Larison and wife, of Lambertville, N. J., spent Sunday, November 11th, at the Institute.

The Bucknell Alumni Club of Philadelphia presented the following program at their annual meeting at the Woman's Exchange on November 27th: "Institute Girls in the Good Old Days," "Educated Women as Leaders," "Seminary Girls as Pastors' Associates," "College Women at Bucknell," by Nellie W. Conard; "Our Alma Mater: How Can We Help Her?" "Bucknell Institute of To-day."

A delightful digression in school work one Friday afternoon was a lecture given by Dr. Groff, entitled "The White Slave Trade in Pennsylvania." The lecture was of an entertaining character, abounding in ancecdotes, and was enjoyed by all present. An interesting legal document concerning this form of trade, dated 1817, was shown. Dr. Groff has kindly consented to give us a lecture in January on "Out of the Way Places in Our Country."

A high court of appeal, to which all doubtful questions may be referred, has recently been established in the Institute. The court deals with all cases in a manner peculiarly its own. Neither plaintiff nor defendant is obliged to appear before its authority, and complaints may be filed with all the secrecy of the star chamber. But the question is weighed in the august presence of the "Witaregemot," and decisions are given with the most democratic freedom. Although claiming simply the modest name of Query Box, through this court have come moving results.

Extract from a letter written by Miss O. W.: "Among some of our great-grandfather's books there was an old theological work by Dr. Owen that was published in London in 1664. The title reminds me, by its length, of some of the early works in American literature: 'The Nature, Power, Deceit and Prevalence of the Remainders of Indwelling Sin in Believers, Together With the Wages of Its Working and Means of Prevention.' I think it is quite a treasure. Then there was an old hymn book containing several names of ancestors with accompanying dates, the earliest being 1752. In the back of the book, between the yellow fly-leaf and the cover, which had apparently been stuck together purposely, I found a small folded slip of yellow paper with these words on it: 'The Rose is red, the Violet blue, the Carnation is sweet, and so is my dear sweetheart, Elizabeth Lewis.' It was in the same writing as one of the names. Now, wasn't that a pretty bit of romance? I could almost write a story about it, imagining a youth of more than a century ago hiding his little confession between the leaves of a book whose ancient covers had preserved his secret well."

An invitation to the character party in the Institute parlors, December 1, reads as follows: "Ye descendants of ye Maeflowere summone ye goode man —— to appeare in ye beste roomes of Madame Larison's schoole onne Fridaye, ye firste daye of ye twelfthe monthe, betweene ye seventhe and tenthe houres, paste meridiane. Let ye Uncle Sam carrye ye replye this daye. Committee onne ye Invitations." Some very amusing and quaint replies were received, from which three have been selected for publication: "Ye goode manne —— —— will decke himselfe in his Sundaye clothes, to meete ye faire maydens in ye schoole onne Fridaye eve." "Ye College on Ye Hill. To ye Fair Members of ye Committee: If ye eating of muche turkey on ye Day of Thanksgiving is followed by no serious results, ye obedient recipient of ye invitation will complye with ye summons." "Ye goode man, whom common folke do call —— —— and who maketh his abode in ye elle of ye college, toward ye rising sonne, dothe tender his sincere regrettes that to the moste kind and gentil ladies, descendantes of ye Maeflower, he must pleade an engagement previously compacted for ye firste eveninge of ye twelfthe monthe. Nothinge else could prevente him from accepting with much pleasureable anticipation for an exceedingly happie event, ye kind invitation." And this in old English lettering: "Ye —— —— Junior, sonne of a Daughter of ye Revolution, to ye Mandement of ye faire May-dens of Antiquity, do make Response that with muche Pleasure and with greate Alacrity will He hie Himself to ye beste roomes of ye Gentlewoman Dame —— on ye Evening of 12 Mo., 1 Day, being ye 6th of ye Weeks, at ye Houre of early Candlelight, and with equal Sorrowe and Reluctance will he drag himselfe hence at ye laste momente."

Owing to the special interest manifested in his church, a gain of fifty-six in membership during the past year, he refused to accept the call to a larger sphere.

'90. Rev. W. C. McNaul was ordained a few weeks ago as pastor of the Grace Baptist church, Chicago. The church occupies the building hitherto known as the Sacramento Avenue Mission on the street of that name, between Walnut and Lake. It organized, and was recognized by a council of the Baptist Association of Chicago a few weeks ago, Mr. McNaul having acted as its pastor while it was in the inchoate stage of a mission chapel. The new organization has about sixty members, and the earnest spirit that has characterized their efforts hitherto gives promise of growth into a strong and useful church.

Why is it that we hear so much fault-finding with the gym. drills? Will any one deny that physical training is of value to them? It is well for us to remember the inscription in the Greek room—"Body, mind and soul make the man." Perfect culture involves the training not only of our mental and spiritual natures, but also of the body. A strong, vigorous, healthy body is a priceless possession. None of us, after we have left college, want to be spoken of as "a cranium attached to a pair of legs"—a developed mind and an inferior body. Work faithfully in the gym. Don't cut drills! You will never, in after life, regret the time spent in building up your body.—Lafayette.

Editorial.

WE ARE GLAD to welcome Prof. Lincoln Hulley back into our midst. Under his leadership the new department of Hebrew and English Bible will take a prominent place in the college curriculum. The high esteem in which the Professor is held and the importance of these subjects in the minds of the student body is evidenced by the large number electing Hebrew and English Bible.

THE nobility of many of our manufacturers is seen in their efforts to keep their works running even without profit or perhaps at a loss. The ethical problems suggested are many and deep-seated—as deep-seated in their final solution as the very corner-stones of government and the inmost springs of action in the individual soul. How far is wealth an individual possession to be selfishly used and increased? How far is it such from the standpoint of even-handed justice? Is it a treasure held in trust for society? If so, how far is it right to injure or diminish the efficiency of capital for the relief or prevention of present distress? Are we our brother's keeper?

THE problems before our legislators and financiers are largely those of political economy. How to keep the mighty wheels of commerce and trade from ruinous stoppage and disuse. There are many men and many measures—much doctoring of symptoms. Some propose panaceas for all the ills of the body politic; some have one remedy, some another; some are uncertain what to propose. Between them all our country is ill, but shows signs of great vitality, and will donbtless recover in spite of all the dosing. Over-production, silver coinage, change of administration, free trade tendency of the dominant party, a periodic sickness, liquor consumption, etc., are all mentioned as the chief and only causes of the present distress. To the student there is offered a fine field for the application of scientific principles in reasoning. He must sift the evidence carefully, keep a sharp lookout for formal and material fallacies and be willing to suspend judgment where the evidence is insufficient.

TO THE student there is no more productive or important field of study than that of economics. There are so many different leaders and such a difference of opinion on account of the complexity of the problems presented that the very best training of the judgment can be gained. A student, especially a college graduate in a republic, is and should be expected to have knowledge of the principles of political economy, and should be able and ready to express and enforce opinions upon topics of political economy and kindred subjects. The Mugwump and the independent voter is on the increase, which shows that people are beginning to think for themselves. They are tiring of being duped by the man who has an axe to grind. The ordinary bombastic, illogical, untruthful political harangue is losing its power. Men of intelligence and education in our cities are organizing into clubs for the discussion of measures important to the commonwealth and the enforcement and furtherance of good government. The scholar's day in politics is coming. It behooves us to be prepared to take the prominence in politics which our privileges render our obligation to society at large. There should be no shirking of duty on account of the reputed filthiness of the political field. If it is filthy, who can cleanse it but those who have knowledge, high principles and power?

THE giving of credit in college records to the editors of college journals is receiving only a small part of the attention it deserves. With characteristic editorial modesty we have, heretofore, refrained from taking up, in our own behalf, either sword or pen, but as the question must sometime be settled, for the sake of those who may follow us, a few words may not be out of place.

As matters now stand the work of the editors is wholly without remuneration; it consumes time which students not thus engaged may put upon honor work, and it affords a practical training of which college records should take cognizance. Therefore, we think credit should be given for this as for other extra work.

A number of colleges recognize in some way the work done by students on their respective journals, and the basis of credit granted is generally seven hours a week for the chief editor and two hours each for his associates. This seems eminently just, and we earnestly recommend such a plan for adoption in our college. We believe that if credit were given, greater pains would be taken with the work, more students would be willing to devote their time and energies to it, and the standard of the college journal would be constantly raised.

YALE, Harvard, Brown, Princeton, Leland Stanford, Cornell, University of Wisconsin, and University of Michigan now publish daily papers, and the University of Pennsylvania will begin the publication of one soon.—Ex.

COLLEGE ATHLETICS.

DR. GEO. G. GROFF.

To-day, no intelligent person denies the value of physical culture. To college students, who have for years been confined in school rooms, and who yet look forward to years of confinement over their books, athletic sports are simply invaluable. These are intended to make the body strong, steady, supple, quick, accurate and beautiful, to increase its endurance, in a word, to give to the young man a harmonious physical organization. It is now believed that a strong mind should dwell in a strong body and that physical exercise promotes good digestion, good circulation, good assimilation, and a good working brain. Exercise in the open air is especially valuable to the student who spends the greater part of his time in a poorly ventilated, and generally overheated room. The eye, the ear, the hand, the nerves, the whole body should be trained in the athletic sports adopted by college students.

GOOD SPORTS.

There are many good sports. Some well known, others almost entirely unknown. The following are all believed to have points of merit, viz: Tennis, cricket, rapid walking over fields and through woods, running, mountain climbing, riding on horseback, riding the bicycle (when done properly,) rowing, swimming, boxing and fencing, shooting with a rifle or bow and arrow, base ball and foot-ball. No form of exercise has been found better to develope the bodies of young men than military drill, but this can scarcely be called a sport, though it is excellent exercise.

FOOT-BALL.

As the foot-ball season drew to a close the present year, a wave of indignation and disgust seemed to sweep over the Nation at the travesty of athleticism, and the mockery of education revealed in this game as now played. The press of the country, secular, religious and medical, all seemed united in condemning the game and in demanding that it be reformed or abolished. That it has become a rough and barbarous game is shown by the fact that some twenty-seven players are reported killed the present season in Great Britain and seven in the United States, besides a large number with limbs broken or sprained. A report of the last Yale–Harvard "battle" states that "Big Acton, of Harvard, to settle a dispute on the ground, caught Beard on the jaw with a right hander and brought him to the earth beautifully," and again, "Thorne's nose was broken, and blood gushed from his nose and mouth, dyeing the front of his jacket a bright crimson." From a recent article in THE MIRROR it appears to be stated that a Professor in the University of Chicago, and an Instructor in Bucknell University, both believe that slugging is justifiable, and may be necessary as the game is now played. The Hartford Courant gives this account of the death of the player White: "The heavy weights landed on White, who sank to the ground. A muffled, inarticulate sound was heard and White was felt to be limp. When the men had finally separated, White lay on the ground in a sort of crouching position, face down, with his head bent on his chest, apparently lifeless. The unfortunate player's face was livid and discolored as if by strangulation, with staring, sightless eyes and protruding tongue."

The Nation. in a recent editorial, says: "It is true that foot-ball is, has always been, and of necessity must always be, a rough game. There is a line, however, which separates roughness from brutality, and there are many lovers of the game who, after watching its recent developments with grave concern, believe that that line has been crossed. It is to them a matter of regret that the objections which have been urged against the game from the outset, have now such a solid foundation that they cannot be overlooked." The New York Evening Post, the journal par excellence of educated gentlemen, used these words of the game in general: "College foot-ball is fast becoming a national calamity. At Harvard, when the game stands highest, about twenty-five 'gladiators' monopolize the game. As a spectacle the game is only one degree removed from the prize fight, and nobody participates in it or looks on without finding his dislike for prize fights diminished and his respect for prize fighters increased."

An editorial in the New York Independent, the leading religious paper in America, states: "A form of exercise for bodily profit which results in such frequent and awful casualties is manifestly an absurdity. No possible advantage it possesses can compare for a moment with the injuries it involves. It is not play, but war; not athletics, but pugilistics; not an innocent, invigorating exercise, but a demoralizing and dangerous diversion. If it cannot be radically reformed it ought to be quickly abolished. Colleges ought to take the matter in hand without delay. Young men are not sent to them to be crippled or killed, or to be taught how to become gentlemanly ruffians. These intercollegiate contests are often not only gladiatorial shows, in which brutalities are given and taken, but occasions of rowdyism and dissipation." Col. Ernst, Superintendent West Point Military Academy, says: "It is doubtful, in my opinion, if the benefits derived from playing this game, which I am free to acknowledge are very considerable in some directions, are commensurate with the risks it entails to life and limb, which, according to statistics, are much greater than commonly supposed."

Athletic sports, to be of value to anyone, must be enjoyed. Of foot-ball, it may justly be said, very few men in a college play it. At Harvard it is said one hundred out of three thousand practice, and that twenty-five monopolize the game. At other colleges the same ratio is said to be held. It then is not valuable for physical development. Those who look on and howl are not benefitted, but rather the contrary. The game is not one that appeals to the esthetic nature. "What a spectacle is that quilted, betrodden, dishevelled, long-haired, begrimed, scarred foot-ball hero, who finds glory in a savage's scrimmage in the mud!"

Not only is the game to be condemned because of its roughness, but it has become a game of professionals, and is accompanied by betting and gambling, and this even on the grounds of professedly religious institutions. Worse still, the games are accompanied by drinking, debauchery and profanity. The editor of the New York Independent gives a personal experience: "In a western city the writer recently saw a mob of foot-ball victors take possession of a hotel, and hold it for an hour or more. They massed themselves in the spacious office, which guests could not enter, and yelled like mad men. Squads of uniformed youth from sixteen to twenty frequently visited the bar, and what they got there did not tend to reduce the noise and confusion."

The editor of the Medical News, in a telling editorial, remarks: "The beautiful games of cricket and base ball have, on the whole, been a blessing to the country; they are not brutal; they have large elements of skill and intellectuality in them; they encourage suppleness and all-round development of the body, of the senses, and of the mind. A 'scrub-game' by suburban boys, or even by street gamins, does not make the players worse than they naturally are, does not arouse all the fierce and brutal passions of the savage nature, none too easily held in control even by the best. But compare this with a foot-ball game by the same half-civilized or quarter civilized little savages, and one sees quickly the influence for evil of apparently so simple and small a thing as a game. If, governed by rigid rules and umpires, the presence of a vast, refined audience and the possession by the players of good home-training, education, and all that, the game results in charges and the facts of 'slugging,' and in passionate enmities and rivalries, what then is to be expected from its translation into the conditions of the alley, the vacant lot of the city outskirts, and 'played' by the most unregenerate types of human nature? Imitation is flattery—usually—but in this instance the flattery is nauseating even to the flattered. It is a cause of deep regret that we should approach the ideal of Rome in our national sports, rather than that of Greece, and it is especially significant when educators and universities show this tendency. One would not expect them to encourage gladiatorial rather than intellectual and truly athletic contests."

It has been affirmed in the public press during the past season, that following three intercollegiate games, the visiting teams have been threatened with mob violence, the mobs being composed partly of students and partly of lookers-on.

WHAT IS DEMANDED.

That the game be reformed, the brutality and debauchery entirely eliminated, and if this is not possible, then abolish from colleges which mean to maintain their self-respect and that of their patrons. The editor of Harper's Weekly, speaking to college Professors, says: "There loom up, side by side, with the growth of the game and the increasing interests, two evils which threaten not simply to dampen the enthusiasm but to entirely put a stop to the sport. These evils are brutal tactics on the part of the players, and drunkenness on the part of their supporters. Some day, in the near future, when a player falls, never to get up again, because his opponent, in the heat of the contest, has struck a little harder than he intended, you will seize the opportunity to say, 'No more foot-ball.' But the responsibility of that man's death will rest upon you." Addressing the same persons, the editor of the Medical News writes: "If reform is possible, it must follow:

1. That personal violence and injury must be stopped.
2. That no public matches must be allowed during term time.
3. That the first duty and function of a college being that of mental training, this during no day dare be subordinated to the rage for games and athletics.
4. The physical development of all students is to be encouraged, not the game-winning powers of a few.
5. An end must be made of rowdyism, drunkenness and gambling, in connection with, or as a result of the games.

"The aim of educators, so far as it relates to athletics, should be to give every student a rounded harmonious physical organization, not two train a dozen or two dozen semi-professionals (sometimes wholly professional except in name,) hired, bribed, or wheedled to attend the institution, to be a show-team, and win matches in order to attract students to the institution. The college that has not a splendid gymnasium, large enough for every one of its students, and a compulsory system of physical training for each, has little just claim upon parents or the public. The wise father, other things being equal, will send his son to the college that has the best general gymnasium and the poorest record in winning public athletic games."

The Independent says: "Any game that imperils life and limb, and gives occasion to brutality, dissipation and rowdyism is a positive wrong, and our colleges ought to be the first to find it out and condemn it. They are primarily halls of learning and discipline, not schools for physical contests more fatal than those of the prize ring. If the game is reformed it must be so reformed as to exclude brutalities; and college authorities ought to make a rule that it should be played only in college towns, on college grounds."

It is proper to state that the writer of this paper has not witnessed a game of foot-ball for several years. Believing that the game tends in the same direction as the prize ring and the race course, he has avoided it. For all the statements made the authority has been given. It is not to be understood that any of the above written is in condemnation of any college team. It is the game as played, and not the players, to which reference is made.

Lewisburg, Pa.

THE JEALOUSY OF OTHELLO.

Humanity is frail. No man, however good, true and noble, is perfect. And Shakspeare in holding the mirror up to nature reflects not alone one side of man's character, but every part. He reveals the grandest moods and the lowest passions; the most lofty thoughts and the basest desires. In short, he shows us men as they are and as we know them. In dramatizing Cinthio's story the same faithfulness to nature is distinctly outlined. Othello is a man Noble it is true; with high desires and a trusting love, but yet with all the weakness and proneness to err in judgment to which humanity is heir. And the great crime he is led to commit affords an opportunity to study character as seen and understood by the greatest of English writers.

The chief characteristic in this wonderful tragedy is the growth and final consummation of that "green-eyed monster, which doth mock the food it feeds on." Let us then examine the reasons for Othello's change of feeling toward the beautiful Desdemona, and look for a moment at the results.

The elements of Othello's character afford us a clue. For in these we may discover the vulnerable points—the places open to the enemy's attack. Othello was of high-born nature. Being himself noble and above suspicion, he did not look deeply enough into the characters of those about him. Like many we still meet, knowing himself worthy of trust, thought that others were likewise incapable of betraying confidence. Iago says of him:

"The Moor is of a free and open nature,
That thinks men honest that but seem to be so:
And will as tenderly be led by the nose
As asses are."

And again he is obliged to confess that

"The Moor—howbeit that I endure him not,—
Is of a constant, loving, noble nature."

This very trust—this frankness of nature was exhibited most freely towards the one most undeserving of such confidence. That Othello believed in Iago's integrity is shown by frequent allusions to him as "a man of honesty and trust," and "Iago is most honest." Iago himself says: "He holds me well; the better shall my purpose work on him." It was through this trustfulness—the object of Iago's contempt—that Othello was to receive the fatal poison. Othello's trust is shown also toward Desdemona. "My life upon her faith," he exclaims when the first shadow of suspicion is sent flitting across his path, and it is only when proofs seem overwhelming that he believes her faithless.

Nor was he naturally jealous, for he says:

"Then must you speak
Of one that lov'd not wisely, but too well;
Of one, not easily jealous, but being wrought,
Perplexed in the extreme."

He is proud and self-reliant. When besought to go into the presence of Desdemona's father and friends to conciliate them, he says:

"Not I; I must be found;
My parts, my title and my perfect soul,
Shall manifest me rightly."

And as the old Senator threatens him while crying, "down with him—thief," he exhibits beautifully, almost sarcastically, his self-command in the words, "Keep up your bright swords, for the dew will rust them."

With this brief examination of Othello's character we are somewhat prepared to examine more closely the machinations of Iago. This character, unique in wickedness and treachery, is frequently compared with Milton's Satan, though much less noble in purposes and methods. More closely does he resemble the Mephistophiles of Faust, if the supernatural aids employed by Goethe, are omitted. Accomplished, courteous, wise, he debases all good qualities "the genuine devil to play." It has been urged as a criticism that Iago does not have sufficient motive for the villainous part assigned him. He does appear the incarnation of evil, but as Coleridge expresses it, "a being next to devil, and only not quite devil, and yet a character which Shakspeare has attempted and executed without scandal."

Acting then with almost "motiveless malignity," Iago sets forth to destroy happiness scarcely less than that upon which Satan gazed in the world's first paradise. He looks upon the scene of gladness and joy and remorselessly exclaims:

> . . . . . "O, you are well tuned now!
> But I'll set down the pegs that make this music,
> As honest as I am."

Disliking the Moor he seeks to destroy him, and destroy him through his affections. He was well acquainted with Othello's character, as indeed he knew all with whom he dealt. This is shown in the sentence: "I have't; it is engender'd." With consummate skill he works upon the feelings of Othello and plots to

> "Put the Moor
> At least into a jealousy so strong
> That judgment cannot cure," and uses for this purpose the most trifling circumstances, weaving them into a web of evidence so strong that there is no escape. He believes and proves that

> "Trifles light as air
> Are to the jealous confirmations strong
> As proofs of Holy Writ."

And taking his first cue from Brabantio, "She has deceived her father and may thee," by various hints and insinuations, hesitatingly made, of course, he arouses Othello's suspicion of Desdemona and Cassio and allows himself to be drawn into making lying statements with such a semblance of truth that both are compromised; and Othello, crazed with doubt and suspicion, determines to end the life of her whom he believes unfaithful.

Desdemona's confidence in the Moor is implicit; her love for him, perfect. On these grounds—believing her confidence and love fully reciprocated, as indeed they were at first—we may account for some of her actions which to an untrusting mind might be suspicious. Her solicitations for her former lover, the dishonored Cassio, are real and earnest, but in them is nothing to arouse the jealousy of an unprejudiced mind. She believes her

> "Noble Moor
> As true of mind, and made of no such baseness
> As jealous creatures are."

In the conversation concerning the handkerchief, that ensues between Othello and herself, she is frightened both by her husband's manner and the story in regard to its ill-omened loss, into a series of equivocations mingled with pleadings for Cassio's reinstatement that only entangled both more thoroughly in the meshes Iago has woven for them. Later she protests her entire innocence of any crime or unrighteous thought toward him. But in vain; the poison has done its work; in Othello's eyes not only is she herself dishonored, but his own fair name,

> "That was as fresh
> As Dian's visage is now begrimed and black
> As mine own face."

To Iago he explains his feelings and divulges his plans in a beautiful figure:

> "Like to the Pontick sea,
> Whose icy current and compulsive course
> Ne'er keeps retiring ebb, but keeps due on
> To the Propontick and the Hellespont;
> Even so my bloody thoughts, with violent pace,
> Shall ne'er look back, ne'er ebb to humble love,
> Till that a capable and wide revenge
> Swallow them up."

After this vow is accomplished; when Iago's treacherous deceit is fully exposed and Desdemona's purity proved, the remorse of Othello is pitiful to see. Just before taking his life he accuses himself of being

> "One, whose hand,
> Like the base Indian, threw a pearl away,
> Richer than all his tribe; of one whose subdu'd > eyes,
> Albeit unused to the melting mood,
> Drop tears as fast as the Arabian trees
> Their medicinable gum."

The sad ending of this marvelous tale may lead us to judge Othello too harshly. But let us put ourselves in his place. Not thoroughly acquainted with all the customs of the Venetians, when Iago speaks of certain covert and deceptive practises which only heaven sees, Othello's curious suspicion is naturally aroused and sustained. Of different race and accordingly thought inferior—for what nation does not believe in its own superiority?—he the more readily, through cognizance of this belief, falls into Iago's trap. His confidence so basely betrayed; his trust in humanity so rudely shaken; his love turned to hate; his sweetness to gall—what wonder he was driven to end the whole affair by a wicked murder that others be not likewise deceived. Coleridge has said, "Othello does not kill Desdemona in jealousy, but in a conviction forced upon him by the almost superhuman art of Iago—such a conviction as any man would and must have entertained who had believed Iago's honesty as Othello did." So then we must pity, rather than condemn, the victim of worse than devil, and hold up to execration him through whose devilish designs the happiness of others is ruined.

Athletics and Chess.

Bromley Smith, '95, has been appointed, by certain persons connected with the University, as special trainer of track athletics. It is desirable that he will receive the hearty co-operation of all the students in order that talent may be developed in this line. By this means we hope to have better records on field day.

The annual meeting of the Athletic Association was held in Euepia Hall on Saturday, December 9, for the purpose of electing the officers of the association and electing managers for the various athletic teams. The election, which was very close, resulted in the selection of Portser, '96, as base ball manager, and Cregar, '95, as foot-ball manager. The revision and adoption of the constitution was left until a special meeting in January.

Bucknell came out quite well in athletics last season, as is shown in the foot-ball scores. The season was one of great benefit to the students and University. Two games with University of Pennsylvania and Lehigh were cancelled on account of confusion of dates. Financially, the management was not only out of debt, but had a balance in the treasury. Below are the games played by the University teams: Bucknell 10, Shamokin 6; Bucknell 6, Franklin and Marshall 10; Bucknell 23, Gettysburg 0; Bucknell 0, Swarthmore 36; Bucknell 26, Haverford 0; Bucknell 18, State College 36; Bucknell 20, Dickinson 12. Second team 6, Williamsport 0; Academy 6, Selinsgrove 0; Academy 32, Bloomsburg Normal 6.

Local.

How did you spend your vacation?

Loomis, '95, has joined Sigma Alpha Epsilon.

Eddie Kendall has been initiated into Phi Kappa Psi.

The Y. M. C. A. work needs your support; you need its aid.

Messrs. Sigmond and Megargee assisted at a concert held in the Methodist church, Friday, December 8.

During the holidays Bucknell boys were quite numerous in Philadelphia.

E. C. Kunkle was engaged in evangelistic work in Williamsport during the vacation.

Robert E. Speer says that the Young Men's Christian Association is simply a part of the church at work.

Miss Goddard, '97, spent a few days of her Christmas vacation with her class-mate, Miss Nellie Taylor.

With the advent of the winter term Prof. Caterall returns to finish his course at the University of Chicago.

Friday evening, December 8, the college girls gave their annual reception to the Senior Sem's and gentlemen from the hill.

T. S. Fretz conducted a series of meetings near his home. Several of his friends and relatives were led to begin the Christian life.

Amos Williams spent the last week of the term watching his sister at the Seminary. She was the victim of a very severe attack of the "grip."

It is to be hoped that those who are musically inclined will soon unite in some organization. The Sigma Alphs have started a banjo and guitar club.

Gymnasium work begins in earnest this term. There is no better way to clear out the cobwebs from one's upper story than to take regular and systematic exercise.

The following was overheard on the train: He (college man,) "Whom did you get to darn your mitten so nicely?" She (fair sem.) "I did it." He, "It's darned good."

Cober, '96, has moved his family from Lewisburg to Newberry, where he has been called as pastor of the Baptist church. Mr. Cober will continue his studies, however.

"Nine nights from to night,
I hugged her so tight,"

said he, with that far-away look which seemed to indicate that the speaker was indulging in a day-dream.

T. S. Fretz and other Bucknell students attended a musical entertainment during the holidays given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Academy of Music, Philadelphia. There were nearly one hundred instruments.

On the morning of December 7, a fire was discovered in the house of President Harris, by Harvey Marsh. The young man battled heroically with the flames until help arrived, when they were extinguished. The damages, at present unknown, are wholly covered by insurance.

The prevalence of "la grippe," colds, whooping cough and general debility, was never so marked in college as it has been this fall term. A great number of remedies were used by the boys, some even trying faith-cure. That the ailments were sympathetic and contagious was shown by the number of cases at the Institute.

Prof. Perrine preached at Birmington, Huntingdon county, December 10. He was entertained at Mountain Seminary, of whose teachers and surroundings he speaks in the highest terms. This institution has a remarkable history, in that it has been under one management for over thirty years, and has always maintained a high standard, attracting the young ladies of Presbyterian families. Miss Lida Bell is a graduate of this Seminary.

The first annual Junior debate was held in Theta Alpha Hall, Friday evening, December 8, before Rev. J. Summerbell, Rev. Judd and Mr. Gundy. Both sides of the question, Resolved, "That the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands to the United States is advisable," had been prepared by the debators. The sides were given just before speaking. Of the twelve who spoke the following eight were chosen to speak during the winter term: Messrs. Allen, Jackson, Kendall, Paullin, Pease, Schuyler, Sheddan and Smith.

Saturday evening, December 9, the Sophomore class gave a prize contest in declamation in Bucknell Hall. The program, arranged by Prof. Phillips, was as follows:

Music—First Movement of the First Symphony	—Mozart.
Misses E. Faust and N. Suiter.
Prayer	Rev. H. H. Henry.
Music—Violin Solo with Piano Accompaniment	—Bohm.
Miss Louise Lawshe.
Thrilling Sketch	S. R. Wood.
Eva's Death	T. L. Joseph.
Grant's Private Life	F. W. Brown.
Music—Thou Art Mine All	Brawsky.
Miss Jennie Davis.
A Terrible Experience	D. F. Finn.
Studying for the Contest	B. B. Ware.
Music—Caprice Aerien	Wollenpaupt
Miss Juliet Aikin.
The Battle of Waterloo	J. W. Davis.
The Apple Tree and the Borer	H. F. Colestock.
Music—Grand Air of Barbiere di Siviglia	— Rossini.
Miss Mary Morgan.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Mrs. Jennie Katherman Cross, class of '88, writes: "I will not engage a room for my daughter just now. If she enjoys her school-life at Bucknell Institute as much as I did, and carries away pleasant recollections, and ambitions for something better, she will have used her time well."

An operetta, "Enthusiast," upon which the Choral Union so faithfully practised last term, will be presented in Bucknell Hall the latter part of January. A definite date has not yet been arranged. A small admittance fee will be charged, and the proceeds given to a worthy object.

For some time past the Current News club has been battling with the momentous and complex "Silver Question." Dr. Perrine finally came to the rescue, by kindly giving a lecture before the club, on Monday evening, December 4 The perplexities and doubts existing in the minds of many, were largely dispelled by this practical and suggestive talk.

Friday evening, December 8, was the occasion of a "preliminary examination," presided over by the college girls, in the Institute parlors. Those summoned to present themselves hied thither with fluttering hearts (not of the kind that ordinary "exams" induce,) and hasty footsteps. The subjects included History, Botany, Physiology, Geography, Geometry and even Psychology. All were exceedingly anxious to "pass," and many begged for an extension to the "time limit." Refreshments were served during and after labor.

Miss Mary R. James, Ex. '78 Institute, who had been attending Cook County Normal, Chicago, died at that place and was buried at Lewisburg, December 11, 1893. She was a daughter of Prof. C. S. James, and had been engaged in teaching nearly all her life; having taught in Monongahela College while her father was president of that institution. Her funeral brought to Lewisburg many old friends of the University, including Rev. J. Sexon James, '68; C. R. James, Esq., '75, and Mrs. Alice J. Chambers, '74 Institute.

A delightful reception was given on Tuesday evening, December 12, in the Institute parlors, by the Bucknell Alumnæ club, of Lewisburg, to a number of their friends, including the class of '94. An interesting program was prepared, and the meeting was presided over by Mrs. S. D. Bates, the president of the club. The topic for discussion was "An hour with the Moors." A story of a Moorish Princess, was read by Ruth Sprague, from Irving's famous "Tales of the Alhambra," and a paper by Mrs. Loomis, entitled "Moorish Architectures." This paper especially deserves mention, for the valuable information given in a pleasing style. Mary Butler, class of '93, had a carefully prepared paper on "Social Life of the Moors." Photographs of a Moorish palace and architecture were then shown by Prof Owens. The program was ended by a talk from Mrs. Larison on "Characteristics of the Moors," after which a dainty lunch was served by the young ladies of the club. Some time was spent in social intercourse, and all departed feeling that it had been an evening "long to be remembered."

The following is an extract from a letter concerning the meeting of the Bucknell Alumnæ club of Philadelphia, in November: "As you know from the invitations, Miss Cora G. Reese was to have been the guest of the club. She was unable to be present owing to her work, but sent her paper which Mrs. Spratt read. The paper was a section of the one that Miss Reese read before the Woman's Congress, in Chicago, last summer. It was a strong, well written paper, and made the rest of us ordinary mortals more ordinary than ever when it was time to read our feeble productions. After the reading of Miss Reese's paper, Mrs. Tustin was called. Her subject was 'Institute girls in the good old days.' She began by saying that it was eminently fitting that she—one of the good old 'girls'—should have been given the subject assigned to her. 'For,' said she, 'all the girls were good in the 'good old days.' ' Then in a simple and pleasing way she told of many of her experiences at the Institute. Now and then a touch of humor, or some playful reference to some of the pleasures of those youthful days added greatly to the interest. It was especially gratifying to me, having experienced so recently all those delights which girls only enjoy, to feel that other girls, even so long ago, indulged in many of the frivolities that we did. Mrs. Suiter read a pager on 'Educated Women as Leaders.' Mrs. Suiter's comparisons between the educated woman in the home and one who is not educated, were clear cut and forcible. Mrs. Wakeland and Jessie Jones spoke on 'Our Alma Mater.' 'How can we help her?' Miss Reed read some items of interest concerning 'Bucknell of to-day.' My own paper was on 'College Women at Bucknell.' "

ACADEMIC NEWS.

[S. J. CLEELAND, Correspondent.]

Mr. J. Elmer Saul is married.

Mr. Elmer E. Conrath was married Dec. 28.

Mr. James Hobbins spent his vacation at school.

We are glad to have Mr. Meeker with us again.

Mr. McCrea, Ex. '93, is now a Freshman in Haverford College.

The "grip" made its talons felt upon Prof. Stewart and others of the Academy during vacation.

Prof.—"What can you tell of the Invisible Spectrum?"

Student—(after pondering)—"You can't see it."

A band known as the "Christmas Band," consisting of Messrs. Crawford, Sprague, Harvey, Dutton, Giffin and Cleeland, were out during the Christmas holidays, under the auspices of the State Y. M. C. A.

The nature of the "Band's" work was purely evangelical. Mr. Chas. Harvey was appointed leader, and was ably assisted in his efforts by a quartette composed of Messrs. Crawford, Dutton, Sprague and Cleeland. The first place visited was Plymouth, Pa. Here the band did very efficient work and was well received and entertained by the town people; quite a number of conversions resulted.

The next and final town visited was Tunkhannock, Pa. Here also a number of people were converted and an intense religious spirit was aroused among the church people of the town.

Personal.

'60. Rev. James H. Marr, for thirteen years pastor of the Beacon Presbyterian Church, Cumberland and Cedar streets, recently preached his farewell sermon to that church.

'64. Rev. C. A. Stone closed his pastorate at Walton, N. Y., on Sunday, November 12th. During his pastorate the church has made much progress, having been increased by 121 additions.

'65. Rev. E. E. Jones, of Elizabeth, N. J., has accepted a call to Clinton, N. J.

Ex. '67. Ex-Mayor Merritt, of Reading, is a candidate for Superintendent of the Mint. He is ably supported by Representatives Erdman and Reilly, and is making his race as a compromise between the contending elements.

'72. Dr. Albert Foster is receiving very hearty support from his church at Roseville, N. J. The church building has recently been remodeled.

'84. Rev. A. W. Hand, pastor of the church at Keene, N. H., has been assisted in revival work by Mr. Geil, of Doylestown, Pa. The pastor baptized twenty-seven on November 19th.

'84. M. W. Shreve is reading law in addition to carrying on an extensive carriage and wagon business in Union City, Pa.

The annual meeting and banquet of the Bucknell University Club of Philadelphia was held on the evening of December 4 at the Collonade Hotel. Among those present were President John H. Harris, Ph. D., LL. D, of the University; Harry S. Hopper, President of the Board of Trustees; the Rev. D. P. Leas and Dr. J. K. Weaver, of Norristown, also members of the Board; the Revs. Lemuel Moss, D. D., H. L. Wayland, D. D., J. G. Walker, D. D., W. H. Conard, D. D., J. W. Willmarth, D. D., LL. D., Thomas A. Gill, D. D., Chaplain United States Navy. George Morris Phillips, Ph. D., President of the club, was in the chair, and the divine blessing was invoked by Dr. Willmarth. After dinner President Harris was introduced and made an address. He said that in the Senior class this year there are thirty, and it is considered an exceptionally strong class. There are now demands on the University for broadening the curriculum. There are not many colleges of that size which are doing as much work in English as Bucknell. He was in favor of the study of the classic languages, which are not dead, but living. With the English language come English ideas and English thought. He had been exceedingly gratified by the interest taken by the alumni. General Merrill was called on, and made a few remarks. He was followed by the Rev. Dr. Wayland, who said the institution had greatly prospered. Chaplain Gill called attention to the necessity of having a separate building for the library and additional ground for the enlargement of the campus. The following officers were elected: President, Dr. J. K. Weaver; Vice President, Chaplain T. A. Gill; Secretary, the Rev. R. B. McDanel; Treasurer, Dr. C. B. Lowe; Chairman of Executive Committee, the Rev. B. MacMackin.

He was a foot-ball player,

He had a struggling mustache,
  Which, of course, he thought was neat.
She was a bit sarcastic
  And only laughed at the frown
That spread upon his countenance,
  When she asked "Is it first down?"

Two annuals will be published by the Seniors of the University of Michigan, one by the fraternity men and the other by the non-fraternity men.

The annual meeting of the Central Inter-Collegiate Press Association was held at Lancaster in the parlors of the American House on Saturday, December 9. The principal item of business was the adoption of a new constitution. It was also decided to hold all subsequent meetings in Philadelphia, unless otherwise ordered, for special reasons. After dinner the following papers were read: "Journalism in the College Curriculum," by T. K. Smith, of Red and Blue, University of Pennsylvania; "Should Editors Be Elected by Popular Vote, or on Account of Competitive Work?" J. Travis Smith, of Georgetown (D. C.) College Journal; "Should a College Publication Be Issued on Individual Responsibility, or on the Basis of Student Body Authority?" M. L. Trexler, of Muhlenberg College, Allentown; "Should a Monthly Be Literary, or for News?" Herman Conrow, of Swarthmore Phoenix, Swarthmore; "The Future of Journalism," Percy L. Hansel, of The Lafayette, Lafayette College, Easton; "How to Maintain a High Literary Standard," A. O. Reiter, of College Student, Franklin and Marshall College, Lancaster. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, J. MacDaniel, Dickinson; Vice President, H. Conrow, Swarthmore; Secretary, M. L. Trexler, Muhlenberg; Treasurer, P. L. Hansel, Lafayette. Mercersburg Monthly, of Mercersburg College, represented by W. E. Hoffheins, was admitted to the association after considerable discussion, it being objected to as being only a preparatory college. BUCKNELL MIRROR was represented at this meeting by the editor in-chief.

Editorial.

Whatever may be said about the criticisms of foot-ball offered in the article on "College Athletics" published in our last issue, they represent the opinions of cool, impartial men, men of experience, whose opinions are of weight and not to be gainsaid. Let our own men speak on the subject, if they will, especially those with ankles permanently enlarged or who have been limping around with a cane for months at a time.

At our next election we should be glad to see a full turnout of all the members ot the Association. Let all come with no interest paramount to the success of Bucknell Mirror, no party or faction but one, and that Bucknell College, no candidates but those chosen on the ground of fitness, all friendship and social affiliations disregarded. The formation of one party compels the formation of another, and parties formed within social lines are especially jealously watched by those outside, preventing some, perhaps, from holding positions justly their due. Come, help in the election, and if your candidate does not win, acquiesce to the will of the majority and help on to higher success.

Probably before our next issue is out and read, another Mirror election will take place. There are important offices to be filled, and perhaps of most importance is that of business manager. The Mirror's financial success during a period of business depression and in spite of the increased cost of bi-monthly issues, has been due in no small measure to the hearty, persevering, efficient labors of our business manager, A. C. Lathrop. We need another man just as good to take his place. Upon whom shall the mantle fall?

If any of our scientific friends feel generously disposed towards our College and feel like giving substantial proof of their generosity, they cannot do it in any better way than by presenting the College with much needed apparatus for the work in Organic Science, in Physics, or more advanced chemical work. Our College has passed the day when mere illustrative apparatus for the lecture table answers the purpose. What we need is modern accurate apparatus for exact scientific work. We have some, but like all other growing colleges we want more. Many of the older graduates visit us and seeing what we have, speak of the advantages we have over them; but, gentlemen, we are no better off now than you were then. Our needs have increased and faster than our advantages.

A liberty in conduct towards each other is accorded to college students which is not given to other citizens. Its origin doubtless dates back to the days when the university faculties had civil authority and sat in judgment in cases of minor offences.

In most American colleges the same freedom from the ordinary restraints of law obtains, in some cases without any judicial oversight or executive higher than opinion among the student body This is, when sifted to its bottom, a high, noble and powerful court. And where else, pray tell, if not in our colleges, should we find a body of men capable of self government? The public demands more of colleges to-day than heretofore. It demands that in public and private the same decorous conduct, the same respect for the rights of personal liberty and of property be rendered by college men and between college men as by ordinary citizens and between ordinary citizens. This is not asking much, it is simply asking that each retain the same regard for law and the rights of others which he had on entering college, and that he do not turn ruffian because he is in college and is one of a class. The past few years have seen quite an advance in this line, but the old spirit still crops out occasionally.

It must stop, if not by the authority of the student body, there are those who are ready and willing to carry such matters into the civil courts. The time has come when any student or body of students who shall appeal to the courts to sustain them in enjoyment of their personal rights, will have the support of the public and of the better element among the student body. Don't interpret this to mean that there shall be no fun, no inter-class contests in college. The demand is simply that at all times, and in all places, and all respects we be gentlemen, respecting the rights of others and defending our own.

MY WIFE.

[THE MIRROR cannot be responsible for the peculiarities of sentiment or composition found in a manuscript of the 21st century. We give it just as found.]

My wife is a hustler. She can transact more business in an hour than most women in three. Since taking the seat in Congress, to which she was elected last Fall, she has been devoting her energies mainly to one object, namely, some recognition at the polls for us poor, down-trodden mortals, the men. And only two nights ago as she was departing for Washington, laden with an immense roll of manuscript and an important-looking grip, she gave me a flying good-bye kiss and said, "I will strike a blow in your behalf. Your own wife will take the shackles from your fettered wrists. The women shall not domineer altogether over the men." Ever since I have been idly dreaming of by-gone events and great things to come from those prophetic words in the future.

I like my wife pretty well, which, perhaps, is natural. Her liveliness, her wit, her ability in debate or public speech especially charm me. Her deep contralto voice is in striking contrast to my piping tenor and is the very thing that elicited my admiration while I was attending the Young Men's Institute where we first met. Now, since I am indulging in reminiscences, I am tempted to disclose a few matters concerning our courtship and marriage which heretofore have remained quite secret.

Let me see—mother sent me to the Institute in the fall of 2043—yes, and that very first term, we, our class, held a reception. The girls invited to be present were chosen from those attending the College nearby and had to be approved by the long, lank, white-whiskered dominie who constituted our principal. Ah! I can see them now as they came trooping into the parlors. I was on the committee of reception that evening and I remember that my heart fluttered just a trifle as a certain guest took my little gloved hand in her own strong and white one. I had sent furtive sidelong glances at her during some of the daily chapel services, but one could not commit such a breach of propriety openly without being campused for a week. Even in those stolen glances, however, I had conceived a liking for her. I thought of her in secret as my heroine. And now this evening how handsome she was! Stylishly dressed in velvet corduroy knickerbockers with silver (perhaps only silver plated) knee buckles, dark velvet coat, snow white dress shirt with great wide frills, wider ruff lying loosely over the shoulders, immaculate cuffs and a jaunty cap above the closely cropped curly hair, she was worthy of anyone's admiration. Black silk stockings and highly polished low shoes completed the attire. Is it any wonder that the rate of my heart beats was increased by two?

Girls have so much freedom in dress. Now we boys could wear only the long regulation frock, fitting close to the chin and surmounted by a narrow upright collar, with a double row of large buttons straight down the front and having large side pockets. I once read, while at the Institute, a book which asserted that formerly men wore trousers, literally and figuratively, but that near the beginning of the 20th century a certain fashionable class of men, called dudes, wore very long frock coats which gradually lengthened into the present frock. At the same time the women who had been hampered for centuries with dresses began to wear divided skirts and similar dresses to enable them to ride bicycles and horseback, and to give them more freedom in general. Thus their present attire was developed. About the same period, the book continued, Women's Rights Associations were formed to secure the right to vote, which previously had been denied. Then, too, they pushed forward in many trades and the liberal professions that many men were forced to withdraw from them in order to save their homes and to properly rear the children now neglected by the women. Finally winning a working majority in Congress they speedily passed laws effectually retiring men to the seclusion of the kitchen or drawing-room. Our principal, Master Squeaks, came into my room rather suddenly while I was reading this, took up the book, knit his brows while looking at it, gravely pushed his bony fingers through his long white whiskers, then turned his eyes on me and solemnly said: "This is the merest nonsense. All such theories have long ago been proved the most absurd myths. Men always have worn dresses or similar garments, as is proved by the statues of the ancient Greeks and Romans. And as for managing government affairs, ever since Eve made Adam eat the apple, woman has bossed every job of any importance. History, poetry, fiction, all prove this. Why sir, it's heaven-ordained; so what's the use of objecting? You must not read such trash or you'll not be reconciled to your sphere in life." So he went away with the ill-fated book and I've not seen it since.

But this digression on dress and government has taken my thoughts away from the reception. These dreams are such vagaries! I knew I had won her that evening, for she told me so much of her past history and plans for the future. She was earning her way through College. The summer previous she was conductor on one of the air ships that make a daily trip between Manhatten and Chicago. Although this was quite remunerative, it proved disagreeable. One day while rounding the projecting point of a cyclone, the blizzard nearly scalped her—the wind was so sharp. Her hair was almost immediately restored by electric air draughts—a treatment in which currents of air, highly charged with electricity, are forced on the affected places—but the romance of the situation was completely taken away. For the next summer she expected a position on the Pneumatic Tube Line which makes ten minute trips between St. Louis and San Francisco. And I may add parenthetically that she gained this position and filled it with credit and profit. I cannot tell all we talked of that evening, but I was charmed with her conversation and we parted on very good terms. I had to give my consent to have her call if Master Squeaks would permit. I did often wish that boys could earn their education. But society is very strict on such matters; boys must be dependent on the incomes of their mammas, and any attempt to free themselves is frowned down as ungentlemanlike.

Our acquaintance ripened into friendship, our friendship became courtship and then—well you know what usually follows. There was scarcely anything of importance to interfere with the natural sequence of events. One young man, however, frequently cast sheep eyes at my sweet-heart and perhaps had designs for by conversation I learned that nearly all young men preferred to be married, accepting the undoubted cares and responsibilities of married life, rather than undergo the uncertain livelihood of "single blessedness." But my rival was a strict adherent to society rules and according to the code no young man could make any advances to a lady, all overtures must come from the opposite sex as was natural and right. Society was very strict on this point also, so beyond a few incidents which I cannot now relate, I was confirmed in my sweetheart's regard. And when school days were over and Ethel established in a nice law practice, we were quietly married.

I frequently heard my mother say that in the days of her youth there were competitive examinations to determine whether the name of the man or of the woman should survive as the family name. By some means, however, the women came out victorious so often that all competition was finally dropped and the woman's name taken by silent consent. Thus my name from the plain Master James Watts became Mister Ethel Dagomarsh. We have had a pleasant wedded life so far. To be sure mending Ethel's socks and sewing buttons on her shirts become monotonous at times and I often sigh for the time when men shall have their rights, though I don't know who'll do the mending then. But I am sure through our Men's Rights Associations and the interposition of right-minded women, as my wife, there are brighter days for us in the fut——

The sudden entrance of my wife speedily brought an end to my day-dreaming. "We've won," she shouted, "freedom is come at last ; the first blow for universal liberty is struck. My bill granting men the right to vote on all matters affecting their own real estate was passed almost unanimously. Hurrah ! But," she slowly added with a puzzled look, "not-many-men-own-real-estate."

THE "EVE" OF PARADISE LOST.

Hawthorne's "New Adam and Eve" in their first day's experience comprehended only the natural. Yet, one feels that toward the close of this day they were beginning to exercise art, and had the second day of roaming been granted them, doubtless art would have so developed that their minds would have ceased longing so much for the clouds and canopy above, and striven more for the unveiling of the many peculiar phenomena which they encountered.

Milton's "Adam and Eve" were in their first days delighted and absorbed only with the natural ; the fruit, flowers, birds, sun, moon and stars, along with mutual adoration was their soul joy. Art, however, soon found its way into their hearts, and especially that of Eve's ; for, had it not, she would never have desired to leave the side of Adam, and to test whether or not she was vulnerable to the darts of the "malicious foe," if perchance she should meet him. We are glad that art is possible ; for, were it not, Adam and Eve would have been as servile as the beasts which were put under their dominion.

It is noteworthy that this art was first developed by Eve ; and though it deceived her, we cannot commend Adam as being of better judgment and more sagacious, for the reason that after Eve's fall he says,

> "And me with thee have ruined, for with thee > Certain my resolution is to die."

We may eulogize him for this act, but what more? Was he in duty bound to Eve more than to the Almighty, who had first and personally forbidden to him this tree of knowledge? He also had spoken to Eve about the "One Easy Prohibition," yet was the second to disregard it, and with much less persuasion than it took the crafty serpent to beguile Eve. Adam was as weak as Eve but not so curious.

But we must away from opposite sex comparison and look at Eve from the standpoint of true womanhood. To compare her with the heroines of Homer or Virgil might be well were they not, as the epics themselves, for a single race of people ; while Eve, as also the entire Paradise Lost, is for all human kind. However, it will be proper and just to place Eve beside our natural woman, remembering all the while that she represents womankind, and see whether or not Milton merits praise from this character.

Physically we see her formed,

> "For softness and sweet attractive grace,"

And,

> "She, as a veil down to her slender waist,
> Her unadorned golden tresses wore
> Dishevelled, but in wanton wringlets waved."
> "Under his forming hand a creature grew,
> * * * * so lovely fair,
> That what seemed fair in all the world seemed now > Mean" * * * * *

Mentally, from Adam's lips, she is so cultured,

> * * "That what she wills to do or say
> Seems wisest, virtuousest, discreetest, best."

She was sufficiently modest and

> * * "Would be wooed, and not unsought be won."

These characteristics are well taken, for we cannot think of the second of creation having other than a perfect physical form, an intellectual cast, a modest demeanor.

If there is anything faulty in the Eve of Paradise Lost, of course, the defect belongs to Milton. The great criticism brought against this character is her being deceived, by a serpent, after having had the frightful dream and also the admonitions from Adam. Now to any thoughtful person, it is known that Eve must be deceived, and that by a serpent, because it is so recorded in the Biblical record. No, Milton cannot be censured here unless we say that he should not have caused the serpent to trouble Eve by the dream, thus making the danger so plain. This argument, however, would be very flimsy ; for, then, a poet would not be allowed to indulge his imagination, and imagination is the half of any poetry, especially of epic. How otherwise could Milton have revealed the art and craft of Satan? How could he have introduced those thrilling, tremulous words of Eve relating the dream, or, those kind, warning, tender, sympathetic replies of Adam? Had Eve not experienced this terrible dream, Milton could not have given us the controversy which arose between our first parents, so full of judgment, not of passion; which was conducted with such reason, not with excitement. Addison says, "From the few particulars" (gathered from Genesis) "Milton has formed one of the most entertaining fables that invention ever produced. It seems to be a complete and full relation of what the other is only an epitome."

We must bear in mind that Eve, as well as Adam, never did unnatural things, as did the Messiah, the Angels and Satan. So then if Eve acted conformably to the woman as we know her, Milton surely merits praise.

We will show that Eve did this, and exquisitely too, in four different ways. (1) Her entire subjectiveness, (2) her desire after a time to have her own way, and being deceived, (3) exulting in her folly until fully realizing her guilt, and then (4) repenting only as woman can.

Listen to the submissive, compliant, humble speeches of Eve, pulling, we sometimes think, wool over the eyes of Adam.

"* * * * O thou for whom
And from whom I was formed flesh of thy flesh,
And without whom am to no end, my guide
And head, what thou hast said is just and right.
For we to him, indeed, all praises owe,
And daily thanks, I chiefly who enjoy
So far the happier lot, enjoying thee
Pre-eminent by so much odds."

Again after Adam has told Eve the need of retiring, and the amount of work necessary to be done on the following day, Eve, docile creature, replies,

"My author and disposer, what thou bidd'st,
Unargued I obey ; so God ordains,
God is thy law, thou mine : to know no more
Is woman's happiest knowledge and her praise.

In this next speech of Eve, while showing the recognition of Adam's superiority, still indicates her charming art.

"Till I espied thee, fair indeed and tall,
Under a platan, yet me thought less fair,
* * * * * * * * *
Than that smooth watery image."

but when

* * "Thy gentle hand
Seized mine, I yielded, and from that time see
How beauty is excelled by manly grace
And wisdom, which alone is truly fair."

Secondly, we are led to believe that Adam made too much of a baby of Eve. He wanted her by his side, fearing lest she pricked her fingers ; but there were no thorns, you say? Well then, possibly, she might faint. No woman to-day will be so babied by her husband, neither would Eve. She did not openly rebel, but with great skill and tact revealed to Adam that he should not consider her a weakling.

Adam's remarks to Eve concerning her departure were very forcible and well put ; yet, "With our judgments, as our watches, none run just alike, yet each believes his own," so Eve had her opinion ; and, to show that it was honest, we will simply quote a part of two or three speeches :

"But that thou should'st my firmness therefore doubt
To God or thee, because we have a foe
May tempt it, I expected not to hear."
* * * * * * * * * *

"His fraud is then thy fear, which plain infers
Thy equal fear that my firm faith and love
Can by his fraud be shak'n or seduced ;
Thoughts, which how found they harbor in thy breast
Adam, misthought of her to thee so dear."

Eve in the following waxes more eloquent and surely her reasoning is well founded :

"If this be our condition, thus to dwell
In narrow circuit strait'nd by a foe,
* * * * * * * * * *
How are we happy, still in fear of harm?"

Again,

"Let us not then suspect our happy state
Left so imperfect by the maker wise,
As not secure to single or combin'd ;
Frail is our happiness, if this be so,
And Eden were no Eden thus expos'd."

We now pass to the third act and note Milton's skill in representing Eve after the fall. So like to life is the passion, selfishness and jealousy now revealed by Eve.

> "O sovran, virtuous, precious of all trees
> In Paradise! of operation blest
> To sapience, hitherto obscur'd, infamed,
> And thy fair fruit let hang, as to no end created."

Thus we see her passion and the following will represent her selfishness:

> "* * * But to Adam in what sort
> Shall I appear? Shall I to him make known
> As yet my change, and give him to partake
> Full happiness with me? or rather not,
> But keep the odds of knowledge in my power
> Without co-partner? so to add what wants
> In female sex, the more to draw his love
> And render me more equal, and perhaps,
> A thing not undesirable, sometime
> Superior; for inferior who is free?"

Now let us observe her jealousy, as many similar instances we have all seen.

> "* * * But what if God have seen,
> And deatn ensue? then I shall be no more,
> And Adam wedded to another Eve,
> Shall live with her enjoying, I extinct;
> A death to think."

But we are to consider, in the fourth place, Eve's repentance. She fell as have all her daughters, and was passionately delighted over what she was experiencing. But, when the true realization of her guilt was revealed, she showed that contriteness of heart and humility of soul, that only woman can show. And, after having tenderly approached Adam, and is repulsed, yea, spurned with upbraidings and indignities which only man can utter, still she, unaffected by these hideous taunts, with tears and disordered tresses, humbly fell embracing his feet, and sought peace and pardon in such ardent, tender words as these:

> "Forsake me not thus, Adam; witness Heav'n
> What love sincere, and reverence in my heart
> I bear thee, and unweeting have offended,
> Unhappily deceived."
> "While yet we live, scarce one short hour perhaps,
> Between us two let there be peace."
> "* * * both have sinned, but thou > Against God only, I against God and thee."

Milton's Eve takes her seat beside those whom we consider to be as near angelic as is possible for human creatures. She is now willing to forgo any pleasure, for, having heard Adam's lamentation that, "In me all posterity stands cursed," she is anxious, desirous to relinquish "love's due rites" and "nuptial embraces sweet." And besides, in her eager longing to rectify, she suggests that they seek death. A thing not commendable, yet natural. Again, after having become reconciled to her loss, she laments on hearing that they must leave the garden:

> "O unexpected stroke, worse than of death!
> Must I thus leave thee, Paradise?"

How natural! yet when pacified, she says to Adam, "but now lead on, in me is no delay."

So we trace Eve from her entire submissiveness to Adam, through a state of variance in which she had her own way; thence her fall and passionate delight at the results, on to her indescribable repentance, and finally to a consecrated obedience to both Adam and God. Her life in every particular is natural, and considering that Eve must be deceived, Milton merits great praise in the disposal of this character. Addison observes that "Milton's art is nowhere more shown than in his conducting the parts of these our first parents. The representation he gives of them, without falsifying the story, is wonderfully contrived to influence the readers with pity and compassion towards them."

Athletics and Chess.

During the winter term, when out-door exercises, such as tennis, baseball and football are out of the question, those athletically inclined, along with those who are not, wend their way towards Tustin Gymnasium three times a week. Such is the required amount of time to be spent in gymnastics, as set down by the faculty. Here all are placed on an equal basis, and receive equal ininstruction whether they be football players or deep students. It is one of the best modes of developing one's body when he does not care much for exercise. The interest taken in gymnasium drills is manifested by the work done by the students in general. Directors Smith and Harper seem determined to give the boys all the chance possible to derive benefit from these drills. There seems to be more activity in the gymnastic work than at any time heretofore. No student should shirk the important duty of developing his body as well as his mind.

At a meeting of the Athletic Association on January 13th a new constitution was adopted, which will do much to place athletics at Bucknell on a higher standard. The choosing of the men of the various teams is left to an advisory board, which is made up of alumni, professors and students. It also requires the payment of $2.50 to become a member of the association, which entitles said member to a ticket admitting him to any or all athletic contests upon our campus. This seems like a large fee, but will be found in the end to be cheapest.

There are prospects of another minstrel show during the present term for the benefit of the baseball team. Bucknell has plenty of talent enclosed within her walls, and that is the proper way to develop it. Besides, it is for a good purpose.

Two simultaneous games of chess and two of checkers are at present being played with Keystone Academy. As the games now stand neither side has any advantage. We hope soon to hear from other colleges.

A jubilee social given at the Baptist church on the 6th, was attended by many of the students. It was held in honor of the 50th anniversary of the church.

Bromley Smith visited Keystone Academy during the vacation. Gardner, '93, and he acted as judges of the annual prize speaking contest of the young men.

Theta Alpha elected for the winter term, Kaufman, President; Wood, Vice President; Collins, Secretary; Schuyler, Treasurer; Strayer, Critic, and Dillon, Curator.

The term election of Euepia resulted in the choice of Pease for President; Hanna, Vice President; B. Smith, Secretary; Snow, Critic; Lesher, Treasurer; and Riemer, Librarian.

With the opening of the winter term the freshman class received three new members: F. L. Camp, of Union city; Ferdinand F. Nelson, of Richmond, Va., and Miss Birdie McHenry, of Exchange, Columbia county.

Prof. and Mrs. Lincoln Hulley came on from Chicago during the holidays. They have taken rooms in the Academy for a time. The college ladies gave them and Prof. and Mrs. Hamblin a reception at the Institute on January 19.

It is not difficult to imagine why Sinette tried so much to detain Suiter when the Sophomores were boarding the train to go to their banquet. On the next similar occasion Miss C—— should make special arrangements so that Sinette may be permitted to keep her in view from another car.

The members of the Student Volunteer Band meet every other Monday evening. The meetings last one hour and begin promptly at 6:30 o'clock. The subject under discussion for the present term is India. This country, its people, customs, government and its religions are studied and discussed from a missionary point of view.

One of the neatest receptions of the season was the one given to Dr. Robert Lowry and wife in the Phi Kappa Psi rooms on the evening of January 6. Dr. Lowry seemed to lay aside all outside matters and come to Lewisburg in the attitude of the student. He always seems to make himself at home and on that account the reception was made all the more pleasant. Those present besides the members of the chapter were Prof. and Mrs. Owens, Prof. and Mrs. W. C. Bartol, Mr. and Mrs. H. G. Dreisbach, Dr. and Mrs. W. L. Gerhart and Mr. W. C. Gretzinger.

On Friday evening, January 12, the Sophomore class held its annual banquet at Hotel Haag, Milton. The Freshmen, on short notice, ran to the Reading station and abducted six of the Sophs. This glorious achievement brought into play an astonishing amount of fisticuffs, and resulted in amusing incidents and bloody noses. Pandemonium was now let loose. Plans were laid in a meeting of tremenduous enthusiasm. Dark night found the plotters taking dire vengeance upon the absent revellers. The husky couch went hurtling thro the gloaming from the battlements. The wooly blanket, the immaculate sheet, and the gorgeous comfortable were bundled without ceremony into boxes and driven with slow music to Milton. Here the orgies were disturbed by the mellow gurgle of the porter. All was not over, however. The industrious Freshies returned to Lewisburg, placarded the streets with posters containing singularly appropriate, though imbecile, witticisms. Plugging the key-holes of the vacant dormies with plaster paris, satisfied the thirst of class spirit. About 3:00 o'clock a. m., the college was awakened by the muttered imprecations and the jeering laughter of the b(l)anquet laden Sophomores. For further particulars see L'Agenda of '95.

At a meeting of the Board of Trustees of Bucknell University the following minute was passed and ordered to be sent to the University Mirror:

The Board of Trustees of Bucknell University desire hereby to place upon record their sense of the great loss they have sustained in the death of Dr. Benjamin Griffith, which occurred October 24, 1893. Dr. Griffith has been a member of this Board since its reorganization in 1882. No member has been more devoted to the interests of the University and of higher education. Not only was he wise in counsel, but self-sacrificing and generous in work and benefactions. Accustomed as we have been to rely upon him, we grieve over his departure from us, and will greatly miss him in all of our future deliberations and efforts. Nor is the loss which has thus befallen us one which was merely public or official. Dr. Griffith was a man who won and held our individual affection, and it is with a deep sense of personal sorrow we enter this minute upon our records. The thought that we shall no more on earth look upon his kindly face or hear his cheering words fills our hearts with a grief like that which attends the departure of a brother. We rejoice that it has been our privilege to know and work with him, and we will ever gratefully cherish his memory.

I certify that the above is a transcript of the minute on Dr. Griffith's death adopted by the Board of Trustees of Bucknell University Jan. 11, 1894. A. I. Rowland, Secretary.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Miss Belle Wilson has entered Geneva College.

Miss Martha Goldy is pursuing a course in art at Drexel Institute.

Miss Catharine Engelbert, of '92, mourns the loss of her father, Mr. A. F. Engelbert, who died suddenly of heart failure.

A pleasant reception was given on Friday evening by the college girls in honor of Prof. and Mrs. Hamblin and Prof. and Mrs. Hulley.

Three examinations in music are now requisite for graduation in the Music School. Two examinations are held at the opening of the winter and spring terms, and the third at the close of the spring term. A post-graduate course has been added.

In addition to the establishment of the infirmary, it was very nice of our thoughtful principal, Miss Larison, to provide a small dispensary of useful medicines for use in case of great emergency.

A French club has been organized by Dr. Aviragnet, which will meet on Friday evenings for the purpose of studying French literature. Attention will be given classic literature, short stories and conversation in French.

We are glad to welcome two former students, Misses Cora Perry and Harriet Sayre, and four new students—Misses McHenry, Exchange; Lily Dungan, Philadelphia; Flora Sigel, Watsontown, and Florence Winters, Hamilton, N. Y.

A course of lectures will be given the Institute on Friday afternoons during the term. The lectures have been arranged as follows: February 3, 9 and 10, "Biblical Literature," by Prof. L. Hulley; February 23, "Out-of-the-Way Places in Our Country," by Dr. Groff; February 30, "Woman: Her Past and Present Condition," by Dr. Aviragnet.

ACADEMIC NEWS.

[S. J. CLEELAND, Correspondent.]

All the boys have returned from vacation.

We are glad to welcome the new students among us.

The boys recently spent a very pleasant evening at the Baptist.

The Y. M. C. A. started out this term with a good meeting. Let everyone attend regularly.

Our respected friend Case has fully recovered from the "grip" and is again about his daily duties.

By the appearance of some of the Cadites one would think that the shaving of mustaches was in vogue.

A racking pain runs through my brain
As though my head would rend, sir;
My back is broke, I'm nearly choked,
Can this be "influenzir?"

The Third Form is to have a preliminary contest for the purpose of selecting nine students who will compete in a final contest for the Third Form declamation prize.

Adelphia's officers for this term are, viz: President, Bell; Vice President, Wilkes; Chaplain, Wragg; Secretary, Bayard; Treasurer, Mitchell; First Critic, Levis; Second Critic, Lindemann; Sergeant-at-Arms, Cober, and Censor, Meeker.

Personal.

'54. Robert Lowry, D. D., and George Frear, D. D., attended the Jubilee services of the Lewisburg Baptist church, and took part in the exercises. Much of the music used was of Dr. Lowry's composition.

'60. Governor Pattison has appointed Wm. A. Marr, of Ashland, to be trustee of the Ashland Miner's Hospital, vice Gen. Wm. Lilly, deceased.

'62. Rev. A. J. Rowland, D. D., is the editor of the Senior Quarterly, international Sunday School lessons.

'63. Rev. W. W. Case is now located at West Hoboken, N. J.

'69. Hon. Martin Bell, of Hollidaysburg, was recently installed President Judge of the Blair county courts.

'69. Rev. William H. Shermer, of Elizabethport, N. J., has made arrangements for bringing to Boston the figurehead of the United States frigate Chesapeake. Mr. Shermer found the figurehead in the British Navy Yard at Halifax, N. S. The bones of "Don't-give-up-the-ship" Lawrence, who was wounded in the battle which makes this figurehead famous, rest at Halifax.

'71. Rev. James Rainey is now the very successful pastor of the Laceyville Baptist church. They recently completed a new house for worship. Rev. Rainey preached the sermon at Jackson, an old pastorate, upon the ordination of their new pastor.

'90. Eveline J. Stanton, for three years Lady Principal of Keystone Academy, is now attending the University of Chicago. She is making a specialty of History and Literature.

'91. The Lewisburg papers cantain occasional letters of much interest from Cuba. They are written by John T. Hyatt, Vice Consul to that country.

'92. Miss H. Ophelia Staufft is teaching in Bethel Female College, Ky.

'92. Willard A. Lanning is a Professor in Mt. Pleasant Institute. He spent part of his vacation at Lewisburg.

'92. John U. Wagner has resigned the principalship of one of Scranton's schools, and has accepted a position as editor in that city. D. W. Phillips, Ex. '97, occupies his position in the school.

Ex. '93. H. W. Sneck and C. E. Schuster, ex. '91, were recently admitted to the bar at Rochester, N. Y.

Ex. '93. Miss Florence Pannebaker is teaching Mathematics and Elocution in the Lewistown public schools.

Ex. '95. William C. Scotney is a real estate and insurance agent, located at 1702 South street, Philadelphia.

Ex. '95. Robert Simpson has entered Cornell University, class of '96, for a course in civil engineering.

College News.

The foot-ball season's over,
The sweaters laid away,
The "full-back" and the "touch down"
All have seen their day.

The boys, who through the fall term
Have played from morn till night,
Now find they're much admired
As the social carpet-knight.

But alas! with features pallid,
They seek the barber's shop,
And bid him clip the treasured hair
Which saved them many a knock.

The college girls are mourning
Those locks which won renown;
They'd like to have a sample
To tie with white and brown. —Ex.

The authorities at Harvard consider five hundred dollars a year an ample sum for a student to spend at that college. In the class of '91 were forty men who worked their way through, and twenty-five spent less than $500. Three spent over $3,000 a year, but these were far from being the best scholars.

Make life a ministry of love, and it will always be worth living.—Browning.

Once upon a midnight dreary I was polling weak and weary,
Over many a buried verb, root and myth of forgotten lore,
While I nodded, nearly napping, suddenly there came a tapping,
Next a rapping, then a snapping of the panels of my door.
"'Tis the Sophomores," I muttered, "gaining entrance at my door."
How I wished that night was o'er.

Ah! distinctly, I remember of that night in bleak December,
How eleven living members much like ghosts came through the door;
How their spectral faces thrilled me, how that icy water chilled me,
As I, rowing with tooth-picks, sang "Pull, sailor, for the shore."
But one single thought consoled me as I sang as ne'er before,
Next year I'll be a Sophomore. —The Lafayette

The medical department of the University of Michigan have evolved the following yell:

"We diagnose, we prognose,
We cure you, every man!

Are the docs of Michigan!
Wah hoo! Wah hoo! Wah hoo again!
Michigan, Michigan, Medicine Man!"

Ambition is a balloon which carries no parachute.—Elmira Gazette.

BUSINESS NOTICES.

The value of a college journal as an advertising medium is oftentimes underestimated. Business men are inclined to judge the value of the number of copies of each issue. Hence we hear it sometimes said that college papers are of little worth to advertisers. The only point urged to substantiate this statement is the smallness of the issue.

Let us take a college journal—the MIRROR, for instance—which sends out an average issue of about 600 copies semi-monthly during the college year. Suppose the college to be small and only 150 members of the college are subscribers, 275 copies are sent to alumni and friends outside of the town, 75 copies taken in the town, and 100 go to exchanges, advertisers and reading rooms. Many of the college men send their copies home as soon as they are through with them. Fraternities, societies and reading rooms place them on their tables, where large numbers look through the papers. The issue of 600 copies is without doubt read by not less than 3,000 persons, and these readers are educated people—people of the best class, whose patronage is worth having. College men are also inclined to favor those who advertise in the college journal. New students are advised where to deal by those in charge of the paper, and those places are the advertisers in the journal. The college journal is not the place to advertise catch-penny schemes, but it is decidedly one of the best mediums for advertising what people need. Many business men realize the truth of this, and advertise largely in college journals. Among such advertisers are some of the best known houses in the country. We have seen numerous testimonies from advertisers as to the value of such mediums, and who continue their "ads" from year to year.

The MIRROR management acknowledge the receipt from the Pope Manufacturing Company, of Boston, Mass., of a neat and serviceable desk calendar. The calendar is artistically embellished, and contains some suitable words concerning the value of bicycle riding on each day's leaflet. A blank space is left for making note of engagements, etc., for every day. It speaks well for the enterprise of this company, whose Columbia bicycles have a world-wide reputation.

It was our privilege recently to visit the extensive works of the Keystone Watch Case Company, of Nineteenth and Brown streets, Philadelphia. Their watch given in exchange for advertising in the MIRROR is a gem. Their "Non-pull out" watch cases are unquestionably the best made. The company will accept our thanks for their courteous treatment and the prompt settlement of their advertising account.

Readers of the MIRROR, do not fail to read the advertising columns. Only the best and most reliable advertisements appear in the MIRROR. You will find in these columns things of interest to you. Write or call on our advertisers for what you need in their line, and we can assure you of satisfactory and courteous treatment.

Editorial.

THIS IS OUR last appearance before re-organization of the board of editors. The usual words of apology and self-congratulation we will allow our readers to supply. New persons will be added to the board before re-organization. We hope that these persons may be of the most talented and that in organization each may find his proper place.

ONE OF THE hardest places in which to render service satisfactory to all parties is as editor of the "Local Column." Each student likes to see his name in print. Every time he preaches, visits, makes some funny error in recitation, or does, or is connected in any way with something outside the ordinary routine of daily life, he feels that mention should be made of it in the "Local Column." We have no fault to find with this desire for publicity. The accompanying modesty is the source of trouble. The "Local Editor" is neither omnipresent nor omniscient. If you aspire after frequent public mention, kindly write out your doings and hand them to the "Local Editor," or, if modesty forbid such procedure, trade off with your chum, write out items of interest concerning him and he in return may act reporter for you.

THE ADVANTAGES of slang are well brought out by the following incident. A young lady asked for a new slang expression, on being given the famed exclamation of Benjamin Franklin, during the French Revolution, "Ca ira," she used it upon every occasion, suitable or otherwise. When she was taken to task for such promiscuous use of the expression, her reply was, "Oh! you must understand what I mean."

A TRUE RELATION between teacher and pupil is essential to the highest development of the student and the greatest efficiency of the teacher. There is necessary, on the part of the teacher, knowledge, judgment of character and ability, authority, sympathy, patience and perseverance. It is essential that the student feel towards the teacher as towards a guide under whom he has placed himself for an arduous journey. He must feel confidence in the teacher as in one who knows the road, who sees the end from the beginning. If the road be rough and disagreeable, his confidence should encourage with the belief that it leads to some desirable end. He should feel reverence for the authority and character of the teacher and render implicit obedience in all matters not affecting obligations to higher authority.

We make this brief sketch of what should be in order to contrast it with what is, especially on the part of some students. The proper relation of mutual confidence is changed by the student's action into one of mutual suspicion, the teacher suspects that the student uses unfair means, and the student suspects that the teacher is watching him and uses the more cunning in his deception. The whole relation degenerates morally and becomes a sort of game in which there is no remorse nor loss of self-esteem, except upon occasions of detection, and then the disapproval of self is on account of allowing one's self to be caught, not from any moral consideration. How much the marking system is responsible for this vice, or wherein the full remedy lies, we do not know. This much we feel sure of, all students are honest much of the time, a majority are honest all the time. The vice might be noticeably checked by proper sentiment on the part of those who are honest. It should not be a matter of indifference among students, and those who are honest should at least be as free in expression of their sentiments in this regard as the others are in boasting of deception.

THE TERM "Grind" is a well known appellation among students. The habits of the "Grind" are too thoroughly known to bear description, and he has some most excellent habits and traits of character. We wish to speak of another species of the genus student, a species as well-marked and distinct as the one mentioned above, but as yet not distinguished by a suitable name. We refer to that class of students who depend upon their natural smartness, who do not study and boast that they do not. These fellows are really too smart already, they know more than the "Prof." It is a shame that they should be kept in "durance vile." These fellows neither do good to themselves nor to anyone else. They are a noisy brood and exert a pernicious influence over those who are not proof against the charms of their seeming brightness. As for themselves they are not forming habits of study, not training themselves so that they can attend to any subject which they may choose, nor is their moral conduct in recitations such as would lead them to form habits of acting in accordance with right. What a pity that we have no suitable name by which to distinguish them! Perhaps their rarity is the reason for lack of name.

NO TIME WAS more propitious for the organization of a first-class glee club than the present. Usually there is a lack here, as in other schools, of sufficient voices to sustain the tenor parts. But now there are quite a number who can ably sing the high notes. As for the other parts, probably there has never been an excessive dearth. And at present we can boast of having many voices sufficiently trained for glee club purposes. The feeling, too, that the University should have such an organization is quite strong on the part of the students.

The value of such an organization can hardly be overestimated. Aside from the pleasure and profit arising to the individual members who engage in this work and participate in the trips abroad, there is a benefit accruing directly to our Alma Mater from the advertising which a glee club affords. And it is advertising among the very class most desirable and profitable for the University to reach.

In organizing such a club we should not stop at eight (tho' a glee club of that number is better than to have none), nor even twelve voices. We can as easily have sixteen or twenty, if those who can sing will devote a little of their time to it. With a club of this number combined with the mandolin and guitar club, already, as we understand, quite proficient, Bucknell would be able to give an entertainment equal to those given by any combination of kindred college clubs in the country.

What is needed is a capable leader who is not a member of the student body. And this statement does not at all reflect on the ability of our musicians. For without such a leader much of the time that ought to be spent in ardent practice is frittered away and disappointments and discouragements invariably follow. On the other hand one, who by his position can command the respect and in a sense the obedience of the members of the club, has in his power the success of the organization. An enthusiastic leader would lend new interest to every selection to be learned.

If anything at all is to be done, organization should be effected at once and a leader chosen. Organize with an object in view. Plan a trip for the Easter vacation and bend all efforts for the accomplishment of the plan. Put spirit and enthusiasm into the work and success is assured.

GLIMPSES OF SARATOGA.

In the eastern part of New York, nestling near the foot hills of the Adirondacks, is one of America's most popular summer resorts, the famous Saratoga.

It is situated in one of those picturesque portions of the Empire State on which nature seems to bestow her charms with lavish hand. On every side are rolling hills and broad meadows, while toward the south gleams a blue lake, dashing its tiny waves against the shore with an incessant murmur. In the far distance loom the verdant mountains of Vermont, and on the north MacGreagor lifts its lofty crest, proud that on its brow the spirit of Ulysses Grant took flight. Around every rock and tree historic associations cluster, for at Saratoga Burgoyne laid down the British arms in unqualified surrender; and, across the fields, a noble shaft points heavenward, a constant reminder of the memorable victory. Such is the setting of this brilliant gem of wealth and fashion.

Saratoga itself is a town with a population of about ten or twelve thousand in winter, but from thirty-five to forty thousand in summer. It is tastefully laid out in broad streets, lined with grand hotels and charming homes. Of the former the most splendid are the Windsor, United States and Grand Union. The Windsor is an imposing frame structure with numerous towers, and, placed on a slight eminence, commands a fine prospect of the surrounding country. Its appointments are very elegant, and within its walls every luxury may be obtained.

The United States is the largest hotel in this metropolis, and doubtless one of the best equipped on our continent. It is constructed of brick, built around a beautiful court, in which sparkling fountains and bright flowers make the spot a veritable fairy-land. Extensive piazzas surround this enclosure, where frequently musicians delight the guests with sweet melody. The entrance to the hotel proper is paved with marble in Romanesque fashion, and columns of the same material support the lofty ceiling. The parlors are spacious, furnished richly in white, gold and blue.

The Grand Union, a very fine building, was the property of the late A. T. Stewart, and now under the management of his estate. It closely resembles the United States in size and appearance, and like it possesses an inviting court and broad porches. Often, in summer, evening garden parties are given in these enclosures, at which the wealth and beauty of all America is displayed in the magnificent toilets and fair forms of charming women and "brave men." On these occasions electricity with its magic power, sweet blossoms, and brilliant music produce a scene of rare beauty, and "all goes merry as a marriage bell." The private homes of Saratago are especially attractive, presenting almost every material and style of architecture. In the most recent houses, massive gray stone is employed with good effect, but many of the most unique dwellings are built of wood. Velvet lawns prevail on every hand, while the creeping ivy and luxuriant woodbine relieve the monotony of brick and stucco, and grand, old trees shade many of the avenues. About one mile and a half from the town proper is the estate of Judge Hilton, an heir of A. T. Stewart. This is an extensive domain, affording a drive of some miles. The mansion of the Judge, sheltered by the wealth of foliage, is an attractive affair of gray stone, adorned with stucco work in dark red, somewhat resembling the houses of Holland. Around it are several smaller cottages for the accommodation of guests and servants, while near these and scattered among the thickly set trees are beautiful pieces of statuary. The whole estate is surrounded by a high wall with massive gates.

One of the most pleasing features of Saratoga is the park which occupies the central portion of the town. This is an enclosure of several acres, rendered delightful by artificial lakes, gorgeous flowers and pretty pavilions. Every afternoon during "the season," a musicale is here given when fair debutants and stately dowagers appear in elaborate costumes, displaying the skill of Redfern and Worth. Perhaps it may be asked, why do so many people visit Saratoga, as it is neither in the mountains nor by the sea? Ostensibly this great assembly is gathered for the purpose of recreation, and receiving benefit from the mineral waters with which the place is highly favored. The earth in this part of New York abounds in mineral springs, and Saratoga is especially fortunate in this respect. The best known waters are the Hawthorne and Congress, which are sent to all parts of our country, but in addition to these several other varieties exist, differing more or less in pungency and flavor. A place of much interest to those visiting this resort is the Indian encampment, where the "red man" displays his wares and excites the curiosity of old and young by his clothing and manner of life. Art also finds a favorable abode in the centre of fashion, and one of its latest acquisitions is a house arranged and fashioned precisely in the old Pompeian style. At every point evidences of culture and refinement are revealed ; what Newport is to Rhode Island, Saratoga is to New York. Although gay, worldly, frivolous, often verifying the words of the "wise man," "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity," it is beloved by rich and poor, and so long as its glory endures will be the pride of the Empire State.

MAUD ELIZABETH HANNA.

CHAUCER'S PARSON.

A nation represents multitudinous life. As individuals change, so nations change. Civilization drives out the baser and advances loftier standards. As the plane of morals rises higher, the forms of religion become fewer. Yet these are all outward forms—results from an inner cause.

Man's nature remains the same from age to age, and especially in that it is constantly seeking the better. This longing is the cause ; the scenes of to-day, in contradistinction from those of yesterday, are the result. Consequently, the true part embodies the ideal of man's nature in the real.

Chaucer has done this in his description of the "Persoun." We say that the parson is ideal because we recognize his virtue, and find no fault in his character. It is only natural, therefore, to regard him as a model parson for the close of the nineteenth century.

The character of "this good man of religion" was made up of such elements as would befit any preacher of the gospel. Chaucer tells us that he was a learned man. The delicate, easily impressionable soul requires as competent a physician as the coarse fibres of the flesh. Keen insight is needed ; an intellect sharpened to penetrate difficult problems ; a judgment trained to detect the real amid the feigned ; a mental vision that sees beyond the visible and beholds the unseen. All these elements learning brings in greater or less degree ; some particular quality predominating, perhaps, by reason of natural gift, but all strengthened. We may reasonably look for one or more of these developed traits in the "Persoun." In the line, "If gold ruste, what shulde iren doo?" we see a naturally bright intellect, trained to find the truth and to express it with good judgment, keenly and introspectively.

Such a mind is powerful in teaching, whether it be for right or wrong. But this man's wisdom was based upon and directed by the "true source of wisdom." His preaching was not a collection of fine-spun theories, with no better foundation than the fancy of his own cultured mind, calculated to win for himself the applause of men, but "Christe's Gospel truly wolde he preche." His penetrating vision made known to him the fact that "Christ's Gospel" was all sufficient; he needed to add nothing—that it had its specific purpose—he must take nothing away ; that the "law of the Lord was perfect," hence he must not change it. In short, he was orthodox. Having learned the truth, he preached it truly and taught it devoutly to his people.

Thus far the description presents to us a theologian, cold, unfeeling, intellectual. In his presence the mothers would feel an unbearable restraint, and the little children would run away in fear. But Chaucer has a most happy faculty of compounding mental traits with bodily appearance. We need no better picture of a face, through which the good man's soul was always shining, than in these lines : "Benigne he was, and wonder diligent, and in adversitie ful pacient." The word "benigne" would be belittled by further comment. We read in his face no weak lines ; they had no chance to develop in his busy days, even if they had ever faintly shadowed themselves. A "pacient" face is not a sign of weakness ; rather, it tells the story of wonderful victories in hard-fought battles which less strong minds would have lost. "Patience were not a virtue if it did not overcome."

His was not a life passed in the study, the only results of which were to be seen on Sunday in the faces of his hearers as they calmly slept through the long discourse, which was as irrelevant to the needs of their daily lives as evolution is to sowing seed.

> "But rather wolde he geven out of dowte,
> Unto his poure parisschens aboute,

Of his offrynge, and eek of his substaunce,
He cowde in litel thing have suffisance."

He knew the home lives of his people, one by one, rich and poor alike. And the frequent appearance of that "benigne" face, and the homely words to fit into the cares of life and lighten them, were worth more than the choicest thoughts which might go in one ear and out of the other, spoken to them from the high pulpit platform, so far above them that he seemed to be in another world.

He practiced what he preached, or rather, "First he wroghte, and afterward he taughte." He was a "noble ensample to his sheep." A leader, a true shepherd who loved his sheep; not an hireling.

With all his patience in adversity and benignity of countenance, he was active in putting down evil. He was not afraid to chide a man, even though the man were rich. Rich and poor were alike the recipients of his favors and of his warnings. This fact is another proof of strong character. "He waytede after no pomp ne reverence, ne maked him a spiced conscience."

But the crowning element is his sincerity:

"To drawe folk to heven by fairnesse,
By good ensample, was his busynesse,
Christes love, and his apostles twelve,
He taught, and ferst he folwed it himselve."

This sincerity and the realization of his high calling, that of saving souls, are enough of themselves to commend him as a model. The other elements are but natural outgrowths.

We are glad that Chaucer has preserved this man's life for us. The picture of the nobly simple, grandly meek "persoun" is so refreshing after seeing the gilded sham, the "whited scepulchers," the Monk and Frere!

He is a bit of life from the every-day, common folk, who, despite their simplicity and trustfulness, have sent forth the world's noblest men. And we hope that the coming students, as they read Chaucer's delightfully real sketches, may look about them and say, as we do to-day: "Such a man as the 'Persoun' exists, not only in the ideal, but we have him in flesh and blood, fulfilling his ministry of 'good deeds'"

TOWN CLOCKS.

In a small town of Pennsylvania, in the lofty tower of a church, dwells a town clock. In most respects it resembles other town clocks which one finds in almost every town of importance; but there is one feature which makes this particular clock of special interest.

This distinguishing feature is a certain independent manner in which this clock conducts itself. Its brown stone home is built on a corner lot of a much-traveled street. If one walking westward toward the clock were to note the time, and, after turning the corner to go southward, should again glance at its face, he would doubtless be impressed, as was the writer, with the rapidity of time's flight. Calculate as he will, it has taken him ten minutes to turn the corner. This clock is a humorist in its way. As the pedestrian attempts to account for this unwonted spurt of time and glances again at the clock—for he half feels that he has been imposed upon—the clock returns the look with a gravity that is droll. A careful examination reveals the fact that to three-fourths of the town the clock points off the same time, while to the remaining one-fourth it delivers a different message.

There is something sad in it all. For it suggests a man with many strong personal traits, but whose character is marred by one grave fault It suggests a man whose influence is great and whose possibilities for good are many, but in whose advice or judgment one may not wholly trust, unless he knows upon which side to approach him. Reflection upon this feature, so at variance with the wanted regularity of a public timekeeper, led to the following thoughts on town clocks in general.

A town clock is a public character of great note. He is looked up to by all, not only because of his high position, but also because of the reputation he has gained for reliability. Like the Squire in the old New England village, he is known to all. Every man, woman and child regard him as a friend. He looks benignly upon every one, like a great hearted philanthropist, smiling upon all alike. When he speaks, it is with the same voice to young and old, from which there is no appeal. His voice is firm and strong, filling the laggard with dismay as he looks at his neglected work, and yet it falls with sweet accents upon the ear of the faithful laborer as it tells him of the day's toil ended.

As men leave their homes, they look up into his face for a morning greeting, and are cheered and strengthened by the sight. The regularity and precision with which he labors day after day inspire confidence, as does the example of every man who works quietly and steadily upon the task assigned him. What is the secret of this constant, regular work? It is identical in clock and man. In the clock, hidden from the eye, is the mainspring, the generator and supporter of action, and this is guided and restrained by the regulator. In the man this mainspring is a controlling purpose regulated by a strong will.

In sunshine and in storm the town clock goes firmly and steadily on. At times when darkness covers everything and the storm rages violently, his voice sounds forth clear and distinct, and er, sitting in the shelter of their homes, are reassured. Seldom does the storm conquer and cause the faithful hands to cease in their work, and only for a short time does it rest; soon it is again doing its work with wonted regularity, like some strong man whom only the severest storms overwhelm and who, when the first shock is over, quietly resumes his task. Day after day the town clock delivers its lessons, and finds, as does every teacher, some apt pupils but more who are careless and indifferent.

A FEBRUARY EFFUSION.

This message, honey-sweet,
Sent young Cent-a-line
To Miss Marguerite
As a valentine.

I send a message, love:
Read each tender line.
O thou white-winged dove,
Be my valentine.

Others send them, too,
Bowing at thy shrine,
But to me be true.
Sweet, my valentine.

O what joy to me
Should thy heart incline
To my humble plea,
Be my valentine!

What a raptured bliss,
Shouldst thou, love divine,
All I mean by this,
Be my valentine!

How my heart would thrill,
Boundless joy be mine,
If thou saidst, "I will
Be thy valentine."

Athletics and Chess.

The Academy base ball team expects to start out early and do effective work. They have elected Mr. Purdy manager and Mr. Bayard captain.

The base ball manager is already at work arranging dates for the coming season. We hope to see better playing and better results than heretofore. Several have already begun practice in the gymnasium.

The annual minstrel show for the benefit of base ball is now an almost assured fact. The glee club under the leadership of Mr. R. B. Davidson, '94, has been re-organized and will do all in their power to make it a success. This should be made a standing custom for years to come in order to aid the base ball manager in putting the team on a firm financial foundation.

Thus far during this term a great deal of interest is manifested in the work of the gymnasium. The new students especially have taken great interest in this line, which, if it continues, proves that Bucknell will have a better class of athletes than heretofore. The student should not go to gymnasium drill and enter the classes simply because he is compelled to. He should aim to do everything in neat form, that he may present a good appearance. To this end all should strive to make the exhibition at the end of the term not only interesting, but also to excel the one given last year. It is necessary for each to do his best to participate in the exhibition. The Physical Directors will gladly aid any who fall short in any part of the work. Those who are the best gymnasts will be chosen for the exhibition, regard being had also for attendance.

Local.

E. R. Myers will enter class '97 next term.

F. D. Finn still sports his World's fair uniform.

W. A. Crawford sings in the Presbyterian choir.

T. S. Fretz recently visited friends in New York state.

T. L. Josephs has been invited to deliver a lecture before the Farmers' Institute.

F. O. Schub is taking honor work in metaphysics.

Professor Perrine preached in Newberry, January 21.

L. W. Baldwin is making a special study of Shakespeare.

Perhaps Wynkoop could give Ware a few hints on Beardology.

William Wilson teaches a class in the Lutheran Sunday School.

E. McVitty Green, ex. '95, visited friends in College on the 21st.

W. B. Sheddan, a few days ago, visited his parents in Pottsgrove.

C. W. Williams is quite an expert in playing his part in the orchestra.

F. I. Sigmund is one of the leading singers of the M E. church choir.

W. W. Irwin drives several miles to and from the University every day.

C. F. McMann gave a very able address before the Y. M. C. A. a week or two ago.

H. S. Schuyler, although taking five studies, finds time for his usual afternoon nap.

Messrs. Pease and Ware have changed from the Neyhart to the Augstadt Boarding Club.

David Phillips sprained his ankle quite seriously while exercising in the gymnasium.

At an oyster supper given by Mr. F. Finn on the 20th, a Keystone Academy Club was organized.

Dr. Harris occupied the pulpit of Rev. D. C. Hughes, Scranton, while the latter was in Lewisburg.

Barner, '97, occupies the pulpit of the Northumberland Baptist church, formerly held by E. C. Pauline.

W. M. Vastine still attempts to amuse the professors by getting off an occasional joke in the class room.

C. J. Berger had a narrow escape from a catastrophe of no small moment. His chum recently received a "box."

A. C Lathrop, the hustling business manager of the MIRROR, is convalescing from a severe cold. He says it is not la grippe, but only an old-fashioned cold.

Revs. W. Ellis, Muncy, and R. Catterall, Watsontown, were visitors at the College, January 18.

Hon. Rudolph Blankenburg lectured Thursday, February 1, in Bucknell Hall on "Russia and the Great Famine of '92."

Rev. T. A. Gill, D. D., '65, has presented a complete set of Lowell's works to the literary department of our library.

Douglas gave several of his friends a royal treat a few evenings since. Some of the toothsome dainties had come all the way from Scotland.

Rev. E. C Pauling visited College on the 19th. He was on his way to New York where he expects to enter a training school for missionaries.

S. R. Wood and J. W. Davis at a recent meeting of the Theta Alpha Literary Society vividly rendered a scene from Shakespeare's King Henry VI.

B. B. Ware and H. T. Colestock were elected delegates to represent the College Y. M. C. A. at the District Convention to be held at Sunbury soon.

Ezra Allen expects to attend the International Convention of the Student Volunteer Movement, to be held at Detroit, Michigan, February 28 to March 4.

W. A. Kauffman was the happy recipient of a gift tendered him by the other members of the Anderson Club. Mr. Kauffman has been caterer of the club for several terms.

F. R. Strayer adds considerable interest to the Literary exercises of Theta Alpha by his judicious criticisms. The office of Critic is one of the most important in any Literary Society.

J. D. Macnab has been spending his spare moments in compiling a joke book, drawing his material from medical almanacs. Giffin will be sole agent for the work when published.

W. E. Hall, learning that Demosthenes and many other great orators never wore mustaches, forthwith applied the razor to his own upper lip. It is wonderful what ambition will cause a man to do!

Under the auspices of the Montandon Baptist church a successful oyster supper was given Saturday evening, 20th. Mr. Schub, the pastor, secured the attendance of many students from the "Hill" and Institute.

The class in English History is hampered even more than the class in American Constitutional History was last fall. There are but four or five original authorities in our library with which to corroborate the statements of the text book.

The amount of reading done by the students is increasing in proportion to the encouragement the department of literature receives. A much larger number of students read in the library room and take books therefrom than did two years ago.

The sermon on the "Day of Prayer for Colleges" was delivered Thursday, January 25, by Rev. Lemuel Moss, D. D., LL. D. In the evening Dr. Moss lectured in Bucknell Hall on the "Christian Scholar and His Obligations." During the afternoon there was a prayer meeting led by Prof. Hulley.

Friday evening, January 26, a reception was tendered Professor and Mrs. Hulley, and Professor and Mrs. Hamblin by Phi Gamma Delta. The members of the University faculty were invited to partake of their hospitality. Among those present from abroad were Miss May Peck, Scranton, and Miss Carrie Lloyd, Phoenixville.

H. M. Pease, who has hitherto been a very regular attendant to the Pine Grove Mission, sent a note to one of the young ladies of the Mission and asked her to take his class, giving as his excuse for absence I Chron. XIX, 5, "Tarry at Jericho until your beards be grown, then return." Imagine his chagrin when she replied with Ezekial V, 1.

At the Farmer's Institute, held in Lewisburg, 16th and 17th, Prof. Owens gave an address on "My Experience in Buying a Cow." Dr. Groff informed the audience that it was possible to "Raise Two Crops From the Same Soil in the Same Year. On the 17th, after a heated discussion on "Silos" and "Short-horned Cattle," Dr. Perrine lectured on "Fallacies About Money." In the evening Prof. Owens gave an illustrated lecture on "Water."

The MIRROR association held its semi-annual meeting on Saturday morning, February 3, at which the following editors were elected: Hughes and Vastime, '93; Hanna and Schuyler, '95; Brown '96, and Kunkle '97. Officers also were elected for one year: President, Stevens; Vice President, ——; Secretary, Jackson. Mr. J. B. Suiter was elected Manager of the MIRROR for a term of one year. In view of the splendid financial report of the late business manager, Mr. Lathrop, it was unanimously decided to grant him $25.00 in addition to the usual commission. The report showed that the balance in the treasury was very good in spite of the prevailing financial distress and notwithstanding the increased cost of bi-monthly issues.

From the Biblical World we take the following: "A new professorship in Hebrew and Biblical Literature was founded this year at Bucknell University. President J. H. Harris announced last year that such a department was needed and must come, and through his personal efforts an endowment fund was started to equip it. By action of the Board of Trustees last June, the chair was established, and Rev. Lincoln Hulley, Fellow in Semitics in the University of Chicago, was called to it. Work has begun this year under the most favorable circumstances. The courses in English Bible will be supplemented by lectures on the literature of the Bible, Hebrew life and thought, Hebrew institutions, Hebrew schools of thought, the types of Hebrew literature, literary forms of expression, great men, ideas, and movements in Hebrew history, and the influences of the English Bible on English institutions and civilization. Professor Lincoln Hulley, a graduate of Bucknell and Harvard and formerly an instructor in Bucknell, is known in Pennsylvania as a man of energy and scholarship. He began his Semitic training in the summer schools of the American Institute of Sacred Literature, and has since continued it as a fellow in the University of Chicago and as an instructor in the Institute of Sacred Literature. The general verdict in Pennsylvania is that in this matter Bucknell has taken a step forward. She is fast winning recognition among graduate schools for quality of work and progressive scholarship, and she has the distinction of being among the first to respond to the awakening in Hebrew study."

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

The seniors have presented as their annual gift to the school, a number of books.

The two classes in gymnastics propose to give an entertainment the latter part of the term in Commencement Hall.

A much enjoyed social event was the reception tendered the Association by the Academy Y. M.

C. A. Refreshments were served, after which were given toasts, all bearing on the subject, "An Awakening in Our School."

The Y. W. C. A. have issued cards containing topics, references and names of leaders, for the weekly prayer meetings.

Miss Gertrude Myers, a former college student, is teaching Latin and Mathematics in the public schools of Durango, Colorado.

The last week brought three most welcome guests, Miss Carrie Lloyd, of '90, and Misses Frances Montgomery and Mayme Peck, of '92.

The French club has begun the transalation of the French drama, Athalie, while the Shakespeareans are, with much enthusiasm, studying Hamlet.

An oyster supper, for the benefit of the Montandon Baptist Sunday school, was well attended by the young ladies. All speak in praise of the delicious supper.

The recent character sketch of the well known author, Walter Besant, in the Review of Reviews, gives some account of his life, as senior professor of mathematics in the Royal College of the Island of Mauritius. While there he wrote, "They were Married," a story of the island under the name of Palmiste, in which each character is drawn from real life. Dr. Aviragnet was professor of languages in the Royal College for some months during Walter Besant's profesorship, and he gives us some pleasant reminiscences of his life there.

The following production was suggested to the mind of a Senior by a straw-ride to Vicksburg :

Saturday night,
Girls quite
Spoiling for some fun ;
No snow
Or beau,
What is to be done?

Big hack,
Straw stack,
Backs up to the door ;
Pile in,
What a din,
Always room for more.

Horns blow,
Off we go,
"Vicksburgh" is the cry ;
Songs sweet,
Horses fleet,
Swiftly on we fly.

Not long
Till the throng
Filled the shining hall ;
Supper hot,
Quickly got,
There's a feast for all.

Evening past
All too fast,
Homeward must we go?
"Rah ! Rah ! Rem !
Bucknell Sem ! !"
Who says the girls are slow ?—A. J. L.

ACADEMIC NEWS.

[S. J. CLEELAND, Correspondent.]

We welcome Mr. Flint's return.

The Preps. make a fine showing in the Gymnasium.

The chorus rendered recently in the Baptist church, under the leadership of Dr. Aviragnet, has been highly praised by the Cad. students.

The success of the Academy Foot-Ball Team last season, was, in a great measure, due to the able management of Mr. Purdy and Mr. Elliott's good captaincy.

Immeasurable is the amount of profound instruction that Dr. Moss has imparted unto us. His Godly thoughts and noble exhortations will ever be cherished in our hearts.

Hermania's officers for this term are : President, Slifer ; Vice President, Martin ; Chaplain, Kulp ; Secretary, Hutchinson ; Treasurer, Hobbins ; First Critic, Dutton ; Second Critic, Harvey ; Censor, Perrin ; Librarian, Koons ; Sergeant-at-Arms, Bower.

At a recent meeting of the Athletic Association the following officers were elected, viz : President, Bayard ; Vice President, Scatchard ; Secretary, Leiser ; Business Manager of Base Ball Team for next season, H. L. Purdy ; Captain of Academy, Base Ball Team, Bayard.

On Saturday evening, January 13, the Academy Y. M. C. A. tendered a reception to the Y. W. C. A., of the Institute, at the Academy. The early part of the evening was devoted to social intercourse, after which the ladies and gentlemen repaired to the dining hall and partook of refreshments. Choice selections of music and an appropriate programme added greatly to the pleasure of the occasion.

The report of the business manager, Mr. H. C.

Purdy, of the Academy foot-ball team, for the season ending with the year 1893, was the most satisfactory of any year. The finances, for the first time, came out even, while the association is in possession of a very good outfit for next year's team. The number of games played on their grounds were three: Selinsgrove Missionary Institute, at Selinsgrove, score, Bucknell Academy 6, Selinsgrove, 0; Williamsport Athletic Association, at Williamsport, score, Bucknell Academy 4, Williamsport 6; Bloomsburg State Normal School, at Bloomsburg, score, Bucknell Academy 32, Bloomsburg State Normal School, 5. In all these were ten points scored against the Academy while they have a record of 42 points against their opponents. This is a very good showing for a team entirely new in the business, most of the players having played for the first time that season. There are very good prospects for an excellent team next season.

'62. The Baptist Publication Society issues as the first of a proposed series of "Bible Hand-books for Young People," a little volume on the Pentateuch, prepared by Rev. A. J. Rowland, D. D., of Baltimore. It is an excellent guide to the study of the first five books of the Old Testament, discussing with candor and discrimmination, authorship, date and contents of the various books. A summary of the contents of each book follows, special attention being given to things requiring elucidation. The little book is scholarly, painstaking, brief and clear.

Ex. '67. E. R. Bliss, Esq., a quite prominent Chicago lawyer, formerly Raymond Bliss, of Lewisburg, a son of Dr. Bliss, deceased, has, in partnership with four other gentlemen, struck rich ore in a gold mine they own at Cripple Creek, Colorado. It assays at from $1,000 to $10,000 a ton and will run in value (estimated) from $1,000,000 up to $6,000,000. It is stated that there is no better mine in the Cripple Creek camp. Mr. Bliss stands high as an attorney in Chicago, and was county attorney of Cook county during a period of eight years.

'77. Rev. T. J. Collins, one of Scranton's most successful pastors, preached the ordination sermon of A. B. O'Neal, at Dunmore, a former mission of the Penn Avenue church, of Scranton.

'83. Morgan J. Watkins, pastor of the Factoryville Baptist church, recently read a paper before the "Monday Morning Ministerial Conference of Scranton," on Pauline Saintship. The article is very highly spoken of, as is all of Rev. Watkins' work.

'84. Since Rev. M. G. Smith became pastor at Towanda, Pa., in March, '92, he has received eighty into the church and sixty of these by baptism. Their Christmas treat was an offering to the Baptist Orphanage of Philadelphia.

'86. Charles R. Kurtz, editor of the Centre Democrat, which is published at Bellefonte, was seriously inconvenienced some time ago by fire. Through the kindness of neighboring printers, the editions of the paper appeared regularly.

'89. Rev. T. W. Booth is pastor of the First Baptist church of Marinette, Wisconsin. A new church edifice was dedicated on January 21, with very pleasing and profitable exercises.

Editorial.

WE SUPPOSE that our readers ought to be informed of the reorganization of the editorial board following the recent election of new editors. May we add that we will endeavor to make THE MIRROR as interesting as it has been in the past, and, if possible, even to improve it. THE MIRROR has attained a high standing among the college journals of the country. To maintain and excel this position will not be easy, nevertheless that is our aim.

THE RENOVATION of the Literary Society halls will be an additional inducement to make them ring with the old-time eloquence. With walls artistically papered, paints, busts and pictures neatly scoured and carpets cleaned, the halls certainly present a fine appearance. This has been accomplished at considerable expense and not a little labor on the part of the active members of both societies. But both money and time have been cheerfully expended in the hope of making the societies of lasting benefit to the students. The attendance has increased lately, but it should be regular and not spasmodic.

THE ASSOCIATION deserves congratulations for the wisdom shown in selecting men of distinguished ability to carry on the business part of THE MIRROR.

The retiring manager, Mr. A. C. Lathrop, has placed the Association on a firm financial basis. The newly elected manager, Mr. J. B. Suiter, is a man of wide business experience, and under his management the aggressive policy of the past will be fully maintained.

THERE is a reckless disregard of property on the part of some of the students which we think ought to be corrected. Living in a college community, as we do, we all are dependent for our comfort, to a greater or less extent, upon the thought and care of others. When a few show a disposition, either from carelessness or downright maliciousness, to misuse or destroy the property for general use, immediately the rights of all are curtailed. That such disposition is present is manifest especially in the main buildings, but in others as well. Let us have a care for the University property.

THE INTEREST displayed by the large number of students attending the recent mock trial in Eupeia Hall suggests that a variation in the exercises occasionally would prove quite a drawing card. Although there was an innocent disregard of many ordinary court forms and a painful distortion of some others, yet the trial may be said to have been a success. Especially will it be thought successful when it is known that the audience waited patiently until midnight to ascertain that the jury could not agree upon a verdict. The examination and speeches of the lawyers were good while the charge of the judge was excellent.

The societies have too long confined their work to a set program, scarcely daring to deviate from it. As a result the members, realizing that it was a bore either to prepare or to listen to what had been prepared, carefully avoided the society halls. But since a change has been inaugurated and new interest developed, the members should be careful to keep up a wholesome, entertaining and instructive variety.

THE THREATENED action to exclude society journals from transmission in the mails as second-class matter is a menace to the existence of many college papers, for the large majority of such papers barely pay expenses and quite a number suffer the inconveniences of an annual deficit, so that if their expenses were increased by the much larger rate of postage proposed, many would be compelled to suspend publication.

But laying aside mere sentiment in regard to their existence, are not college journals entitled to the lowest mailing rates obtainable? Admitting what is not always primarily true, that they are published in the interests of the college they represent, should they not rather be encouraged to extend the cause of education? For in the first place the college, the presumptive beneficiary, exists for no pecuniary gain, but to spread knowledge, which it does at a large expense of its own funds, or of money donated by its friends. And in the second place the paper itself, the instrument conferring the benefit, is not a source of financial profit.

The measure, if passed, will prove a serious set-back to college journalism, which in the last few years has taken important forward strides. We have seen quarterlies become monthlies, monthlies become weeklies or bi-weeklies, and weeklies changed to dailies. There have been comments and favorable criticism upon the literary value of these papers from the press and individuals until "college journalism" is no longer a phrase for good natured contempt, but occupies a distinctive position in the field of general literature. To be sure, not all these advances have been due to cheap postage, nor will all of them be curtailed by the higher rate, but they are largely due to prudent and economical management of those having them in charge, and such managers know that postage is an important item of expense. An increase in such expense means a more limited number of issues and a narrower field of influence. This is retrogression.

The alumni and friends of the various colleges publishing periodicals should unite with the faculties and students in memorializing Congress on behalf of college journals. No effort should be wanting, no opportunity lost, no influence, that might be brought to bear, wasted in presenting the just claims of college journalism.

THE PRAISE OF WINTER.

Deriding Job's alleged wisdom, the Almighty asks him, "Hast thou entered into the treasures of the snow?" He plainly implies that there are treasures in the snow, too subtle, perhaps, for Job, sitting on his ash-heap, to notice and appreciate. But the poets, however, and their kinsfolk, who live where the snow flies, have found out these treasures, and have gone so far as to take the sharpness away from the icy fangs of even Winter himself, leaving him frosty but kindly. It may be delightful to sit under palm trees and amid orange groves, cooling the hot season's breath by copious draughts from the poets who have sung the praises of Winter; but I make much doubt whether that felicity is comparable to the exalted joy whose home is by the blazing hearth and in the very soul of the reader who, with feet on fender and book in hand, flies o'er the glistening ice or skims along the snowy main, while the winds and the sleet knock vainly at his castle-door. Now while every scene and incident depicted is before the reader as he looks out of the window, he can feel to the full the connection between literature and life, and he will surely have at hand the following:

(1) Lowell's essay — "A Good Word for Winter" — in which the old fellow has justice done him;

(2) Emerson's — "The Snow Storm" — "announced by all the trumpets of the sky;"

(3) Whittier's — "Snow Bound" — when the teamsters draw near "to break the drifted highways out;"

(4) Thomson's—"Winter"—"driving along the darken'd air;"

(5) Cowper's—"Winter Evening," "Winter Morning Walk," and "Winter Walk at Noon"—when the Winter is everywhere, his "forehead wrapped in clouds," his beard "white with other snows than those of age;"

(6) Shakspeare's songs—especially the one on "Winter" in Love's Labor's Lost—when

> "Dick the shepherd blows his nail
> And Tom bears logs into the hall
> And milk comes frozen home in pail."

Surrounded by these friends who talk thus familiarly with him, what cares he for the howling blast? Nay, rather: with their help he can translate the stubbornness of fortune into a style so quiet and so sweet that he would not change his lot for meadows of asphodel and the languishing airs of a more genial clime. Amid the whirling snow, then, let us read and think about the praises of Winter. E. P.

A VISIT TO THE NATIONAL CEMETERY AT GETTYSBURG.

Soon after the battle of Gettysburg a plan was suggested for collecting the bodies of the Federal soldiers and burying them in one place, instead of burying them where they lay, scattered over all the battle field. The plans were laid before the Governor of Pennsylvania, who interested the Governors of the several states which had men in the battle, and a committee was appointed to select the grounds. The gentlemen chose a beautiful location, about one-half a mile from the town, on what is now called Cemetery Hill. In this manner the foundation of a noble work was begun.

Let us now take a walk through the grounds and see what thirty years of prosperity has accomplished in beautifying the resting place of our nation's defenders.

The main entrance to the cemetery is guarded by massive bronze gates, hung from stone columns on either side of the roadway; the columns are surmounted by large bronze eagles with wings spread and feathers ruffled, as if ready to pounce upon the weary sight-seer, if he should venture within those sacred borders.

As we stand in the gateway we see, directly before us, a relic of the great battle in the form of a cannon. Where this instrument of destruction stands, the main road divides into two beautiful drives; one branch bears slightly to the right, the other, turning to the left in a graceful curve, runs along the eastern border of the grounds.

Just behind, the cannon, in the angle between the roads, stands a beautiful monument nearly hidden by trees; this is the Reynolds monument. It consists of a semi-colossal statue of General Reynolds in bronze, set upon a granite base.

To the right, a short distance from the main road, stands a neat house, nearly hidden by shrubbery and vines, in which the keeper of the grounds resides.

But let us go on to the cemetery proper. We will take the road to the left because it is the pleasanter.

As we go up this beautiful drive, shaded on either side by evergreens and willows, we can see, through the openings in the trees, the grand monument toward which we are directing our steps.

After a few minutes' walk we reach the desired point, and what a grand sight meets our eye! From our position, at the base of the monument, we can see nearly the whole of the battlefield. We are standing on the spot toward which the Confederate cannon were pointed with such terrible effect. Looking south, our eye runs along the ridge which was occupied by the Union soldiers, and in the distance we see "Round-top."

Let us move around to the west side of the monument. At our feet we see the terrible effect of war in the form of three thousand graves.

We are standing in the center of a semi circle and facing the circumference, toward which the ground slopes in an easy descent. The gravel walks, starting at our feet, run to the circumference after the manner of the spokes of a wheel.

About half way from our position to the outer edge of the semi-circle, is a circular path running parallel with the road at the circumference. These paths divide the cemetery into lots for the different states; the lots nearest the center, being the smallest, are occupied by the states having the less, while those outside the circular path mentioned, by the states with the larger number of men killed in the battle.

The graves are on a level with the ground and the grass is kept as short as on the finest lawn. The granite stones, which mark the graves, are in long rows and are not more than one foot above the surrounding ground. At the end of each lot, and facing the center, is a large stone with the name of the state cut upon it.

But the grandest sight is behind us—the National Monument; it was erected by the several states to commemorate the memory of the men who died in the nation's defence. It is purely historical in its design, telling its own story with pleasing simplicity. The base, of white granite, is twenty-five feet square, and the main shaft rises sixty feet, and is crowned with a colossal marble statue representing the Genius of Liberty. Standing on a three-quarter globe, she holds in her right hand the victor's wreath of laurel, while with her left she clasps the victorious sword.

Projecting from the angles of the pedestal are four buttresses supporting an equal number of allegorical statues representing respectively, War, History, Peace and Plenty; these figures are all beautiful in design and finely executed.

As one looks over these sacred grounds he feels that the prevailing expression of the entire cemetery is one of simple grandeur. Simple, because the scene leads gradually from one object to another in easy harmony, avoiding abrupt contrasts, and unexpected features. Grand, because all intricacy and great variety of parts is avoided; but more particularly, because the designers have refrained from introducing any display of ornament.

Such is the final resting place of our departed heroes. Who can estimate the importance, to us and our posterity, of their valor and heroism? Their deeds will live in history long after our bodies have mouldered into dust; and the place where they now lie will be honored, protected and preserved as a sad but sacred memento of their brave conduct.

ROMAN POETRY—HOW FAR NATIONAL, HOW FAR AN IMITATION OF THE GREEK.

We shall inquire how far Roman poetry is national. It is quite evident to the careful student of Latin that there is much in Roman poetry which is national. If there were not something peculiar to the poems of Rome, they would not be read with so great a delight by so many people. Certain deep and abiding impressions are stamped upon them, which have penetrated the cultivated sentiment of our own times.

In the first place, there is a charm in the language and sentiment of Roman poetry which differs from that of any other language. We have Schlegel for authority that "in didactic poetry the Romans surpassed their predecessors, the Greeks;" and so we find in the didactic poem of Lucretius, for instance, a sublimity which is unsurpassed. In the finer and softer tones of Virgil and Horace we find an unequaled power to move the heart to sympathy with the beauty, the enjoyment, and the sorrows of life.

Much of the substance of Roman poetry is native in its origin. We must exclude, of course, their Epic poems, and poems on mythology. But the pastoral poems of Virgil; the odes of Horace, in which the rural life of the Romans especially is portrayed; the satires of Juvenal, replete with the follies of city life at Rome; and some of the subjects of Ovid's elegiac metres—all these give evident signs of Roman origin.

There were two new forms of poetic composition introduced by the Romans, which are distinct from the Grecian forms, the Satire and the poetic Epistle. The Italians had in earlier times struck out a native measure, called the Saturnian, in which they expressed their religious emotions and commemorative instincts in a rude manner. But Ennius had rejected this measure as unsuited for his great work, and it had accordingly died out. No new measures were introduced until the Satire showed its effectiveness, and Ovid expanded the elegy into the epistolary form.

But how far is Roman poetry an imitation of the Greek? Although there were some things distinctly Roman in Roman poetry, yet this poetry owed its first impulse to the intellectual contact with Greece. The form and expression of Roman poetry was moulded by the teaching of Greek masters and by the study of Greek writings. Their poetry came to them after their habits were fully formed, as an ornamental addition to their power. Most of the poets at the time of the establishment of the Empire were born in the provinces of Italy, and derived the materials of their art as much from the stores of Greek poetry as from the life and action of their own times; because as dwellers in the provinces they had no live, active interest in their own times.

The forms of composition of Roman poetry, and the metres employed, are both signs of imitation from the Greeks. As we said before, the satire and the poetic epistle were the only productions of Roman art. They learned to time their measures from the measures of Greece; and they were not equally successful in all the forms which they attempted to reproduce. In tragedy they were far inferior to Greece; in epic and idyllic poetry, and in philosophical dialogue they betrayed their inferiority. Sellar says: "The Roman character and Italian feeling of their poems have been partially obscured by the foreign forms and metres in which they are expressed."

Roman poetry is, to a large extent, an imitation of the Greek in its subject matter. The Romans were wanting in speculative capacity, and the substance of Roman poetry does not rise to those imaginative heights from which the poets of Greece beheld the wonder and solemnity of life. The beautiful and stately forms of Greek legend lived a second life in the works of many Latin poets. The story of the Aeneid is of foreign origin, and the religious creed which is expressed in it is a composite result of Greek mythology and Roman sentiment. So also, at times, the odes of Horace seem to bear no vital relation to the convictions of the poet, and are based on the praise of some god or mistress of Greek mythology.

Therefore, we conclude that from one standpoint Roman poetry is a new revelation of the human spirit, while from another it is an imitative reproduction of the Grecian art. Sellar says: "Roman poetry is a branch of literature moulded, indeed, on the forms of a foreign art, but executed with native energy, and expressive of native character."

OUR DUTY IN THE PRESENT INDUSTRIAL SITUATION.

The history of mankind has recorded not only the bright days of the past but the dark ones as well. Bloody wars, pestilence famine, and industrial depressions, want and suffering, have always had their seasons. The lessons taught by the past have often been unheeded and forgotten. Hence we see history repeating itself. The present industrial situation has had its counterpart in the past.

It is not the sudden evolution of some great evil that brings about the present situation. Its development has been the result of years of growth. Gradually have the forces of events converged to the present crisis. The evidences of the present industrial depression are everywhere present. Instead of prosperity adversity stalks its way through our blooming land. Where the hum and song of activity were heard now is the stillness of the night. Stagnation has stopped the revolving wheels of activity. Dust and rust are accumulating on the machines in our shops. Where confidence sweetly reposed her trust in our country and its institutions distrust is now sulking. Instead of plenty for all want is evident. The cry of hunger arises to the heavens and re-echoes itself through the length and breadth of our nation. The child of joy and happiness has become sad. Yet we see these circumstances as superfluous; only temporary; not permanent. The resources of our nation are great; we can produce enough for all The patriotism of our people will make their strength mighty for the overthrow of the causes of the present condition and the restoration of prosperity.

The present industrial situation affects all classes of society. Employers receive less profit, yet their loss is small in comparison with that of the employed. For every employer who feels want there are ten thousand toilers whose state is far worse. The real burden of the present distress falls with greatest effect upon the working classes.

Whence is this woeful condition in our land? The best students of economics and government do not, like some of our monomaniacs, trace the condition to a single cause. They see rather a network of complex causes that have operated toward the present condition. The situation has been intensified and made far worse by the cry of "calamity." Our daily papers have almost with united voice raised this cry, saying that we were on the verge of financial ruin unless certain measures were adopted, until they have destroyed public confidence. Fictitious horrors have been pictured to us, until they appear real. The distorted views they have spread broadcast have resulted in the withdrawing of large sums of money from circulation, raids on banks, and are largely responsible for the present direful times. Instead of being messengers of truth the press have become carriers of the false and evil. Oh, that our papers had the patriotism to declare confidence in the ability of our nation to stem the tide of affairs regardless of the passage of the "silver repeal," or any other bill by Congress. Let confidence be restored and the present distress will be relieved. Political trifling has also made the situation more trying. The spoils idea has so possessed our office holders that they have dared to trifle with the people's will. The basal causes are several: First, Debauchery:—Intemperance and vice have always caused evil, and they will ever continue in the same destructive work. Earnings are thus worse than wasted. The noblest endowment of wage-payer and wage-earner—the mind—is degraded. They become as brutes, and their relation with each other are of no higher type. Second, Plutocracy:—The rich are made supreme in their power, enabling them to make their employed as mere vassals, whose only aim is to make more wealthy their masters. Third, The financial policy of the government:—There is no doubt but that this policy, carried out as it has been in the interests of Wall street speculators, has seriously affected the situation; but to lay at its door all the blame is only avoiding the real issue. A sufficient circulation and proper equity between the money metals is needed. The lack of this is in favor of capital, but destructive to labor. Fourth, Strained relations:—The relations of the employer and employed are inter-dependent. The two classes are complementary, and their harmonious and unified action is essential to our best industrial interests. Starvation wages and strikes strain these relations, entailing financial distress. There are doubtless other minor causes, but, whatever they may be, the fact of industrial distress remains and must be met.

Our duty in the present industrial situation is to look affairs directly in the face. We are not to be cynics, looking only on the darkest possibilities. Hope, as a beacon, sheds its guiding light out on the way. Duty, then, demands us to act promptly to counteract these causes, asserting the power of the right and of true citizenship. We must, if possible, remove the causes, or at least restrain them.

It is our duty not to to decry, but, in patriotism, to seek to restore confidence in our nation and her institutions. We ought to do our utmost to keep the wheels of industry moving. If employers, duty calls upon us to give employment to as many as we are able; if laborers, to accept work at less wages, if necessary, than our capabilities entitle us. This is far better than charity, yet charity may be a part of duty. We cannot do the Master's bidding unless we feed the hungry. We have no right to allow men to starve. We are our brother's keeper, and are responsible to God for his keeping.

Let us see to it that we do our duty. If, as educated Christian citizens, we are faithful to our charge, the industrial situation will brighten. Want will give way to plenty; prosperity and joy will again lift the shroud of adversity and sadness from many of our brothers.

The darkness suggests the dawn; the dimness of the present the brightening future. Let courage, then, possess our hearts. Let us press on in patriotic trust and endeavor for our Country's welfare, ever remembering:

"A better day is coming,
A morning promised long,
When girded right and holy might Shall overthrow the wrong."

Local.

Butler has joined Sigma Alpha Epsilon.

Lathrop's father paid him a visit Feb. 10.

Sigmund preached at Winfield on the 28th ult.

"Much ado about nothing'—Nelson Davis' letter on "dog."

Baker, the Freshman, is an applicant for a clerkship at the Lewisburg postoffice.

Kauffman and Stephens are the latest additions to the Phi Gamma Delta fraternity.

We welcome Parker to his new room in the east wing. He is at last in a good neighborhood.

Mr. B. B. Ware addressed the students of Gettysburg college on missionary subjects on Jan. 21.

A Senior soliloquy:

Girls may come and girls may go,
I study on forever.

Raymond Davis will soon present two barrels of oranges, a gift from his cousin in Florida, to the Angstadt club.

Theta Alpha expects to render the trial scene in the "Merchant of Venice" during the latter part of March.

Sigma Alpha Epsilon tendered to their lady friends a sleigh ride to Sunbury Feb. 2. A pleasant time was reported by all.

There is an unusual interest in the study of literature this term. The number of students pursuing honor work in this subject is greater than ever before. Dr. Perrine deserves great credit for the enthusiasm he has aroused.

Prof. in Osteology—"Mr. Smith, are the feet very powerful parts of the body?" Mr. Smith—"Very powerful in some people."

Haddock is not absent minded as a rule, but on Sunday, Feb. 4th, he escorted a young lady to church and forgot to escort her home.

Cyrus Gresh, of Milton, who had been a member of the Freshman class at Ursinus college, is the latest addition to the ranks of '97.

Dr. Harris preached at Williamsport on the 11th inst., and on the next day addressed the meeting of Bucknell Alumni in New York city.

Mr. Deppen left town on the 8th inst. to act as "best man" for his new brother-in-law. He returns philosophizing over the way the world wags on.

The members of the college Y. M. C. A. were greatly interested in a talk on "Moody's Training School," given by C. W. Harvey, of the Academy, February 6.

The recent C. E. entertainment in the Lutheran church was greatly enhanced in interest by three vocal quartettes, in all of which Mr. B. Meade Wagenseller took part.

Nelson Davis has undertaken to supply the class in animal histology with dogs for dissection. Formerly cats were used for this purpose, but Mr. Davis prefers larger specimens.

Ben Brick has been suffering from a serious wound in his right eye. It is now much better, and we are glad that Mr. Brick is no longer obliged to wear his head in a sling.

Theta Alpha literary society recently discussed the important question: "Resolved, that long engagements are conducive to married happiness." Many very original ideas were advanced.

Prof. in Physiology—"Mr. Firth, what is the shape of the red blood corpuscles?" Mr. Firth—"Round like a dollar." Professor—"How large are they?" Mr. Firth—"A little smaller than a dollar."

Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Gretzinger entertained the Phi Kappa Psi boys at the home of Dr. and Mrs. W. B. Stoner, of Sunbury, on the evening of Feb. 2. It was the occasion of the third anniversary of the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Gretzinger. A bountiful feast was given which was intermingled with lively toasts and college songs.

MOCK TRIAL.

Friday, the ninth, Euepia Hall
Was filled with guests—the great and small,
From Vastine down to Davidson,
Freshies, Sophs and honest men—
To hear Guie tried for battery
On Harper's physiognomy.

Judge Sheddan ably occupied
The honored bench; while Sigmund cried,
With much unnecessary din,
That now the session would begin.
And Sheriff Reynolds' dignity
Maintained the Court's authority.

Prothonotary Harris then
Called out the petit jurymen,
From which list those of honest face
Were chosen for the jurors' place—
MacNab and Jackson, Waid and Hall,
And Firth and Rogers, six in all.

The witnesses were soon sworn in
And testified where Guie had been,
What share he had in that great fight
Which took place Soph'more banquet night;
While lawyers, armed with book aud pen
Cross-questioned these unhappy men.

And many a high contention rose
When Sheddan must needs interpose,
"Let there be Pease and silence Grimm"
Or "Pease proceed to question him,"
"That juror will not interfere,
His notion has no bearing here."

But Dr. Brown was far the best,
That learned jaw-bone specialist,
Who testified that Harper's face
Of Guie's advances bore no trace.
A skillful story he composed
And so the testimony closed.

When the defense had made its plea,
Riemer discoursed quite audibly,
Thundering out old Blackstone's law
On injuring a Soph'more's jaw;
Until the jury was assured
Guie was a wretch, to crime inured.

With brief, well-chosen language then
The Judge dismissed the jurymen.
And then a half an hour they spent;
Five voted for Guie's punishment;
But that sixth man would not agree
And Guie is still at liberty.

Mr. Josephs, one of Bucknell's ablest orators, addresses the Farmers' Institute, which meets in Millville during the latter part of this month. His subject is, "A wheel within a wheel." This offers Mr. Josephs great opportunities of instructing the farmers in the history of civilization and scientific progress.

A company of idle youths, arrayed in costumes usually worn between bedtime and morning, paraded around the seminary a few evenings ago. Ghostly was the march, but the windows responded with mirth.

On the morning of the 14th inst. the following valentine, dedicated to two Cs, was found near the bulletin board:

You stand in beauty side by side:
  Your hearts seem filled with glee;
Your love is strong, and deep, and wide,
  As the waters in the sea.

S. R. Wood, '96, preached at Derrs, Columbia county, on the 4th inst. To reach Derrs he went by way of Watsontown over the Weak and Weary railroad. So tired was the engine on the following Monday that it required twenty hours to make the return trip, a distance of about 35 miles.

Macnab recently was a member of a sleighing party to Potts Grove. On the way home, although having a pretty miss for a seatmate, he fell asleep and tumbled from the sleigh. No more serious injuries resulted from the fall than mortification of the spirit and contusion of the knee-cap.

The usual "stag" dance of the winter term was held in the gymnasium on Saturday, Feb. 10, at 9 p. m. The elaborate costumes of the ladies (?) and gentlemen were the source of much amusement to the spectators. A large crowd was present, and all enjoyed themselves whether they could dance or not The proceeds will be devoted to the purchase of a spring board.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Mrs. Dora E. W. Spratt, '78, contributes regularly to the Home and Country Magazine.

Miss Elsie Roth, '90, was recently the guest of her classmate, Miss Katharine Wolfe, of Lewisburg.

Two recent guests were Miss Bertha Wittenmyer, '92, of Middleburg, and Miss Mamie Jones, of Olyphant.

Miss Flora Clymer, '93, is actively engaged in missionary work, in Philadelphia, as the assistant of her pastor, Rev. C. H. Thomas.

The prize essay contest of the Senior and Fourth Year class will take place on March 15. Themes will be taken from "Sketches of Sir Roger de Coverly," and "Evangeline."

"Merrily the sleigh bells tinkled in the icy air of night" as the Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity gave a sleigh ride to Sunbury. The evening was passed in a delightful manner. The musical members of the fraternity contributed much to the pleasantness of the occasion.

The Hermenia literary society, of the Academy, entertained a number of their friends in a very pleasant and unique way by giving a ride to and banquet at Vicksburg. Although the weather proved inclement this did not detract from the pleasure of the evening, and all reported a "right royal" time.

The following poem was written for the MIRROR by Dr. Lemuel Moss:

COUNT THE COST.

Luke XIV, 28:33.

Many a tower is left unfinished,—
  Planned, begun, abandoned, lost;
For the thoughtless, foolish builder
  Fails to count the cost.

Many an army, proudly marshalled,
  Marches into helpless woe,
For the reckless, vain commander,
  Underrates his foe.

Many a vessel richly freighted,
  Sinks beneath the whelming deep;
For the sailor in the look out,
  Heedless, falls asleep.

Many a life goes out in darkness
  That might shine in endless day;
For the soul bewitched by folly,
  Barters it away.

ACADEMIC NEWS.

[S. J. CLEELAND, Correspondent.]

Rev. Mr. Bowser paid a visit to Messrs. Craig and Mitchell.

The competitors for the Third Form declamation prize have been selected.

The "prep's" lament:

Latin is a burden,
  Greek it gives me pain;
Mathematics set me crazy,
  And football makes me lame.

The members of the Hermania Literary society, with their Seminary and town lady friends, participated recently in a "buss" ride to Vicksburg. Upon arriving at Vicksburg the merry company directed their steps to the Great Western hotel, where a well prepared spread awaited them. A literary program followed, consisting of music and recitations, after which they started for home. The party reached the Seminary at a seasonable hour, and all expressed themselves as having "a very pleasant evening."

Personal.

'65. Rev. H. F. King has had great success at Powelton Ave., Phila. The church is in a better condition than it had been at any time before.

Exchanges.

The Tragedy of Hannibal is the title of a recent production of Mr. Henry David Gray, of the class of '97 of Hamilton college. This work will be of interest to all college students, and we trust we may secure a copy as soon as it is published.

In the columns of the Spectator we note an article concerning the fight between Corbet and Mitchell. Our contemporary does well in attacking this disgraceful event. Let all our college publications denounce this relic of barbarism. The article on "Immigration and Education" contains some practical truths. The "Party Boss," "Labor and Capital," "Pauper Labor," etc., all suggest the attending dangers of this national problem.

"Smith college is about to publish a paper which contains no advertisements."—St. Louis Collegian.

The above move is a commendable one. Good for Smith college! It does seem that college publications should be self-supporting. What college will be the next to follow this example?

In the exchange column of the Reveille we note the timely remark concerning college publications drafting from standard authors in order to supply the deficiency of contributions. We heartily agree with our contemporary on this point. Let each column of the college paper be supplied with material from the student body.

Editorial.

THE COMING exhibition in the gymnasium is attracting quite a little interest. This is a fitting climax to the work done in this line during the winter term. Those students who faithfully attended class drill have realized in themselves the physical improvement resulting from the exercises Not only was health maintained and bodies made supple, but to some extent a little grace acquired. All this we hope will be evident to the visitors on the final day, March 17.

PENMANSHIP as a fine art is perhaps too difficult an attainment, or requires too much time for the average college student. But surely this is no warrant for swinging to the opposite extreme. Plain, legible writing is often appreciated more highly than the ornamented, and certainly is an attainment within the reach of any student. For those who expect to do much writing, whether for the press or in the form of letters or documents, it is well to bear in mind that many grievous blunders may be avoided by cultivating a neat, legible handwriting.

GYMNASIUM exercises are enlivened and made more attractive by the music accompanying the various movements. When we consider that this work, which requires not a little skill on the part of the performer, is done without any recompense and at the sacrifice of considerable time, we feel certain that the students attending class drill will join with THE MIRROR in extending to Mr. Green this acknowledgment of his courtesy, his faithfulness and promptness in this matter.

PUNCTUALITY in meeting an engagement is a virtue by no means to be despised. Punctuality in retiring when the business is finished may at times be a virtue worthy of equal commendation. If one asks another for five minutes of his time and takes ten or fifteen, he robs him of just so much. Tho the time be not valuable to the one it may be to the other. The tendency in school life is to be too profligate with the moments given for improvement. It is much easier and far pleasanter to use up an hour or so in light conversation than to dig out Greek roots or wrestle with mathematical theorems. And when we make a visit to borrow a book or ask about a lesson we are apt ofttimes to extend the time and talk about anything except the book or the lesson. Punctuality at both ends of the engagement would result in the accomplishment of more real work.

THE Free Lance, of State College, in an interesting editorial discusses at some length the present foot-ball situation and the outlook for the coming season. It regrets the dissolution of the league of '91, claims to have out classed Bucknell (tho, be it remembered that in the last game, Bucknell scored 18 points, which for an out-classed team is doing extremely well), ranks herself with Lehigh and Cornell, and advocates the formation of another league composed of such teams as Cornell, Union, Lehigh, Lafayette, Univ. of Virginia, and State, and possibly admitting Bucknell, Swarthmore or F. and M. It is on the advisability of Bucknell entering such a league that we wish more particularly to speak.

In briefly reviewing the history of '91, if memory serves us rightly, Bucknell was the only team in the league that played all the games assigned, but lost the pennant to her defeated opponent thro a game forfeited by another team equally inferior to both. This state of affairs was fully matched by the depleted condition of our treasury and the debt in which we were involved. Long trips, too frequent engagements, insufficient guarantees and poor receipts at home games contributed to more than exhaust our funds. So that in so far as games and finances were concerned that league was anything but profitable to us.

Nor would a new league, such as proposed by the Free Lance, be any more advantageous to Bucknell. For if we should enter, twice the time heretofore devoted to foot ball, would be required to train for the harder contests, not to speak of the days needed to travel to the distant places. Even supposing those interested in foot-ball were able and willing to devote this time, their number is scarcely large enough to stand the strain of severer practice and yet present a team strong enough to meet their opponents.

Again, financially we would be no better situated. Long and frequent trips would necessitate a large outlay of money, much more than the gate receipts could be expected to balance. A coach would have to be employed and entail an additional expense. Altogether we might confidently expect to leave a large, round deficit for our collegiate posterity to settle.

If the seasons of '92 and '93 have taught us anything it is that Bucknell is much better off outside a league than in one. For even tho we suffered defeat, and the consequent opprobrium of being out-classed by our ambitious rival, the seasons, especially the last, favored us with a fair measure of success. Considering finances alone they were entirely successful. For our Athletic association was able not only to meet all expenses but to close the books with a respectable balance in the treasury.

Nor is our situation outside a league absolutely hopeless. There are quite a number of foot ball teams in our immediate vicinity. Games with these will continue to afford us plenty of practice. And occasional dates with college teams will afford us all the athletic sport we could wish.

A VISIT TO THE BARTHOLDI STATUE.

That masterpiece of the sculptor's art and man's ingenuity, the statue of "Liberty Enlightening the World," is the most conspicuous object about New York. It is seen upon entering the city from New Jersey; from the Brooklyn bridge; from any high point of lookout in the city. To appreciate the full magnitude of the bronze, a near approach and close examination are necessary. New York, whose ways of rapid transit remind the novice of the Arabian Nights' transportation, has provided the public with a quick and thoroughly satisfactory mode of access. Boats leave the Barge office every hour, and anyone upon paying the fare of twenty-five cents is carried to the island, given free entrance to all parts, even to the very forehead of Liberty, and return passage to Gotham.

The writer and a college friend, while on a vacation tour, determined to see the statue. Embarking on the little steamer, we were quickly nearing Bedloe's island. The boat kindly took us around beyond the island, so that we had an excellent view on three sides. The nearer we approached, the more colossal the proportion appeared, until, obtaining an upward view from the edge of the island, the statue towered far above, grandly impressive in her magnificence. While the close view gave a better idea of the gigantic size of the figure, it detracted from the perfect symmetry so noticeable at a distance.

Landing, we walked with the crowd to the dock, set our feet on the famous soil and entered the enclosure. The island is a fort; consequently we found breast-works of some considerable height. These are of solid masonry, with eight corners jutting out, somewhat like an eight-rayed star, completely bordering the land. In the centre, the statue rises on her pedestal. This pedestal, with its foundation, is 154 feet high, and 91 feet square at the bottom, diminishing to forty feet at the base of the statue itself. The figure rises from the pedestal to the top of the torch, held in extended right hand, 151 feet, making the total height from the ground 305 feet.

We enter the foundation at the very base. Passing in to the centre, we find a small rotunda, from which the entrances branch at right angles, like the four branches of a cross-roads. We are glad to escape from the damp, dark surroundings, and begin to ascend a broad stone stairway. The ascent from this point to the base of the figure is by straight flights of stairs. Arrived at the top of the pedestal, we might have stepped outside upon a corridor, extending all the way around, to taste the salt breezes. However, our desire to gain the "top-most top" spurred us upward. Inside the statue, we climb up a narrow staircase, in width not more than 18 inches, provided here and there with little iron chair-like seats in the railing, as resting places for the weary. Before we had lifted one foot up ahead of the other the 154 times necessary to reach the top, we were rather glad to take advantage of one of these seats while we caught breath. As we sat in the dim light (for the incandescent lamps, placed at intervals of about twenty feet, do not make a bright illumination), we heard descending steps close to us. They seemed above; then, underneath; but no one had passed by on our stairs. This led to the discovery that two flights of these circular stairways have been built about a common central standard; one for people ascending, the other for those descending.

Arrived in the top of the head, we find ourselves in a room which will comfortably hold forty persons. We go over to one of the sides (if one may use that expression of a circular room) and see that what we had taken from the sea level to be small indentations in the crown are in reality windows ranging from a foot in height on the sides of the head, to nearly three feet at the centre above the forehead. Looking out, the eye reaches far over the city, and had the day been sufficiently clear, we might have descried the Palisades of the Hudson and even some Connecticut landmarks. We immediately recognize the Brooklyn bridge, although never seen before, so realistic are the pictures which have been scattered over the land. From other points of view, we see Brooklyn, to our right; in the near centre, the bay dotted with many a sail; to the left, New Jersey coasts, Jersey City, Blackwell's Island and the other islands near. A glance upward to the crown, surprises and awes. The rays that from the boat had seemed only as long as a lead pencil reach out and upward fully six feet. The arm holding the torch extends above; at some considerable distance from us, apparently. The torch is forty feet higher than our point of observation.

A few additional dimensions of our "Goddess" may be of interest. The length of index finger is 8 feet; distance across eye, 2 feet; length of nose, 4 feet 6 inches; width of mouth, 3 feet, and size of finger nail, 13x10 inches.

Descending, we step out into the corridor of the pedestal, and from between the tall Grecian columns, through window-like openings, look out again over the bay. The breeze bears us our first taste of salt air unpolluted by the city odors. Below us, the long swells break in foam on the stony shore. A wholesome feeling of sadness, such as true grandeur always produces, mingled with one of protection, stole in unawares, as we felt that far above us the strong figure towered—emblem of our land—mighty, enduring, a welcome beacon light to the weary sailor homeward bound.

HOW MISS ELIZA MILKED THE COW.

On the farm adjoining my father's, when I was a boy working at home, there lived a widow, Mrs. Wood, who formerly had resided in New York city. After her husband's death in the city, Mrs. Wood, being desirous of a life free from city conventionalities, purchased the old homestead which her father once owned.

Her neighbors were unable to see any peculiar attraction in the old farm, and they often wondered why this city lady should delight to live there, quite alone, with the exception of her hired girl. But to Mrs. Wood the homestead was endeared by many remains of her father's handiwork, although for over forty years the farm had been in the hands of strangers.

That she spent at least two dollars for every dollar's worth of produce she received from the farm did not seem to disturb her in the least. She kept a horse and a cow, some sheep and poultry. She tilled her garden herself, but rented the remainder of her plow-land; her stock was sufficient for her pasturage. Evidently she had plenty of money and enjoyed this mode of dissipating it.

But even in this quiet manner of living there was one vexation which caused her no little annoyance. The loneliness and solitude of the widow's isolated life were more than her hired girls could endure; and she was unable to keep an assistant for any length of time.

It so happened that about the middle of August the girl, whom she had engaged for all the summer, left without a day's notice. Now, it was extremely necessary that Mrs. Wood should have some one to assist her at once. On account of her rheumatic wrists it was quite out of the question for her to think of doing the milking herself, as she had done on similar occasions previously, when without a girl for a day or two.

Mrs. Wood knew very well that it was impossible to hire a girl in the country during the busy summer months, so she at once drove to the neighboring village. In this village lived one of Mrs. Wood's sisters, who was the wife of one of the leading merchants of the town.

After a vain search of several hours, for three of her former assistants lived in this village, the widow called at her sister's home and began to relate her unfortunate plight.

"How glad I am, Aunt Augusta!" exclaimed Miss Eliza, the younger of her nieces, who was home spending her summer vacation from Bucknell Institute.

"Glad? why Eliza how you talk!" said her sister reprovingly.

"Dear aunt," said Eliza without heeding the interruption, "I'm just dying for something to do. Mamma and sister think that I should 'rest' until school begins. But I am thoroughly tired of 'resting.' Will you take me home with you, aunt Augusta?"

Though this conversation was half in jest, yet when Mrs. Wood drove home, her niece, Miss Eliza, accompanied her. This young lady had visited frequently in the country, of course, but she knew practically nothing at all of such work as she had volunteered to do.

When within a mile or two of the homestead a thunder shower, which had suddenly arisen from the west, burst forth and gave them a thorough drenching. By the time they reached the farm, however, every cloud had disappeared, the sun was shining majestically over the western hills, and the atmosphere was filled with the delicious perfume of the newly mown hay.

Miss Eliza helped her aunt to prepare the evening meal and to look after the poultry. The little chickens were safely cooped; all the eggs were gathered; and the other duties about the house carefully attended to.

"Now, we are all done but the milking," said Mrs. Wood, "and my rheumatism is so bad to-night that I dare not go out in the damp any more. Do you suppose, dear, you could milk old Brindle without my going down to the yard with you?"

"Certainly, auntie," said Miss Eliza assuringly. She had been prompted to make this reply on the spur of the moment because of her aunt's infirmity. But this was the work which had caused her considerable misgivings, for she had never yet attempted to milk, and she had hoped that her aunt would give her a few lessons before testing her skill. Nevertheless, Eliza was not the girl to show the white feather. Other girls had learned to milk, and why couldn't she?

Taking the milking pail, the young lady tripped lightly down the path to the yard where old Brindle stood patiently chewing her cud and vainly trying to keep off the flies which swarmed about her legs and sides.

At first Brindle was a little shy of the stranger, but her fears were soon overcome, and Miss Eliza, after she had petted the gentle creature a while, seated herself on the three-legged stool and attempted to relieve the distended udder.

"Soo, bos, soo; I won't harm you," said Miss Eliza. By sheer good fortune she happened to sit down on the right side of the cow; she didn't know that it made any difference. She placed the pail on the ground, and, sitting off at arm's length, she daintily squeezed one of the teats.

As the cow was an easy milker, she brought forth a copious stream; but instead of going into the pail, the milk persisted in spattering her new russet shoes. She tried to give the stream another direction; the bottom of her dress caught it this time. Changing hands, she tried it again; an abundant stream soaked the cow's left hind foot.

During these attempts of the fair milker, the cow kept swithing her tail furiously.

"I should think aunt Augusta would have your tail cut off!" she exclaimed, after it had hit her in the face two or three times.

Now it so happened that the cow was standing quite near an old rail fence and that one of the stakes was close behind the cow's right hind foot. The young lady was making first rate progress, —she had milked about three quarts, and fully one quart had landed safely in the pail. Just then Brindle switched her tail vigorously from side to side and with seeming intent dipped the heavy, brushy end right into the milk. In another instant the cow switched again. This time the dripping tail struck Miss Eliza squarely on the cheek.

"I wonder how aunt Augusta manages this cow's troublesome caudal appendage, anyway?" said she. "Perhaps ——, and to think was to act.

For a minute or two everything went off nicely, and Miss Eliza was congratulating herself on the success of her scheme.

But the poor cow! The flies pestered her exceedingly. She tugged and tried to switch them off, but her tail refused to obey. Most cows would have kicked, but this cow was no kicker. She leaned forward, twisted her body from right to left. Still her tail refused to switch. In alarm, the young lady quickly arose from her stool, and none too soon.

The cow gave a jump; somebody screamed; down came several lengths of fence; and old Brindle galloped down the lane with a fence stake trailing at her heels.

By some fortunate coincidence of circumstances I happened to be near by in an adjoining field on my father's farm. Hearing the scream, and the noise caused by the tumbling down of the rail fence, and seeing the cow capering about with the fence stake fastened to her tail, no explanation was needed when I arrived on the scene, at least so I told the young lady.

It did not take long to relay the fence; surely the fifteen minutes didn't seem long. Miss Eliza tried to help. Before the last rails were replaced, I began to wish that more of the fence had tumbled down. Never before had I found building rail fence so delightful a pastime. Usually it was rather disagreeable work.

The cow, having loosed herself from the stake, had quieted down by this time. I drove the cow up to the usual milking place and proceeded to give the young lady a lesson in the art of milking. It took several lessons, however, before she seemed to be proficient. Yet, I must say, she was not slow to learn.

Of course, more might be said; but —— you do not wonder that I remember so well how Miss Eliza milked the cow.

A COMMUNICATION.

The Literary editors earnestly request contributions to their department. The readable quality of our paper must inevitably suffer unless subscribers and others aid in this way. It is true that the editoral staff is large but two only are assigned to the literary part. A little calculation will show that no small amount of sacrifice is needed for two busy students, with regular school literary work pressing hard upon them, to provide every two weeks for nine or ten columns of interesting reading, and that of a nature, too, which will conform to the readers' standards. For them to write it all is out of the question, both in respect to time and in regard to popular opinion. We therefore cordially solicit contributions from every one.

We know that our judgment is not all that could be desired, and doubtless in many cases would be somewhat unjust, as we are but students. We know, also, that modesty plays a large part in the hesitancy that the student feels in submitting productions to the public eye. This, while commendable to a certain extent, should be put underneath for the benefit of our University journal. The appearance of an article in cold print often reveals to the writer a slight lack of taste in expression that would, perhaps, not be discovered in manuscript copy. Hence, the aid to the composer. On the other hand, a printed page is far more interesting than a written one, because the ideas are more quickly grasped by the reader, and a very favorable judgment passed on the same matter in print which would seem weak in writing.

We aim to make this department both instructive and readable—not too much on the North American Review style. In choosing subjects for term essays, bear this request in mind, and let us see the result. We will never set it down as your desire for notoriety, but will thank you from the depth of our overworked lives. Write something, also, that is especially for THE MIRROR.

We desire to thank all who have heartily aided us in this and other ways in the past, and all who will do so in the future. Let each one who has the interest of our school at heart uphold its journal in every way possible. It will do you good and raise the Bucknell MIRROR to a higher place than it now occupies in the esteem of contemporaries. Please hand or send contributions to the Literary editors,

T. S. FRETZ,
EZRA ALLEN.

REPLY TO AN EXCHANGE.

I read in the MIRROR of the 25th of last month the following extract, which is a mistake from the beginning to the end :

> The University of Paris has over 7,000 students, and in this, as well as other universities of France, there are no classes, no commencement day, no college periodicals, no glee clubs, and no fraternities.—Ex.

At first there is no University of Paris, and there is only one university for all the country. It is the Universite de France, having sixteen branches called Academies, in the following great cities: Aix, Besancon, Bordeaux, Caen, Chambery, Clermont, Dijon, Douai, Grenoble, Lyon, Montpellier, Nancy, Paris, Poitiers, Rennes and Toulouse.

Each Academy is under the presidency of a Recteur, who controls the public lectures given in the palace of the Academy, and the classes of the lycees, colleges and public schools. Above all the Recteurs is the Minister of Public Instruction, Grand Maitre of the University of France.

The public instruction is divided into three categories: 1st. Enseignement Superieur which has five faculties: Theology, Law, Medicine, Sciences, French and Foreign Belles-lettres. 2d. Enseignement Secondaire to which belong the lycees and colleges. 3d. Enseignement primaire to which belong the public schools.

We have classes in the five faculties and in the lycees and colleges, and, in our colleges, the students who do not know their lesson are severely punished without any consideration. We have no periodicals, it is true, but we have glee clubs, orchestras and bands. I have been myself, for many years, a member of these organizations. As for the fraternities, we have enough antagonism in the political parties and do not care to introduce such a cause of rivalry in our colleges. All the students of the same college are members of the same fraternity, which is like your associations alumni and alumnæ.

Every year, we have a general meeting of all those who are able to come to the banquet ; we inquire about the absentees, and when we know that some of them are in need of help or support, the association never forgets them. That, we believe to be the true fraternity. Our commencement day is called distribution des prix and is the greatest and most solemn ceremony in our colleges and schools. This is all the truth.

Yours very respectfully,
E. AVIRAGNET.

Firth's interest in the exercises on the 22nd prevented him from making his usual mid-termly visit to Chester.

Civil Engineering is among the new subjects just added to the curricula, and will be taught next year for the first time.

Professor Lincoln Hulley, M. A., of the University of Chicago, has assumed the new professorship recently established here.

Allen, of '95, Ware, of '96, and Miss Kunkle were at Detroit, Michigan, attending "The Convention of the Student Volunteers."

Baldwind quit school for a few weeks in order to expound the merits of a new subscription book to the good people of Danville.

Mr. Wagenseller left on the 21st of last month for a short visit at his home in Selinsgrove. Mr. Barclay Reynolds accompanied him.

The new catalogue, consisting of 120 pages, is now in press and will be out soon. The Registrar of the University has charge of its distribution.

The matter of putting down a cinder quarter-mile track, on the athletic field, is being agitated, and it is expected that the same will be laid this summer.

W. T. Harris, ex '95, at present a student at the University of Pennsylvania, delivered a lecture on "Kings and Fools" at Derrs, Columbia county, on the 3rd inst.

The members of the committee for the annual mid-winter minstrel show have been chosen and are as follows: Mount, Bunnel, Brick, Davidson, Megargee and Wagner.

During this part of the term we find the Freshmen taking an example from the busy little bees in expelling their drones. Baker is the first drone expelled from their hive.

The Freshmen claim to have enjoyed a delightful banquet in town on the evening of the 22d. For many and much disputed reasons they were unmolested by the Sophomore class.

Work in the Tustin Gymnasium is quite active under the direction of Harvey F. Smith and W. R. Harper. During the winter term, all students are required to take work in the gymnasium.

Wilson, '95, reports that the pupils of cats' eyes vary at his home with the movement of the tides. The well known effect of New Jersey electricity is all that made the class doubt the result of his observations.

Overheard on the Sem. walk—First Voice—Did you see Davy's green specs? Second Voice—When? First Voice—At the operetta. Second Voice—Why no; you can't see ruby glass on a red flannel back ground.

The following syllogism has been propounded, by a member of the Logic Class, to the Physical Directors: All indoor exercise should be taken in a well ventilated room. The gymnasium is not a well ventilated room. Therefore, no exercise should be taken in the gymnasium.

We are glad to see the great use made of the library. Of course, its principal purpose is to furnish a few co'eds a chance to read over lessons—and talk—together. To be sure the students who want to read there have no right to consider themselves annoyed by such trifles?

The Y. M. C. Associations of College and Academy have in joint meeting elected Robert E. Speer, of New York, to preach the annual sermon. Rev. C. C. Tilley, of Bridgton, N. J., was elected first alternate. The sermon is to be preached on the first Sunday of next term.

The Athletic Association has adopted a new constitution, which entirely revolutionizes the management of athletics, and places them upon a more solid basis. The advisory committee created by the new constitution consists of Hon. H. M. McClure, Professor F. E. Rockwood and W. L. Gerhart, M. D.

The "Coral Union" held a musical entertainment in Bucknell Hall on the evening of February 24, for the benefit of "The Student Loan Society." Mr. R. B. Davidson impersonated the musical enthusiast whose daughter was offered as a prize for the best vocal solo given by the characters, each representing different nationalities.

The University has been made a residuary legatee of the estate of Dr. Chauncey B. Ripley, deceased, late of New York city. By the will of the late Elizabeth W. Moore, of Philadelphia, the institution will also receive $1,000 for the endowment. Two thousand dollars from the Logan estate, establishing the Lycoming county scholarship, have been paid over to the treasurer.

The Shakespeare Club discusses the fact that the author always represents his characters as falling in love at first sight, and Davis asks, what is love, anyway?" Cober replies—"Love is inward inexpressibleness and outward all-overishness." This differs decidedly from the definition given by Miss Wolfe in the literature class—that Rosalind's feeling toward Orlando was merely a friendly interest.

In addition to the account given of the contest between Freshmen and Sophs, we give the decision of the board of arbitration consisting of three Seniors and two Juniors. After the board had deliberated on the merits of the contest for some time, they appeared bearing the following decision: "So far as the accomplishing of the objects of either side is concerned, we decide the fight a draw, with the advantage at the time the contest was stopped in favor of the Sophomores." The last clause was adopted by a vote of three to two.

Washington's Birthday was appropriately celebrated. In the afternoon, President Harris delivered an address on the federal government. He showed how our system was developed, not from Greek and Roman models, but from the Saxon Witenagemot, how this had been modified before our fathers left England, and how, after they came to this land, they had developed new features which England and other nations were adopting. He showed what part Washington had played in organizing our government and spoke of the men, like Marshall and Lincoln, who had contributed much that the world, outside of ourselves, considered valuable.

On the evening of Washington's Birthday the pupils were entertained in Bucknell Hall by "Something new." A contest was held in Prohibition Oratory. Of the four speakers, Mr. E. C. Kunkle was judged to be the best man to represent the College at the Inter-Collegiate contest at Williamsport next June. As our singers were prevented from assisting the program on that evening by "other engagements"—interesting especially to the Freshmen—the Prohibition Quartette, of Williamsport, rendered very suitable entertainment. During the latter part of the evening, Professor Hulley made an address, presenting a few most convincing arguments in favor of the prohibition movement.

Many years ago in a village tavern in Germany, Lowell found the following inscription:

Fürchte Gott
So wirst du selig!
Trinke Bier
So wirst du fröhlich!
D'rum furchte Gott!
und
Trinke Bier,
So wirst du selig
und
Frohlich hier!

And he translated it in this wise:

Fear thou God
And thou'lt be holy!
Drink thou beer
And thou'lt be jolly!
So fear thou God
and
Drink thou beer,
And thou'lt be holy
Jolly here.

February 22nd, unlike many another day of battle, dawned bright and fair. Everything had been comparatively quiet during the previous night. The Sophs were on the alert and accordingly slept on their arms. The Freshies, too, were not to be taken by surprise. Each man was ready for the fray, but there was no call to arms. The latter's sentinels whiled away the monotony of the night by emblazoning their coat of arms on the gymnasium roof and by daubing various disgusting expressions on the walk in front of the college building. Capt. Fisk, of the Freshies, assembled his men at an early hour and with a red flag at their head, '97 paraded through the town. Douglass, of the clan of '96, was the first to see the enemy. Quickly sounding the alarm, the Sophs gathered from all quarters under the leadership of Capt. Lesher. Capt. Fisk had his men massed together like a Roman phalanx, himself in the center with the standard of anarchy lashed to his body. Slowly and with measured tread, the little army came up the path past the laboratory toward the college, where the ranks of '96, with sullen look and clenched fist, awaited them. When about four rods distant, '96 gave a mighty warwhoop and rushed upon the approaching enemy. The conflict was short and fierce, but indecisive. The loss was small on both sides—principally blood and temper. The Freshies retired from the field of battle to the shelter of the Academy with the flag in their possession. The Sophs raised exultant shouts of victory, because they had stayed the onward progress of the Freshies. Thus ended the great battle between '96 and '97, which—

> Some say the Freshies won and some say the Sophs won,
> And some say that none won at a' man ;
> But one thing I say, sir, that on that day, sir,
> A battle there was, which I saw, man.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Miss Carrie Geary, of Carbondale, visited "old friends" at Bucknell.

Mrs. Larison attended the February meeting of the Bucknell Alumnae Club in Philadelphia.

Misses Edith and May Hull '90, of Olyphant, are studying methods of kinder-garten work in Scranton.

The operetta Enthusiast was well appreciated, and the amount realized was given to the Student's Loan Society of the Institute.

A "starvation symposium" was given by the members of the C. E. Society, on Friday evening, March 2, at the residence of Rev. Judd.

On Saturday, February 17, a merry company of Seminary girls enjoyed a sleigh ride to Milton given by their friends at the hill. They all took supper at Hotel Haag and returned highly delighted with the evening's pleasure.

The February meeting of the Lewisburg Alumnae Club was an interesting one. Music by Miss Harris enlivened the occasion; while much amusement was afforded by a "pronouncing bee." Mrs. J. T. Judd received a book as first prize.

The anthem which was sung in Bucknell Hall on Sunday, February 18, was composed by a member of the Bucknell Music School, Miss Faust, of Watsontown. Miss Faust was awarded a prize by Dr. Aviragnet for this musical composition.

The Bucknell Alumnae Club, of Philadelphia, held the second meeting of the year on February 26, at the Woman's Exchange. The guest of the day was Mrs. Nathan Shepherd, who spoke concerning "Some Well known People, whom I have Met." Tickets were presented at the door, bearing the words "Show your colors," as a gentle reminder of the "orange and blue." The following papers were prepared and read : "Are the Pen and Broom at War with each other?" Mrs. E. R. Cobb ; "Seminary Girls and Pastor's Assistants," Mrs. F. M. Goodchild ; "Educated Women as Home Leaders," Mrs. Jas. Bailey, "News from Our Folks," Mrs. Harrison O'Harra.

The imitation fever is strong in the Cad. Mr. Wragg has followed the example of his elocution teacher, Josephs, and has parted with his mustache.

A Shakespeare club has been organized in the Academy with Prof. Heim as instructor. The club is open to all the students of the Academy. Those desiring to join can do so without expense. The club meets every Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock.

The prospects for the Academy Base Ball team are remarkably bright. Under the able management of Mr. Purdy and the captaincy of Mr. Bayard, the team ought to demonstrate the ability of the Cad in this line of athletics. The manager has already made arrangements to practice with the college team, which will be mutually advantageous. Keep your eye on the ball team.

THE STUDENT'S DREAM.

I had a dream the other night,
  When everything was still;
I thought that angles, lines and squares,
  Played over me at will.

A circle fell around my neck,
  A point got in my eye,
A rombus and a rumboid fought
  Together on my thigh.

A Parallelopipedon
  Lay flat across my nose,
Whilst trapezoids and triangles
  Were strung along my toes.

A regular dodecagon
  Skipped lightly o'er my face,
And two tribedial angles
  Together ran a race.

And awakening next morning,
  I thought at least to find
A dozen parallelograms
  Cemented in my mind.

But when I came to rack my brains
  In G'ometry that day,
Not even one poor theorem
  Got left in there to stay. —Ex.

Editorial.

THE base ball cage now in course of construction in the gymnasium will, no doubt, prove a valuable addition to the athletic apparatus already there. The earliness of spring may render the cage somewhat unnecessary this season, but in future years its advantages will be fully appreciated. For this, as for many other favors, we are indebted to our genial registrar, Mr. W. C. Gretzinger, who devoted the proceeds of the recent concert to this object in particular and base ball in general.

IT is to be regretted that it was deemed necessary to remove the bowling-alleys from the gymnasium. Bowling in itself is an innocent sport, and one affording good exercise, but when used for wrong purposes it becomes a source of evil. Without entering into a discussion as to who abused this privilege, nor as to the best means of correcting the evil, we may say that as the balls and pins were taken away some time ago the mere alleys, as such, were of no earthly use, but occupied badly needed space. On these grounds it was decidedly better to replace them with something that can be used.

IT is a favorable sign to see the early organization of the base ball team. Is is even more favorable to see so many men on the diamond practicing and competing for positions. With an aggressive manager, a capable captain and an enthusiastic team we shall have, doubtless, an interesting season of ball. Already, we understand, dates have been secured with various college teams, and more are being arranged. All who play should turn out in full force and give Bucknell the best team it ever had.

WE devote this number mainly to college athletics. This is done in the hope that with the return of a new season interest in outdoor sports will be aroused and enthusiasm maintained. A splendid campus, good facilities, and excellent training in the gymnasium during the winter months should cause every student to engage in open air exercise with vim and delight. The articles on this subject, we are sure, will be read with pleasure and profit, and if their advice, either direct or implied, is followed the result will be physically beneficial to all of us.

WE take pleasure in presenting to our readers a picture of last season's football team. Tho not so successful as we could have wished, yet their record is good and their playing showed many strong qualities. Altogether we have been fortunate in almost all of our football teams. With so few from whom to select. with players who are students in fact as well as in name, thereby devoting only a limited portion of time to practice, and with very little coaching or outside help, Bucknell has been able to put on the field nearly every season a creditable team. Nor was the last team least worthy of honor. The majority of games resulted in their favor, and those which were lost had close scores. Hard practice, perseverance and skill contributed to the season's fair measure of success.

TENNIS is becoming more popular than ever. Already the wielders of the racket are getting the courts in order and playing games. Altho it is too early in the season to tell just who or how many will develop into good players, yet it may be well to have our minds fixed upon a tournament at the close of the school year. Last year we failed in such a project partly because we started too late in working it up. A committee should be appointed NOW by the Athletic Association to watch up possible contestants, and urge all players to compete for places in the tournament that the exhibition may be interesting. The men we have at present are, probably, not inferior to those of former years, but need only to develop their skill to become first-class players.

In this connection may we not venture to suggest that the University lay out a few courts and maintain them for general use. The courts now in use have been made by individual labor and expense; and certainly to those who were granted the privilege of constructing courts, and who put time and money into them, belongs the right—even the exclusive right—of playing upon them. Thus we need more courts, or a completion of those partially finished. These, we think, should be made by the University that the great number of students desiring to play may be accommodated without encroaching on the rights of others.

WHAT IS PATHOS?

The task of determining in what the essence of pathos consists is a difficult one because, as in the case of all subjective qualities, there is no constant standard by which to judge. Not only is there no outward measure, but our mental standard is continually undergoing modification. Our conception changes as we become older, so that stories and incidents which in childhood seemed to us most touching, we style "foolish" when we are more mature, and we think pityingly of the time when such things could influence us. When we are older, our standard is influenced largely by our occupation. People of ordinary sensibility would feel pity for the innocent young girls carried to the guillotine at the time of the French Revolution; but a Barnaby Rudge would view the scene from a hangman's point of view. Education and cultivation, also, influence our ideal of pathos.

With the standard varied thus by age, occupation and education, the only way to determine in what pathos consists, is to eliminate all elements which are contrary to pathos as we find it in literature and in our own experience, and then to submit the result to the judgment of as many as possible.

There is a pathos in what may be called cruelty toward innocence; in the abuse and sufferings of children or of the lower animals; so the trouble of Mimsey and her playmate in Kipling's "Light that Failed," touches us and makes us indignant, but the element of true pathos is lacking. We sympathize with them; we put ourselves in their places; we do not suffer because they do, but we feel as we ourselves would in like circumstances. Many persons see pathos in the budding of the trees before the frosts are over, and in the death of the flowers, but it is because they are so in touch with nature that they read themselves into inanimate life, and are in reality pitying themselves. In the case of dumb animals the feeling is that of dislike to inflict pain or to witness it. We sympathize with nature and animals, but our deepest feeling is not touched. Pathos includes sympathy but it contains an element to which sympathy is a stranger.

In pathos there must be no ill-will or resentment. Ophelia in her insanity utters not a word of reproach to the murderer of her father whose death crazed her, and, as Horatio said, "Her mood must needs be pitied." The sight of Ophelia, singing love ditties as she distributes flowers to her hearers, is truly pathetic. The forebodings of Desdemona, when she sings the death-song of Barbara—in fact the whole scene before her murder, is pathetic, and also, her last words, "Commend me to my lord,"—"my murderer," she might have said.

It is the undying, unreproaching love and devotion to her husband that moves us. Our feeling for her is not the sympathy we have with an abused child or injured animal. It is something higher. So, too, there must be something higher in the way she bears the wrong done her, that causes deeper emotion in us.

A spirit that grovels under persecution does not affect us so strongly as one that suffers in silence. Isaac, of York, as Scott represents him in "Ivanhoe," is a most pitiable object, tortured unjustly for his money ; but his abject attitude removes all possibility of pathos. We are indignant at his tormentors, but cannot feel much sympathy for the mercenary wretch. If, on the other hand, a person in trouble rebels and "takes arms against a sea of troubles," our sympathy for him is lessened. The picture of Job complaining to God, and protesting his innocence, is not nearly so touching as that of Samson, after the Lord had departed from him, grinding in the prison-house. There is pathos in that once-powerful figure, silent, bowed, grinding with stones—a woman's task. Not only in literature, but in life, also, there is pathos in the down-fall of a powerful man, if the calamity be borne patiently. There is a feeling that the man who rebels has, in a measure, satisfied his grudge against fortune, while the uncomplaining spirit raises up champions for itself.

Neither is there pathos in the suffering that continually advertizes itself, calling upon its witnesses to sympathize with it. There is a dislike on the part of most people to become "universal sympathyzing machines." Acting that is evidently intended to make a heavy draft upon the feelings of the audience, falls far short of its aim.

There must be in pathos something that compels our respect and admiration—the feeling that the sufferer is rising above his trials, and is showing himself more noble in affliction than in success. Jean Valjean, in his intense struggle with himself—debating whether to deliver himself to justice, or allow another to die in his place—would not be so truly pathetic if the less noble side of his nature had prevailed.

So, then, while in pathos there must be no ostentation, resentment, groveling, rebelliousness, abjectness or complaint, there must be superiority and nobleness. The feeling that the sufferer is acting more nobly than the majority would in the same circumstance, is the element in pathos that is not found in sympathy.

ENGLISH LITERATURE IN THE LIBRARY.

Some time since, in accordance with the suggestion of President Harris and a vote of the Trustees, I addressed a circular to the Alumni, asking for contributions to the department of English Literature. The Alumni had already, by formal vote, adopted this alcove as their own and one for which they were to care. Along with the circular was sent a list of desirable books and a postal card. I append a list of the results of my effort :

Rev. O. P. Eaches, D. D.,
The English Language—Lounsbury,	1 vol.
Rev. D. W. Sheppard,
Demosthenes—Bredif, ...	1 "
Rev. T. A. Gill, D. D.,
Complete Works—Lowell, . . .	12 "
Letters—Lowell, ...	2 "
American Literature—Nichol, . .	1 "
Chaucer—Lounsbury, ...	3 "
Prof. J. Wolverton,
Studies in Shakespeare—White. .	1 "
Rev. W. H. Conard, D. D.,
Familiar Quotations—Bartlett, . .	1 "
Miss Nellie Conard,
English Literature—Taine, . . .	2 "
Mr. W. C. Gretzinger,
Johnson's Six Lives—Arnold, . .	1 "
Rev. A. B. Still,
Homiletics—Hoppin, ...	1 "
Prof. H. M. Kelly,
Forensic Oratory—Robinson, . .	1 "
Rev. S. S. Merriman,
English Miracle Plays—Pollard, . .	1 "
Inspiration—Horton, ...	1 "

It will thus be seen that these, our friends, have materially helped us, and to them we owe a debt of gratitude. But it will just as readily be seen that, up to this time, very many of the Alumni have not felt it their duty to assist. If anybody should ask me, "What are Alumni Associations good for?" I should reply, "Why, to help their Alma Mater, of course." If that same person were to ask me, ' If they neglect this duty, are they not good for anything else?" I should reply, "Nothing that I can think of, and the matter has been on my mind for a long time." E. P.

OLD TIME BALL PLAYERS.

I shall endeavor to accede to your request for a short sketch of the college ball team of twenty-five years ago.

It is said that lightning never strikes twice in the same place; and yet, I have personal knowledge of the remarkable fact that at four different times our College campus has been struck. An estimable lady, somewhat afraid of lightning, was accustomed to remark, some years ago, that she fully believed all these dreadful storms came to punish us for permitting those wicked games of ball to be played upon our campus.

In view of this good woman's opinion, it may be worth while, for the sake of those who are now aspiring to positions upon "the team," to inquire what does really become of our ball players. How fares it with the members of the "Varsity" nine of a quarter of a century ago? Do their careers in life go to show that only "the wicked" play ball at college, or, that boys of the stamina that make men, are the leaders upon the diamond field?

Twenty-five years ago, during the spring term of my freshman year, I found myself among the successful candidates for a position upon the college nine. Among my associates of this team was Martin Bell, '69. Bell played first base that year with a vim and enthusiasm that would put him on the initial bag to-day, were he a candidate. Mr. Bell has been for many years a leading lawyer at Hollidaysburg, Pa. He now sits among the judges in Blair county, having been elected a year ago to succeed the Hon. Judge Dean, now of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

Henry Bliss, '70, was our great out-fielder. His throwing from deep centre, after a catch, surprised many a base-runner. Mr. Bliss located in Washington, D. C., shortly after graduation from college, where he rapidly rose to prominence in his chosen profession. As a leading lawyer of the capital city he is widely known to-day.

George Matlack, '70, was our popular third-baseman. Always held in the highest esteem as a strong player and fair-minded man, he was generally chosen to umpire our inter-class games; a series of such games being played from time to time for class championships. His career was that of a successful business man. He lived many years in our midst, esteemed for his kind, courteous bearing and generous public spirit. We who knew him well are sad that his race is run.

William Grier, as catcher, and Frank Marr, as pitcher, were our famous battery. Marr's home was in Lewisburg, and much of his work, since graduation, has been accomplished here. He has made money in the electric light business. Grier died at the early age of thirty five. He served his alma mater ten years as Professor of Latin. Great things were expected of Grier.

John Humpstone, '71, played the position of second base during his course of four years. I am confident that no one ever played "second" here more enthusiastically and more successfully. Humpstone was a ball player. He felt then that it was a glorious thing to catch a runner at "second." His address to-day is Dr. Humpstone, pastor of the Emmanuel Baptist Church, Brooklyn.

Joseph Bogert, '71 was our brilliant short-stop. As a hard and safe batter he had no superior on the nine. He was a worker and went in for success. Bogert rose to eminence as a politician. He served as chairman of the Democratic State Committee, and received the nomination of his party for State Treasurer. He was postmaster of the city of Wilkesbarre when he died some six years ago.

J. W. Putnam, '72, was probably the best known student of his time, in Lewisburg. Putnam was the life of "the team." He was a formidable pitcher in those days. The opposing batsman was a man of nerve if he was not rattled by the deceptive antics of Putnam. Mr. Putnam resigned the pastorate of the Temple Baptist church, of Philadelphia, a few years ago to take charge of the endowment movement for Bucknell. His success in this undertaking is well known to all of us.

At present, with the pretext of freeing college athletics from professionalism, and of minimizing certain alleged dangers to life and limb, our leading universities are abridging most privileges formerly granted to college athletes. Dr. Eliot's rules evidently aim at the abolition of inter-collegiate contest altogether. All this opposition is, to my mind, a mistake. It grows out of the prevalent false notion that athletics have no value beyond that of enabling one to study with effect, or of keeping up the full working powers of the mind by physical exercise. There is, however, a discipline that belongs to athletics alone. Courage, self-restraint, self-reliance and other qualities essential to the strong man, may be cultivated not from the studies of the curriculum but from the contests of the diamond and of the gridiron.

A REVIEW OF THE ATHLETIC SITUATION AT BUCKNELL.

The fact that Bucknell is a denominational school may, or may not, be detrimental to her interests. It is certain, however, that within the past four years her student body has well nigh doubled. In the faculty a necessary increase has been made, due to the number of students, the enlargement of the curriculum and the progressive tendency of the college.

It is not to discuss the position of Bucknell as a denominational school, nor to speak of the scholastic advantages of the institution, that this article is written, but to review the athletic situation in the college. In order to get data from which to properly discuss this matter, let us bear in mind the athletic averages of the past three years:

1.—FOOTBALL.

From these figures the present university records may be known, and the ease with which they can be broken may be deduced.

With the above information at hand, let us seek the causes of success and failure in our athletic sports.

Tho' Bucknell is a small college, the number of men in the collegiate department being 120, yet she has been successful in football as far as the number of games and amount of interest displayed is concerned. Obvious reasons for these facts are, first, the physical condition of the candidates after a summer of labor; second, the practice and training necessary to play the game; third, the frequent changes of men, due to injuries and rivalry; fourth, the hope of gaining a position upon the team.

A waning of enthusiasm in football toward the close of a season may be ascribed to the injuries of the captains, the failure to train, the jealousy of players, and the loss of an important game.

Among the causes of a lack of interest in other sports may be mentioned the comparative poverty of our students. Between thirty and forty of the men are dependent upon the Baptist Educational Board for their education.

Again, the university itself and the alumni have not displayed an alarming desire to foster an athletic spirit among the students. A few shekels from our alumni would produce a pleasant warmth about the cockles of our hearts.

Further, the envy and jealousy with which the members of the different fraternities regard one another is a lamentable feature of our school life. Whether just cause exists, or not, makes no difference; there is always a suspicion that one fraternity is trying to outwit another. This hostile attitude has its effect not only upon the fraternity men, but upon those who do not belong to an organization. Because the feeling is present, non-fraternity men look askance upon any sport in which the fraternity men seem to be prominent.

Having briefly reviewed the causes of success and failure in the past, what remedies can be suggested to bring us success, harmony and honor in the future?

That the athletic field needs improvement is certain. Leveling and sodding would add to its appearance and make it more agreeable to base and football players. For real track athletics a track is a nececessity. We shall remain among the old-time colleges until we secure a proper equipment for field and track athletics.

Our candidates for teams must train in order to make the most out of themselves and to bring honor to their Alma Mater. Between the fraternities there should exist a friendly, tho' earnest, rivalry. When fraternities become, or seem to be, mere political organizations, it is time for the members to inquire into the idea of brotherhood which lies at the foundation of their existence. The real spirit which should dominate in sports as pursued by college fraternity men should be, first, the honor of the university; second, the welfare of the fraternity; third, the personal ambition of the members. A due amount of assistance from the university and the alumni, both in coin and words of wisdom, will do much toward increasing the interest in athletics.

Lastly, there is needed among the students as a whole, a strong love of the games themselves, a determination to defeat opposing teams, and an intense enthusiasm for the welfare of their Alma Mater.

BUCKNELL'S FOOTBALL TEAM, '93.

In this issue we present our readers with a cut of Bucknell's football team for the season of '93. The team played seven games in all, winning four and losing three. Those from whom Bucknell won were: Shamokin; Penna. College, of Gettysburg; Haverford, and Dickinson. Those colleges to whom games were lost were: Franklin and Marshall College, of Lancaster; Swarthmore, and Pennsylvania State College. The season was a successful one as far as financial management was concerned, a large balance being left in the treasury at the close of the season. The one universal regret of the college was the fact that Mr. H. F. Smith, who has taken such a leading part in all college athletics for the past four years, was compelled to resign his position as captain and manager three weeks before Thanksgiving Day. This undoubtedly weakened our team for the State College game of Nov. 11, although Mr. Smith was prevailed upon to play in all the games of the season—Mr. Barclay, of the Academy, accepting the position of captain. Five members of the team were new men, and their good work and rapid development last year predicts success for Bucknell's team in the coming year.

Local.

On the 2nd, Jennings returned to his home at Norfolk, Va.

Mr. Bowen has been elected captain of the base ball team for the coming spring term.

When Mr. W—— calls at the Sem. he must assume another name if he desires attention.

Kendall, '94, has been elected Orderly Sergeant of Company A., Twelfth Regiment N. G. P.

The sermon before the Y. M. C. A. will be preached in the Baptist church, Sunday, April 15.

Messrs. Wood, Smith, Brick and Harper played the first tennis game of the season last Saturday.

Prof. G. M. Phillips, of West Chester, will lecture in Bucknell Hall some time during the month of April.

The Angstadt club has elected its captain and manager for the spring term's base ball team—Bunnel, captain; Fretz, manager.

Mr. Hanna lately made a tour east, and Sunday, March 11, occupied the pulpit of the First Baptist church of Bridgeport, Conn.

A number of the students have already signed contracts to canvass for subscription books during the summer. Views seem to be at a discount at present.

Dr. Brown has secured a tiny pair of shoes (size 1) to accompany his diploma, which he exhibited at the recent mock trial. Call on Dr. Brown for particulars.

Mr. Pease was very liberal at the recent social held at the home of Pastor Judd. In answer to the request for a pound of provisions, he kindly offered his 130 pounds of Pease—whiskers having been already reserved at home.

J. C. Carey has been worried considerably of late by the fact that Reno, Camp, and a host of other worthies, are applicants for the position of short-stop on the base ball team.

The following comes from the Seminary :

We like the haughty Seniors,
  And modest Juniors, too,
But noisy Freshs and boastful Sophs,
  We entirely eschew.

Prof. of Ethics.—"Mr. Riggin, you may discuss the topic, 'will essential to personality.'" Mr. Riggin, almost choked by words—"I would that my tongue could utter the thoughts that arise in me."

The first indication of spring noticed around Bucknell was the presence of general agents for various subscription-book publishing houses ; the second, was poetry from the fertile brain of Vastine.

A Senior, as he sauntured in rather late to a tri-daily meeting of the Starvation Club, was heard to remark : "This abstract process of satisfying the cravings of appetite is beginning to make me weary."

The prosperity of the Baptist church at Northumberland is due, partly to the zealous, untiring labors of the pastor, Rev. A. S. Barner, and partly to the earnest efforts of the choirmaster, Mr. E. R. Powell.

Sheddan, having tired of the study of agricultural philosophy and the raising of poultry as a fine art, on the 7th inst. disposed of an elegant assortment of farming implements and chicken incubators.

The Chemical and Physical Society, through the indefatigable efforts of Prof. Owens, continues to prosper and to exercise a commanding influence over scientific thought and investigation in the university.

Prof. of Carpentry—"Mr. Reno, will you please call again this afternoon?" Mr. Reno—"Why?" Prof.—"I want some holes put in this board." Mr. Reno (enraged)—"Oh, I'm a 'bore,' am I?" —Macnab's Joke Book.

The object of Bourn's bi-weekly visits to Danville is a puzzle to his friends, some of whom hazard the opinion that he is interested in Sunday school work, while others are rash enough to suppose that he goes home only to see his mother.

Is there any relation between measles and whiskers? Would Pease have been taken sick if he had allowed that magnificent growth of hair to continue to adorn his face? These are questions for the consideration of our prospective doctors.

The Professor had piled illustration upon illustration in order to make the point perfectly clear. After he had ceased speaking, and was wiping the perspiration from his brow, Mr. J—— remarked, "Prof. I don't quite see the force of your illustrations."

Because bed clothes are used to fill up some of the openings in the windows of Brick's and Cregar's room, visitors to the university should not take it as a sign of the poverty of the occupants. It merely indicates that a stray snow-ball has passed that way.

Scene—Class in English literature. Time—Next morning "After the Ball." Prof. (calling the roll)—Megargee, Rohland, (no answer). Megargee! Rohland! (Looks up. Proceeds to lecture the class for allowing its ministerials to preach regularly.)

The regular annual election of the Y. M. C. A. which took place Tuesday evening, March 6, resulted as follows : President, Ezra Allen ; vice-president, S. R. Wood ; corresponding secretary, H. T. Colestock ; recording secretary, E. C. Kunkle ; treasurer, A. Douglass ; sergeant-at-arms, J. W. Davis.

Senior to Soph—"Have you heard the latest?" Soph—"No, what is it?" Senior—"One of your classmates has been stolen." Soph. very much excited—"Who? Who has stolen him? Where has he been taken?" Senior—"Megargee is the man. The faculty has stolen him from the Sophs and placed him among the Freshmen—in the catalogue."

A man is generally considered justified in using all legitimate means to improve his personal appearance. Mr. D——, a dignified Senior, occasionally uses his sister's curling irons to make those lovely ringlets which deck his forehead and which the Seminary girls think so bewitching. In this case, however, the question arises, are the means legitimate?

Dr. Perrine delivered a lecture on "Lowell," on Friday evening March 2, before the Young Ladies Seminary at Lutherville, Maryland. "Bucknell" is represented on the faculty by Miss S. I. Van Gundy, of the Institute class of 1884, who holds a prominent position there. Dr. Perrine speaks in the highest terms of the institution, its Principal—the Rev. Mr. Twiner—its corps of cultivated teachers and its pupils, all of whom made his visit one of great pleasure. He was glad to hear from Prossessor Yance high praise for the Bucknell MIRROR, and coming from those who direct such a paper as the Lutherville Seminarian, it was praise of which to be proud. He also visited the Woman's College at Baltimore, as the guest of Miss Catharine Baker, Institute class of 1893, where the Dean and the Professors told him of the good opinions she is winning for her scholarship.

On March 9, the second preliminary debate of the Junior class was held. This occasion was public, and a goodly audience assembled in Bucknell Hall to hear arguments for and against the abolition of the U. S. Senate. The seven disputants, while each spoke individually, brought forth various facts and arguments, and general freshness characterized the remarks. The debaters regretted to notice that the faculty, who, it is understood, have established the prize to be awarded at the final contest, were conspicuous by their absence. The judges chose Allen, Jackson, Schuyler and Sheddan to conduct the debate next term, at which time the prize of fifty dollars will be divided between the best two speakers. This "final" is expected to occur about commencement time.

The delegates to the Student Volunteer convention held recently at Detroit, report a very profitable meeting. It is interesting to note that to the students is due the honor of calling together the largest missionary convention ever held on this continent. Of the total number present, 1,187 were students, representing 294 educational institutions. Even law schools sent delegates. Missionaries, members of home boards and other speakers give the grand total of 1,357 registered visitors, while a large number of unregistered, who were in the city for the convention, were not accessible to the executive committee for estimation. None but an interdenominational body, (which the Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions is) could have assembled an equal concourse of Christians. Thirty-eight denominations of the United States and Canada, and one delegate from England were present.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Misses Bertha Shirley, '91, and Katherine F. Dill, '84, were recently the guests of friends in town.

The Hermenia Literary Society gave a straw ride to Pine Grove school house Saturday evening, March 10th.

We owe to the facile pen of Miss Nellie Conard the following interesting account of the doings of our Alumnæ: "On Monday afternoon, the 26th of February, the Bucknell Alumnæ Club of Philadelphia, met at the Woman's Exchange. In spite of the heavy snow fall of the previous night and the rain driven along the streets by a north-easterly blast, quite a number of us braved the pittiless storm. 'We girls,' some young and some older, did not mind the weather, though we did give ourselves an approving pat on the back and indulge in a smile of self-satisfaction when a sudden gust of wind or the noise of the sleet against the window panes reminded us how severe the storm was. After a dainty luncheon had been served, and while we were sipping our coffee, Mrs. Spratt introduced the guest of the occasion, Mrs. Nathan Sheppard, whose husband, a former student of Bucknell, was professor in the universities at Edinburgh and Aberdeen for a number of years.

"Mrs. Sheppard had prepared a paper on 'Some Well Known People I Have Met.' It is impossible to make any one who did not hear this paper appreciate its charms. In a quaint and remarkably original way Mrs. Sheppard described for us her life in England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales. How swiftly she took us in imagination through towns and cities famous by their association with genius! One by one great men and women, who have fascinated us as we have read their books, were presented to us so real that we were a trifle embarassed at finding ourselves in the presence of so many celebrities.

"Then we were borne on to Paris—Paris, the charming and wicked. Streets made famous by historical events and hallowed by the genius of famous men were pictured for us. Mrs. Sheppard gave us some hints of her life here during the Franco-Prussian War, when Paris was besieged for four months. Gladly would we have heard more, but the memories of that time were too sad. The paper was read in a modest, gentle way, and has left golden memories with those who heard it.

"Mrs. E. M. E. R. Cobb, one of the editors of the National Baptist, was next introduced. She discussed the question, 'Are the Pen and Broom at War With Each Other?' Several kinds of literary women were described. The woman who writes something brilliant, but is totally oblivious to the existence of cobwebs and dust. The ideal woman in the literary field was presented to us. Her's was a home where order and neatness had a place. There was no neglect of the home in order that its mistress might rush to her 'sanctum sanctorum' and court the literary muse.

"A talk on 'Seminary Girls as Pastors' Assistants,' was given by Mrs. F. M. Goodchild. We heard of the pastor's wife as some think she should be, but as she never can be while she has such cross-grained mortals to contend with. The pastor's wife as she is was before us, just as susceptible to right and wrong as we. The talk was full of humor, and many playful references were made. Through it all, however, there was a vein of sound common sense, and many good lessons were learned from it. Mrs. Harrison O'Harra, read 'Some News from Our Folks,' telling of life and its interests at our 'Alma Mater.' "

'64. Rev. T. A. K. Gessler, D. D., of New York, recently delivered an address on Emotionalism of Religion before the Baptist Congress held at Atlanta, Ga. The address was one of the most brilliant before the Congress and was most favorably received. Dr. Gessler has removed his church to the upper portion of New York in one of the substantial residence parts of the city, where he can do more efficient work.

'65. Rev. E. Everett Jones is the successful pastor of the Baptist church, of Clinton, N. J. He has recently recovered from a severe illness, but has entered upon his work with renewed vigor.

'65. Rev. H. B. Garner is pastor of the Memorial Mission, 18th and York streets, Philadelphia.

'66. Alfred Taylor, Esq., whose reputation at the bar of New York is well known to the friends of Bucknell, has recently added greatly to his celebrity as a pleader by his brilliant advocacy of the Howe-Woodruff case, one of the causes celebres. A verdict for his client under most difficult circumstances was the recent reward of his labor. This verdict was undoubtedly a cause of great joy to Mr. Taylor, but that which will cause equally profound congratulations on the part of his friends and which also equally gratified his paternal heart, was the arrival in this world of Alfred Taylor, Jr., during the progress of the trial.

IN MEMORIAM.

Milton Compton Reinhold, class of 1888, died at his home, Mahanoy City, March 1, aged 27 years. Mr. Reinhold was, at the time of his death, one of the most promising young lawyers at the Pottsville Bar. In three years he had risen to distinction. His practice was so large as to require an assistant. In college Mr. Reinhold was a general favorite, all classes liked him. His nature was genial, kind and courteous; his class work gave promise of a bright future; his habits were studious, and his acquisitions solid. In literary work, debate and similar duties, he was especially strong. Mr. Reinhold leaves a young wife and a small child. He was buried in Pottsville March 6. His funeral was the largest ever known in Mahanoy City, all classes attesting their respect. Two train loads of people accompanied the body from Mahanoy City to Pottsville. Prof. Lincoln Hulley, of Bucknell, his former classmate, preached the funeral sermon. A number of his old school friends Messrs. Pellman, Jones, Bucher, Gretzinger and Ginter attended the funeral. The Sigma Chi fraternity, of which he was a prominent member, adopted the following resolutions at a special meeting:

WHEREAS, It has pleased God to remove from our midst our much beloved friend and brother, Milton Compton Reinhold; and

WHEREAS, We, the members of Kappa Chapter of Sigma Chi Fraternity, deem it fitting to place on record some testimonial of his services as a Sigma Chi and manly worth, be it therefore

Resolved, That in the death of Milton Compton Reinhold, this Fraternity and Chapter loses a loyal and zealous brother; one who was devoted to the welfare of Sigma Chi; wise in council and fearless in action; an honest and upright man, whose virtue endeared him, not only to the brothers of this Fraternity, but to all who knew him, and whose natural and educational abilities well fitted him for the career of brilliant promise upon which he had entered, and were sure to make him an ornament to his profession, a useful member to society and an honor to this Fraternity;

Resolved, That the chapter tenders its heartfelt sympathy to the family of our deceased brother, in this the hour of their affliction; and

Resolved, That the Halls of the Chapter be draped in mourning for a period of ten days, and that these resolutions be entered on the minutes of the Chapter, and a copy thereof be sent to the bereaved family and published in the University MIRROR and Sigma Chi Quarterly.

"Shall I brain him?" cried the hazer,

The Signal comes to us for the first time this week. It brings with it the impress of success. Much success to our new visitor.

We are glad to acknowledge the receipt of the Normal College Echo as a new exchange on our table. We trust we may be mutually benefitted by our exchanging.

The Athenuæm is always welcomed to our table. Among its various departments the "Corridor Man" is chiefly interesting. He always has something interesting to tell.

The Buff and Blue contains a short spicy editorial which pictures very vividly that class of college students who can never lay claim to the title of scholar. We trust it may be widely read.

$100,000 are offered to the University of Chicago, by Mr. Martin A. Ryerson of that city, provided the additional sum of $400,000 is raised before July 1st, 1894. Mr. John D. Rockefeller agrees, if this $500,000 is secured, to add an equal sum, thus making available for the uses of the University the grand total of $1,000,000. This will make Mr. Rockefeller's gifts amount to $3,250,000.

In an able editorial in The Carolinian strong hits are made in reference to all colleges affording a regular gymnasium instructor not taken from the student bodd. We are glad to see the aggressive spirit manifested by our contemporary of the "sunny south." The ancient Grecian idea of education is being revived everywhere, and we predict a marvellous change in college education, which will place more stress on physical culture.

The Red and Blue in its last issue published a prize story, entitled "An Elevator Romance," which deserves credit of mention. Besides the excellent composition which characterizes it, the fine and dignified romantic spirit displayed by the characters of the story give it a mark of excellence. We believe that such productions as the "Elevator Romance" and "As We Walked by the Beach," which also appeared in the same issue, filled with touches of human nature, not ideal nature, serve very well as an attraction to college journals. Too much of the dry prosy style of composition is not the most inclined to invite readers to our columns.

Editorial.

THE MOST beautiful season, the most welcome term of the whole school year has just dawned upon us. The time has come to slough off the collected mustiness, and emerge from our cells of hibernation; to enjoy fresh air, the cheerful sunshine, the twittering of the birds, the sweetness of the flowers; in a word, to drink in all the pleasure which a returning spring brings to us. We believe that our students will gladly avail themselves of the many out-door privileges which this term affords, not to study our text books less, but nature more.

THE day of eloquence and oratory has not passed. The press, mighty and influential as it is, has not usurped the prerogatives of the living voice, but rather has paved the way for true recognition of real merit. Because of the general enlightenment coming to the masses from the diffusion of literature, important changes in the style of some speakers have been rendered necessary. No longer is the ranting spread-eagle oration, with its high inflections and cheap sophistry, able to influence men. People to-day listen intelligently to discussions and weigh arguments. And the most effective orator to-day is he who presents his arguments and thoughts in logical order, couched in simple, forceful words, and in a conversational manner.

Nor does this method of speech call for less voice training. On the contrary such training must be more thoro that inflections when necessary may be given intelligently and with force; that the voice may be well modulated and not monotonous; that it may be persuasive and capable of influencing; that it may have compass and power. On this account the voice should have cultivation and the best of it.

The student who neglects this part of his education loses a means of influence for after life. A man may excel in knowledge and have a variety of original thoughts, but lacking the power of expression is often forced to retire before a speaker less gifted in other respects. To gain this power, then, is a "consummation devoutly to be wished." We should not confine our efforts to either theories, studies of oratory, or mere practice, but combine all three to make the most of those powers bestowed by nature.

THERE are few exercises in composition more beneficial than story writing. In the formation of a style at once unique and a true composite of all studied styles such work takes a very prominent part. In discursive writing, dependent as we are upon books for information, we are apt to imbibe not only the thoughts, but the very phraseology found there; to become servile imitators rather than independent writers. In story writing, however, one is thrown almost entirely upon his own resources. If there is any danger of imitation it will arise from a too exclusive study of one style. But in general the style will be a personal one. The formation of plots, the presentation of characters, are excellent drills for the mind, affording a wide scope for the imagination.

College papers publishing stories written by the students are much more readable than those printing essays. If a person wishes to read an article on the "Immutability of the Unchangeable," or the "Deathlessness of Immortality," he is hardly likely to look thro the files of a college journal, but will seek the sources of such discussions. And, as a rule, such articles in a college paper are little read. But the short story is always welcome. All that is required is that the plot be fairly developed and descriptive parts told with reasonable clearness. Naturalness and simplicity in construction is preferable to the ornate and florid style, and can be cultivated by any student. Many college magazines will admit very few essays, preferring to fill their literary columns with stories, many of them very meritorious. Students writing thus especially for their own paper would benefit themselves and greatly improve their journal.

TRUE criticism, if given in a fair spirit and fairly interpreted, is nearly always beneficial. This is as true of college papers as of individuals. But when criticism descends to mere accusation and recrimination it is puerile and unworthy the efforts of the men delivering it. From a college journal we learn that its esteemed contemporary, the ——, is deserving of pity because in a whole column there are only three lines worthy of perusal. And the accused retorts that they are sorrier still for the —— which has not even one line worth reading. And this very fight has been kept up for some time with about as good sense manifested as is exhibited in this special instance. The editors indulging in this sort of editorial boxing bouts have surely missed the aim of college journalism. So far as relations with other college papers is concerned, if comment and criticism does not prepare the way for broadness of view and a liberal toleration of those ideas emanating from sources other than our own faultless minds, it is, to say the least, narrow and restricted. Further, if a journal is always to be in arms to resist every criticism considered unjust, or to get even for a supposed injury, better far to keep the sensitive weakling at home, surrounded by its deluded worshipers. Let us have honest criticism and less bickering.

HAPPILY the small-pox scare is rapidly subsiding. The precautions taken by the borough authorities have rendered a general outbreak of the disease in the town very improbable. The sanitary condition of the college buildings are quite good. Many of the students are nursing sore arms as a result of vaccination, but otherwise no inconvenience is noticeable or anticipated.

Literary.

ALFRED TENNYSON.

History always cherishes the life of a great man. Historians as eagerly grasp the incident of a noble life as does the scientist a new ray of scientific truth as it flashes across his mental vision.

The nations of the earth through all the ages have vied with each other in shouting the names and exploits of their departed heroes. The hero worshipers of to-day, though less enthusiastic in their admiration for their country's chiefs than those of the heroic ages, are always ready to lend a voice in chanting the praises of their noble dead.

Every department of living action is represented in this universal uplifting of the voice of praise. The warrior, the statesman, the soldier, the explorer, philosopher and orator all receive a share of this human applause. Sometimes the nations join voices in their jubilant praises and make the welkin ring with their united commendation. Thus, not long since, the different peoples of the globe were lending their eulogistic comments to the memory of a man, who in the "Victorian Age" of literature has been elevated to the supreme rank of the "greatest poet of the age," and whose well known name is Alfred Tennyson.

The childhood days of every poet are always interesting, for they clothe his latter days with valuable suggestions and explanations. Tennyson strongly illustrates the truth that a poet is largely what his environments make him. Adventure and romance never entered into the life of this poet. With dreamland and fancy his boyhood days were filled. Being an intense lover of nature he delighted to revel in the realms of the ideal and Divine. The forest groves, the meadow land, the purling brook, the "brimming" river, and boisterous sea and all the avenues of divine province spoke volumes to his fanciful mind. As he passed away the fleeting hours in company with the muse of poetry, how many a majestic lay he pondered that ne'er was sung? These days of dreaming were destined to bloom into some of the finest expressions by poet penned.

He early began to manifest proofs that there were wrapt within his highly spiritual nature the powers of a true poet. This bent of character was strongly fostered by his persevering and determined disposition. Undaunted by his slashing and unmerciful reviewers, but impelled by an overmastering instinct, and the innate consciousness of his ability and power as a poet, he intrepidly but modestly ventures into the undeveloped regions of his divine art. His was a type of that energetic manhood which, though so reticent and modest, was full of confidence and lofty aspirations. No trace of vanity is found in his character, even not after all his crowned successes and brilliant achievements. His life has passed into history, free of that selfish spirit and desire for fame which so often obliterate the character of public men. The ultimate end of his ambition was to fill the office of a bard, unreservedly and true.

Tennyson, like most men, had a period of obscurity. Yet this period of silence in his life's history, is beyond doubt that season of private devotion to his life's mission which precedes the appearance of all men of letters on the public arena, that season of preparation and laying in store which marks the rise of a great man. Then he could be seen sitting in lonely silence many weary hours chiseling new forms of expression and embelishing the coarser products of his youthful attempts.

But soon he makes his appearance before the public with commanding presence. His productions find acceptance even at the hands of his sternest critics. He receives recognition by the Queen. His enemies begin to recognize in him an alarming competitor in the divine art. They begin to court his friendship. Pecuniary results encourage him to more strenuous efforts. His rank as a poet no longer is overshadowed with doubt. The civilized nations hear him; his works find a place in the libraries of the world, and his admirers give vent to their appreciations of his productions through the press, and to-day Tennyson is universally acknowledged the greatest of poets.

Tennyson hated publicity, seldom going into society. Although averse to the public gaze of the vulgar mass, and invariably found alone, yet he was not insensible to the public transactions. He closely watched the trend of the times and at the opportune hour he grandly rose to defend the right and to denounce with might the wrong. He was a recluse with his eyes open, ever ready to meet an emergency.

A poet's works are said to be a true index to his character. This maxim finds its strongest illustration in Tennyson. He has given us the essence of his life in a few of his productions. Although very imaginative, yet his works are full of the practical. The dominant theme of his works is the beautiful in nature. He constantly appeals to the highest virtues in his readers, love, sympathy, devotion. That he was capable of the highest love and affection to man is revealed in his most famous poem "In Memoriam," as a tribute to the dead Hallam. Arthur Hallam was his strongest earthly attachment. In 1830 the two friends together journeyed through France and spent a season of recreation among the Pyrenees. On revisiting these mountains long after, the Laureate, overcome by reminiscences of days gone by, gave expression to the affecting lines entitled "In the Valley of the Cauteretz:"

"All along the valley, stream that flashest white,
  Deepening the voice with the deepening of the night,
All along the valley where thy waters flow,
  I walked with one I loved two and thirty years ago.
For all along the valley, while I walked to-day
  The two and thirty years were a mist that rolled away;
For all along the valley down thy rocky bed,
  Thy living voice to me was the voice of the dead,
And all along the valley by rock and cave and tree,
  The voice of the dead was a living voice to me.

Tennyson was religiously inclined. He knew how to sympathize with the human family. His works prove that he possessed the "Summum bonum" which alone belongs to religious minds.

AN INTERVIEW WITH MR. PANZERA.

One of the interesting and suggestive mementoes which the writer has of the Second Student

Volunteer Convention, held recently at Detroit, is a card bearing this inscription :

P. K. PANZERA,
Mafeking,
British Bechuanaland,
South Africa.

Before the convention had formally opened, the room in the city Y. M. C. A. building, headquarters for delegates, was a busy, though quiet, scene of action. The tables were surrounded by letter-writers. A tall young man next to me addressed and sealed two or three envelopes, then turned to me and inquired about the place to obtain postage stamps. A long conversation followed, in which I played only the part of a questioner and intent listener.

Many interesting and instructive facts were brought forth that bear upon life and ways in the land known now mostly in connection with the names of Stanley and Livingstone. Mr. Panzera, in reply to a question concerning the ''fever belt,'' said that this is practically a strip of territory extending nearly all around the eastern and western coasts of the continent, some hundred miles or more inland, in width about two hundred miles. The poisonous mangrove tree, which crowds out all other growth, exhales the fever poison that brings certain death to the white person who attempts to spend many days under its influence. A naturalist has recently discovered an Australian plant which he has successfully planted in this poisonous district, and which has the power of counteracting the deadly nature of the original growth. Without doubt this new plant will eventually eradicate the deadly barrier to African colonization.

Mr. Panzera owns an ostrich farm on the Sahara, and in reaching it must cross the mangrove swamps. At some localities he might make use of one of the few railroads, but none is available in his neighborhood. He travels by ox-cart from the coast to the fever belt. when he mounts an ostrich and speeds away at 25 miles an hour. He declared that his seat is ''as easy as this chair which I am sitting on.'' The small head of the bird is fitted with a delicate bridle, and obeys the bit as well as any horse. The giraffe is also used somewhat as a beast of travel, but owing to the difficulty of fastening a saddle firmly on his sloping back, his highest speed cannot be utilized. A thong must be passed from the front of the saddle about the neck of the animal, and as he throws his long neck almost parallel with the ground when he runs, the thong binds his windpipe and hinders breathing. He is a very docile beast, and kind and gentle. When running at his highest rate, his neck reaches out horizontally, and both hind legs advance between the fore, making a sort of saw-buck combination. It is estimated from observation that the giraffe has attained a speed of 70 miles an hour. Large possibilities in the way of rapid transit, then, are open to the man who invents a saddle under which the animal can run freely.

Inside the fever belt, on the plateaus (which comprise nearly the whole of interior Africa) the climate is the best in the world, according to Mr. Panzera's opinion. When we consider the fact that all day for ten months in the year the mercury stands at 90°, we may give some considerable credence to his claim. The other two months are the rainy season, and then the heat is intense. Mr. Panzera's father is Governor General of Bechuanaland, and is placed over 12,000,000 people, with two missionaries, aside from the Church of England men who go there principally for the large pay and easy work in the British settlements. No one need to fear to preach the gospel in that climate, nor need anyone look down upon a people that despises the missionary who domineers, and orders his hut built, but will turn in and gladly help the one who sets about his carpentering himself. These people are not lazy, but having so little necessity to work for their vegetable food, and clothing being almost unnecessary, they are, of course, not progressive. They are a teachable people, and a broad and fertile field is presented for the industrial trainer.

The African method of despatching slave-dealers is not according to our legal methods, but is not many steps removed from our present lynch system, except in its torture. On the one hand, the white man shoots, without mercy, a slave dealer. On the other, the natives bind their unfeeling enemy to a hill inhabited by white ants, and leave him to the tender mercy of the little insects. Sometimes it takes them four days to reach the heart of the inhuman piece of humanity and relieve his agony. Yet he feels but a little portion of the pangs, physical and of the heart, that he has caused by his cruel lash, which tears off the flesh in strips from the unprotected backs of innocent men and women. The same lash is used for driving slaves as is employed in driving the 40-yoke teams of oxen in Africa, is fully one hundred feet long, and easily cuts the skin of an ox.

Mr. Panzera is not a missionary, but he says that the Christians are not dealing justly with Africa. There is need and abundant use for physicians, carpenters, shoemakers, and above all, plain men who can teach and live the sweet life of Christ. The climate need no longer be a hindrance. Even the dreaded fever belt will sink into the grave beside its unhappy victims of Africa's early history, and instead of a place of terror these swamps will be rich and productive homes.

The impression left upon me was that Mr. Panzera was well informed concerning the land of his father's adoption, and that his own sojourn in that land had been made with eyes wide and intelligently open. His simplicity of speech and manner showed plainly that he is one who can mingle with natives and get into their heart life, to sympathize with them, as a proud man cannot do. Africa looked more attractive, both from its needy side and from the fact that the interior highlands (more properly, plateaus) within the fever belt have throughout Africa, south of Sahara, that delightful constant temperature which was mentioned in connection with Bechuanaland. Africa has indeed a bright future before her, and from only a humanitarian or philanthropic point of view, now is the time for the missionary to do his work, and reap the same rich harvest which New Zealand is now producing. THE PENMANSHIP OF COLLEGE STUDENTS.

DR. GEO. G. GROFF.

A person with the reputation of Horace Greely or of a Philadelphia lawyer, may write in a scrawling manner, but a college student should never do so. To learn to write a legible, good hand, does not require much time and is not a difficult undertaking. In a recent conversation with Professor Fassett, of Keystone Academy, teacher of Penmanship in that institution, he remarked, that in his experience, any one willing to try could learn to write well in a single short term of thirteen weeks. Professor Fassett has had much experience and knows that what he says is true. Now, the question is, will it pay a college student to take lessons in this subject that he may write a good hand? Most surely it will. To be able to write a good hand is a fortune in itself. To illustrate: a graduate of Bucknell, of not many years' standing, not long since went to a large western city to seek a location. The city was overcrowded with young men from the east, who could secure no employment at any wages. In less than three hours our Bucknell alumnus was in the employ of the largest law firm in the city, at a salary of $75.00 per month, which was rapidly increased, and all because of the manner in which he could handle a pen. Again, in the experience of the writer, a number of our students have applied for positions and scholarships. The good penman have succeeded where those who could not write have failed.

In our college, entirely too little attention has been paid to good penmanship. Many of the examination papers are so poorly written that no Professor would be willing for a stranger to see them. Indeed, sometimes a Professor is compelled to refuse to read the papers, the writing is so poor.

Every educated man or woman should expect to contribute at times to the press, but a beginner who writes a poor hand has little hope that his articles will ever be looked at. The writer has known of college professors and other people who had good ideas which they could never get into print because editors never could find these ideas hidden in their miserable penmanship.

Among young people making applications for positions to teach, poor penmanship stands as a bar to their desires. Several times the writer has been unable to heartily aid his young friends, because their own handwriting would belie his strongest statements that they were liberally educated. Not only is penmanship poor, but many students seem unable to write a good letter or to properly arrange an examination paper. The student who lacks in these respects is handicapped for his life's work. To repeat: good penmanship is of great value to the student; it is easily and quickly acquired; it should be acquired by every young person.

Lewisburg, Pa., March 17, 1894.

As we write the calendar, Rev. G. M. Spratt, D. D., has given forty-four years of active service to the educational interests of Pennsylvania. So thoroughly efficient, so wisely executive, so largely instrumental, so beautifully harmonious has been the record of these years, that to mention the name of the Pennsylvania Baptist Educational Society is to mention Dr. Spratt. Will you let me say it the other way? To say Dr. Spratt, would mean the educational interests of the Keystone State. Dr. Spratt has climbed the hill into the eighties, still strong and vigorous, still with his hand on the lever. He has felt impelled to ask a release from this over two-score years of service, that he may help give direction to another administration. For years the Educational Society of this state has been looked upon as a model for organization and conduct of similar societies in other states. Without exception, Dr. Spratt has found hearty welcome in the pulpit of the rural district, on the platform of power in the large city. Men of wisdom and property have given him an ear whenever he chose to speak. It would be an exceedingly interesting task to gather up the threads of these forty-four years, and weave the pattern of his influence in molding men, shaping destiny, building for God and eternity; the money gathered and let go for the education of young men, beginning with academy, following them through college and theological training, watching them take the shepherd's crook and go forth to their task. It would also be a beautiful endeavor to picture the pulpits in which Dr. Spratt virtually stands, after all these years. Beloved by all, honored by all, no man throughout the borders of the state can lay down his weapons of warfare with a greater sense of triumph and heart-fellowship than the secretary of our educational society.—New York Examiner.

REV. G. M. SPRATT, D. D.

Local.

The University Sermon was preached before the students in Bucknell Hall March 18, by Prof. Lincoln Hulley. His theme was "The Intensity of the Personality of Christ." This intensity, said Prof. Hulley, was shown in

1st. The private life of Christ. The temple scene, when he was twelve years of age, the struggle with evil on the Mount of Temptation, the struggle in Gethsemane, his frequent solitudes, are glimpses into the heart of Jesus, showing how intensely he lived.

2nd. The ethical teachings of Christ. These are the most vital and vigorous things in literature. His soul puts energy into his thought. His intense grasp makes his expression positive, clear and strong. He enforced the most strenuous rules of life. He never compromised or relaxed his moral standard. The absolute perfection of God was the ideal he set. Every offending hand or eye; every look of lust; every thought of hate was to be absolutely and radically destroyed. Such a strenuous ethics came from the depths of his own consciousness, his nature being intensely strung to make his standard so.

3rd. The public work of Christ. The church is putting special emphasis now on Christ as a worker. Yet the magnitude of his three years' work is not appreciated. The energy required to do it must have been tremendous. He walked hundreds of miles, preached unnumbered sermons, wrought countless cures, educated his desciples, and carried a burden of great weight. His zeal was so great that the disciples thought he was mad and his enemies said he had a devil.

Prof. Hulley's earnestness and force always command and hold attention. In his preaching he shows himself a devoted Bible student, a psychologist and a clear reasoner—one to whom the characters and the events of which he speaks are intensely real and vivid. On Sunday his manner of delivery was exactly in keeping with his theme, earnest, energetic, intense. Out of his own strenuous personality he spoke of that transcendently strenuous life which had laid such hold upon him.

The meetings of the Student Volunteer Band have been, and doubtless always will be, open to all the students. It may be of interest to some to know, also, that a sort of "Associate" membership may be entered into on the part of those who have not a definite intention of taking up foreign mission work. These students will pursue the courses of study with the Volunteers, take part in the work at the meetings, and be as much a part of the Band as anyone, differing only in not having signed the Volunteer declaration card. Several who are deeply interested in missionary enterprises will be joining the Band this spring term as such "Associates." All others who desire detailed knowledge about the more distant parts of the world-field, are cordially invited to be present at the first meeting. Watch the bulletin board. Some may not feel like becoming members of the Band; to them the Volunteers say: "Come anytime to the meetings; you will be welcome." Ware and Harvey are Leader and Secretary for the coming year.

Reno's ideal of Feminine Perfection: When recently interviewed by our special correspondent, who was desirous of discovering what his ideas of feminine loveliness were, Mr. Reno kindly gave him the following idea: Before I would marry a girl she must possess the following characteristics: She must be beautiful, intelligent, sympathetic, lovable and a brilliant conversationalist. She must be graceful, charming, refined, ladylike, queenly in mien and possessing the virtues of a Madonna united with the beauty of Venus, the grace of a Diana and the wisdom of a Minerva; also she must possess Chironic ability in nursing the measles, and by Jove, boys, I'd have her if it wasn't for Deacon Haddock.

The students who expect to attend Northfield this coming summer will be interested to know that Prof. S. S. Neff, President of the Neff School of Oratory in Philadelphia, will open a summer school of Oratory at Northfield, for six weeks, commencing June 20. Dr. Neff needs neither introduction nor recommendation from us. We feel sure that all who attend this session will find his instruction not only interesting but exceedingly profitable. Those desiring rates should address Miss S. Stapleton, East Northfield, Mass.

A Sophomore Shakespeare Club composed of S. R. Wood, Charles Firth, E. R. Powell, F. D. Finn, J. W. Davis and A. A. Cober was organized at the beginning of the fall term. Mr. S. R. Wood was chosen president. The club has held weekly meetings ever since its organization, which have been productive of much benefit to the members. The Merchant of Venice and Tempest have been very carefully studied in an earnest, critical spirit.

Recently a Freshman called on a Sem. girl, and through some slight jostling of his coat, some poker chips fell out on the floor. "Oh! You have been playing poker; I'm surprised," exclaimed the girl. The Freshman, though at first embarrassed, regained himself, and pretending to be much amused at her mistake, replied: "Why, Flora (?) dear, those are tiddle-wink chips." Flora—"O pardon me. I've wronged you."

The Freshman contest in declamation took place in Bucknell Hall, Saturday, March 17. Those who took part were: Misses Ruth H. Sprague, Rosa L. Hartley, Maud E. Hanna, A. Kate Goddard and Nellie E. Taylor, and Messrs. Vincent B. Fisk, J. Y. Sinton, T. H. Sprague and A. S. Barner. The program was interspersed with music by Misses Aikin, Morgan and Davis.

At the last meeting of the Chemical and Physical society, Mr. L. L. Riggin gave an interesting talk on the Smugglers and Customs' Guards of France. It was decided at the same meeting to have special exercises on the 18th of May, in honor of Lavoisier, the celebrated French chemist, who died just one hundred years before that date.

Quite a number of the students spent Easter at Bucknell. Simpson searched the fields for spring beauties, Macnab drove nails, Burge rested his vocal organs, Nelson Davis studied anatomy, Wood wrote poetry, Haddock visited friends in town, Schub read and reflected, Brown talked and Calvin studied "Elsie books."

"Is that gay butterfly in uniform a messenger boy?" said one young lady to another. "Why no," replied the latter, "that is Mr. Fred Finn, arrayed in his World's Fair uniform and taking an evening ride out the pike on his new bicycle."

The residents of first hall, east wing, were awakened one morning by what appeared to be the roll and roar and rumble of thunder. Later investigation disclosed the fact that it was only the echo and re-echo of a morning lullaby by Guie.

College students wanting employment for the summer should address P. W. Ziegler & Co., Box 1801 Philadelphia, Pa., who offer great inducements for special work to which students are well fitted, and which pays $75 to $150 per month.

W. R. Harper and W. F. Eicholtz attended the recent district convention of the Phi Kappa Psi fraternity at New York city, as representatives of the Bucknell chapter. Mr. W. C. Gretzinger also attended the same convention.

Mr. J——, a Sophomore, while in the editor's room the other day for the purpose of borrowing a match, saw some stalactites lying on the window sill, and asked very innocently where the bones were obtained.

The Baker benefit concert on Tuesday evening, March 20, was a delightful affair. All of his many friends in the University unite in hoping that he will secure a speedy removal of his sad affliction.

Whether by accident or by intention the selection of green and orange for the colors of the posters for '97's contest in declamation on St. Patrick's day, was very appropriate.

Judging from the disappearance of a number of water pitchers, there must be some members of the long-fingered gentry at work in the west wing. Douglass is their latest victim.

Mr. Powell's interest in the success of the Northumberland Baptist church choir, occasionally induces him to take a Wednesday evening stroll in the direction of that city.

Paullin said, "It is better to flunk in the house of Physics than to set up all night," "with a pretty woman in a white house," said Finn.

Mr. F. W. Dillon is deserving of high praise for the close attention he has given to the care of the gymnasium during the last term.

Mr. A. T. Williams is manager of the Bucknell Glee and Mandolin club. Mr. R. B. Davidson is leader of the same organization.

The mystery of Fassett's inspiration was solved when one of his friends caught him gazing intently at a photograph.

The question for the final Junior debate will be on the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people.

Prof. Bartol and W. C. Gretzinger have secured a patent for a school room settee arm for use in schools and colleges.

W. R. Harper led the arm and parallel bar exercises at Wilkes-Barre Y. M. C. A. exhibition on March 15.

After the Schuman concert, Mr. Kunkle spoke admiringly of those beautiful "beatitudes" of Miss Shoemaker.

Shorty Vastine, having done nothing worthy of notice for some time, we omit mention of him in this issue.

The builders of Prof. Owens' cottage have been making rapid progress during the last month.

Some of the Sophomores have already commenced to collect and arrange herbariums.

During the spring vacation Ralph R. Snow visited Professor Heim at Williamsport.

The Senior class will don the regulation cap and gown at commencement.

A certain Seminary girl's definition of a hydraulic-ram is a cider-press.

Lathrop preached at Milton, for Prof. Hulley, on the 17th of March.

Mr. Raymond J. Davis preached at Lansford on the 11th ult.

Guie, '97, is the latest addition to the Sigma Chi fraternity.

The Neyhart Club have moved their place of mastication.

Hanna recently preached in the Baptist church at Freeland.

The Sophomore list of electives is larger than ever before.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Very lavish were the praises in regard to the late gymnastic exhibition in Tustin gymnasium.

Miss Katherine Baker, '91, of Woman's College, Baltimore, spent her Easter vacation at her home in Lewisburg. Miss Baker was accompanied by a college friend from Mississippi.

The theme for the recent prize contest of the Senior class was "The Chaplain," from the "Sir Roger de Coverly Papers." The theme for the fourth year class was "Father Felician," from "Evangeline."

The concert in Music hall by the World's Fair Schumann Quartette was well attended and greatly enjoyed. The quartette was procured for the occasion by Mr. Gretzinger for the benefit of the Athletic Association.

Improvements are constantly being made in the Institute. New fire hose, also gas jets in the library are the latest innovations. The reception room has undergone a complete renovation; the walls are prettily papered, while a new rug and curtains add much to the attractiveness.

An entertainment will be given at the beginning of the term by the gymnastic and physical culture classes. The principal features of the entertainment will be wand, hoop and dumb-bell drills, statuary attitudes, and tableaux. The proceeds will be given the Y. W. C. A.

The program of the Lewisburg Alumnæ Club for March, read thus: Music—Instrumental, Miss Margaret Baker; Sketch—Constance Fenimore Woolson, Mrs. Nellie Hamblin; Review of Mrs. Woolson's Work, Mrs. W. G. Owens; Reading—A story of Mrs. Woolson's, Miss Hattie Walter; Vocal Solo, Miss Mary Morgan; Sketch of Miss Shafer, Mrs. Katherine B. Larison; Current Events—Political, Miss Katherman, Literary, Miss Annie Van Gundy, Social, Mrs. Gerhart.

Dr. Aviragnet inserts the following: "Does not the following extract from the Lettres Persanes of Montesquieu, who died in 1755, make us believe that the great French writer and philosopher of the 18th century had foreseen and predicted the anarchists of our days? The extract is from the letter of Rhedi to Usbeck: 'I tremble always that some secret may be discovered which would give an abridged way of making men perish, of destroying whole peoples and nations. It is not long since I am in Europe, but I have heard sensible people speak of the ravages of chemistry. It seems to me that it is a fourth plague which ruins men and destroys them one by one, but continually, while war, pestilence and famine destroy them in great numbers but by intervals.'"—Translated from a French paper.

ACADEMIC NEWS.

[S. J. CLEELAND, Correspondent.]

Gas is about to be introduced in Main Hall.

There is a time for all things; Tuesday eve for prayer meeting.

Mr. Warren expects to visit the "land of the green" next summer.

Mr. Wilkes spent part of his vacation with friends in Philadelphia.

The new gas fixtures in East Hall are quite an improvement over the old.

A number of the students of the Academy remained at school during Easter vacation.

Mr. Edwin Flint has had a severe attack of sickness. We are glad to see him rapidly improving.

Brown Martin and Ralph Koser can manipulate the mandolin in great style, sweetening the air with harmony.

Many eyes are turned upon the Academy ball players as they practice, and great things are expected of them this season. The Academy promises to put on the field a first-class team.

The gentlemen who thump the piano, while waiting for dinner, will please refrain from it. Pianos cost money; if you break it you will be the loser of cents, but the gainer of sense.

Mr. Edward Baker extends his most hearty thanks to those of the town and college who were purchasers of tickets for his benefit. He also extends his thanks to those who participated in the exercises of the eve.

'69. Judge Martin Bell, of Blair county, recently handed down a decision to the Grand Jury that the cigar store slot machines were gambling devices, and, if information was made against any person operating them, they would be treated as such.

'73. J. W. Hague, the fish warden, recently had quite an experience with men who were seining in the Allegheny river at Pittsburg. He went to arrest them and was attacked by all three, but succeeded in capturing one of them after two deputies had come to his rescue. He also took the boat, seine and a boatload of fish.

'77. Rev. E. D. Shull, late pastor of the Lansdale Baptist church, has accepted a call to the Vincentown, N. J., Baptist church, and will remove to his new field at once.

'85. Prof. C. W. Hermann, of Middleburg, has received the nomination for the legislature in Snyder county. This is almost equivalent to an election.

'86. L. S. Walter, Esq., of Mt. Carmel, has announced his intention to be a candidate for District Attorney of Northumberland county next year.

'91. C. G. Langford was recently ordained pastor of a church at North Wales, a short distance from Philadelphia, Pa.

"The Reign of Justice" is the title of a production which appears in the Earlhamite of the last issue. This masterly production declares much truth. In this the easy flowing expressions are noticeable. These two productions evidently portray the atmosphere of thought among the thinking class of Earlham.

And a newspaper at his feet.

With back to the front the Junior sat;
His seat was the middle aisle,
And cautiously now he'd wave his hat
As he caught the maiden's smile.

With his eyes on the Senior's chair;
But in that aisle no disturbance broke
For there was no Senior there.

THE coming concert on May 3 is awaited with considerable interest. The artists are Albert S. Guille, who sang with Adelina Patti in the famous concerts of Damrosch and Seidl; Mrs. Anna Guille, the dramatic soprano of the French Grand Opera, and Cav. C. Gnarro, a celebrated pianist of the American Opera Company. These were secured by Dr. Aviragnet, who is ever anxious to give the members of the University and the people of Lewisburg the benefit of the best musical talent.

IT IS not a day too early to begin training for field day sports. Heretofore these contests have taken place with little or no preparation, and consequently very indifferent records have been made. This year provision for instruction in outdoor exercises has been made by the University, and it behooves all who intend to enter any of the events to put themselves under the director's charge. Some have already done this, but not as many as Mr. Smith would like to see. Far better success is anticipated for this year than we had last, but to make the day the best possible it is necessary for the contestants to practice early and late.

A DELIGHTFUL bicycle tour of the British Isles for a party of twenty students is being planned by Mr. F. W. Pickard, Bowdoin, and Mr. A. R. McMaster, McGill University, Montreal. Mr. Pickard informs us that it will be a distinctively college affair, and that the party will be conducted by F. A. Elwell, of Portland, Me., who has considerable experience with bicycle tours. The places visited will be the most interesting in Ireland, Scotland and England, including the Giant's Causeway, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Kennilworth Castle, Oxford and London. The entire trip will take about seven weeks. Students who are contemplating an outing could hardly have a better time than companionship with such a party would attord.

THE most diverse ideas exist among college editors in regard to the proper conduct of the exchange column. In a few journals this department seems to be a sort of sacred repository for worthless relics, to which each new ex-man takes special delight in calling the attention of his patient friends. In others the entire column is made a critique on the productions of contemporaries. This is much better than another method of merely clipping funny paragraphs and poetic squibs, and far superior to making the column an exchange of mutual admiration or spite.

To conduct such a column satisfactorily is not an easy task. The way out of the difficulty, however, is not to ignore it, as some have done, but to devise methods to make it readable and interesting. This, we think, is entirely possible and might be accomplished by uniting both elements of criticism and repetition. There are many articles in our college magazines worthy of review and many good things briefly said that are well worth repeating entire, besides numerous items of interest to the college world; so that if judgment is exercised the exchange department can be made one of the most interesting of the entire paper.

That same day it snowed. By some fateful mischance the little effusion on spring, composed on a hot day last winter and appearing in the last issue, wandered forth from its receptacle just a trifle too early. And chilling was the reception it received from old Boreas. If it could have withdrawn from his icy blast it might have lived, but, forced to remain, it froze to death. We listened, but the birds failed to twitter; instead of cheerful sunshine we saw "the whited air;" while the little flower with all its sweetness peacefully slumbered beneath a snowy blanket.

With all nature thus topsy-turvy it could hardly be expected that a merely human instrument—our college periodical—would escape the general confusion. Nor did it escape. For in the same issue two verbs—editorial verbs, too—had actually changed places, and the local column appeared standing on its head. Perhaps microscopic analysis would reveal even other discrepancies. Truly, we must brace up! For at this rate it will not be long until the MIRROR, our student publication, attains to the high standard of literary excellence and accuracy exhibited in the late University catalogue, our official publication.

After all, such mistakes—lamentable as they are—sometimes serve a good purpose. The criticism they evoke brings the student to a realization that his work on the paper falls under scrutinizing eyes, and that at no time can he afford to execute such work with less than the utmost care. Again, as only error is commented on, he may interpret the intervening silence as a species of commendation. Such appreciation from those for whom he labors, while admittedly poor, is better than none. So he may regard with favor the lengthening intervals of critical silence between his literary lapses.

Literary.

VIOLA—THE TWELFTH NIGHT.

To judge correctly of a literary production, Pope says one must

> "Know well each ancient's proper character;
> His faith, subject, scope in every page;
> Religion, country, genius of his age;"

but I find it a difficult task to delineate characters in this way.

One can hardly refrain from comparing the characters of which he reads with persons in real life; this is done unconsciously, yet it may lead one to false impressions.

Viola, the true heroine of the play, is introduced to us in very adverse circumstances. She and her brother, twins of the most remarkable resemblance to one another, are shipwrecked in a storm; Viola is rescued by the captain and taken to the nearest shore, but her brother is supposed to have perished. She is very sad because of this, but is thankful for her own escape, and looks disaster full in the face and takes practical steps for her future life.

But what can a lady do? Alone and without protection in a strange country, she was at a loss to know how to dispose of herself, for she wished to remain in the country until she could gain some definite knowledge of her brother.

Viola remembers to have heard her father speak with praise and admiration of Orsino, the Duke of the country; but as he is not married, his court would not be a proper place for her. Something must be done to overcome this; so she disguises herself as a page, thinking this would be the best protection against uncivil comments.

The Duke was greatly pleased with the deportment and manners of this supposed young man, and the position of page is easily obtained. She fulfilled her duties and showed such a ready obedience to her lord that she soon became his most favored attendant.

That is a very touching scene, between Viola and the Duke, where the music makes her speak in so masterly a way of love. The reply to the Duke's fancied greatness of love, gives him such hints of her own far greater affection for him, that he could not have mistaken the meaning had he known her real sex.

Viola is the favorite of the enamored Duke. She becomes his messenger to Olivia, and the interpreter of his suffering to that inaccessible beauty. In her character of a page, she attracts the favor of Olivia and excites the jealousy of her lord. This places her in a very critical and delicate position. But how exquisitely is the character of Viola fitted for her part, carrying her through the trying circumstances with all the grace of modesty.

I think this scene brings out one of the noblest characteristics of this noble woman – moral integrity. Although she loves the Duke dearly, she is never once tempted to shun her duty, although it makes so much against herself.

Her deep, silent, patient love for the Duke is plainly shown when she says—the Duke having threatened her with death and ordered her to follow him—

> "After him I love
> More than I love these eyes, more than my life!"

What a fine distinction between Rosalind and Viola! The wild sweetness, so characteristic in Rosalind, would ill become Viola, whose playfulness is assumed as part of her disguise as a court page, and is guarded by strict delicacy. In her dialogues with the comic characters, one must surely notice a drawing back of feminine delicacy, causing us to feel most deeply what she is; but those around her little suspect the real cause of those expressions.

To us who know her real sex, the scene where she will not allow herself to affect courage becoming her disguise, is very amusing. Her horror at drawing a sword, is very natural and charms us because it places her in such a delicate position.

She is extricated from her trouble by the timely interference of a gentleman, unknown to her, who thinks he is assisting her brother. Some words are spoken by him which leads Viola to think that her brother was rescued, and her theory is soon proven to be correct.

The characteristic most strikingly brought out seems to be—modesty. Viola "lives" in love, and it is for her to teach Orsino and Olivia how to love; but her love has none of the "skittishness" or unrest which is so prevalent in the Duke's passion for Olivia; it is strong without being so passionate as to be obtrusive. It is as deep as life; pure and peaceful, and never mars the innate modesty of her character.

I do not know but that the great charm of her character is—morality. We never once find her shirking her trust. There is a clear, calm, composure of truth in all she does, so perfect and pure that one cannot but admire this noble character.

HOW DR. McWIGGIN FIXED THE CLOCK.

One day when Dr. McWiggin was waiting for somebody to get sick and send for him, and was reflecting rather sadly upon the remarkable and unreasonable healthfulness of his neighbors, the striking of the clock aroused him from his meditations. (Pulling out his watch) "Hello! Slow again, eh?" said he, and then he stood looking at the clock as it folded its thin hands together, and without the least suspicion of a blush on its pale face, told that lie about the time of day. "Now," thought the Doctor, "if that clock was only a sick man I could cure it right away—or, that is, in a reasonable length of time—not too soon, of course, not too soon." To be sure he could. If a man was suffering from "that tired feeling," as the clock seemed to be, the Doctor would give him aconite, or belladona, or calomel, or arsenic, or strychnine, or sulphuric acid, or some such gentle stimulant, and he would come around all right in a few days, or perish in the attempt. It was not strange, therefore, that, as he regarded the disordered timepiece, the thought occurred:—"Why not fix it myself? It needs only to be taken apart and given a good cleaning, and I might as well do it myself and save the two dollars that I would have to give to that wooden-headed clock-tinker down at Thompson's." Sure enough, why not? He understood all about the stomach, and spleen, and liver, and oesophagus, and diaphragm, and pancreas, and duodenum, and medulla oblongata, and the other Greek and Latin parts of man, and why should he not be able to comprehend the organism of an ordinary eight-day clock?

Thus he reasoned, and not being able to see why he should not undertake the job, he took the clock from its shelf, laid it on the table, on its back, and, with a screw-driver for a scalpel, began operations by dissecting off the hands and face. This operation exposed the digestive economy of the clock to the light of day and the bewildered gaze of J. Sylvester McWiggin, M. D. It did not look exactly as he had anticipated. It seemed to him that there were two or three times as many parts as were really needed, but the Doctor was not easily discouraged, so he proceeded with his dissection. While trying to get the works out of the case, he struck a nerve, or something, and away went the striking apparatus. "Ding, ding, ding, ding, ding, ding, ding——," as though it would go on forever, to the utter astonishment of the Doctor, who thought that twelve was the best that a clock could do. "Ding, ding, ding, ding, ding——," it went until he was almost frantic, and desperately jammed a tooth-pick among the wheels. Then he went to work again, but as he removed the bob from the pendulum and took off the escapement, away went the chronometer section of the clock on a wild race against time. "T-r-r-r-r-r-r-r-r——" why! In five minutes that clock made up more time than any two clocks could lose in six weeks, and all the time the Doctor was trying to stop what seemed to him like a fatal case of palpitation of the heart. But at last it stopped itself from sheer exhaustion. Then he proceeded to take the works out of the case, and having accomplished this without having thrown them into any more convulsions, he was not a little elated, and set about discovering a way of getting the various parts from their several bearings. After some little study, he concluded that the only way was to take out all the screws and keys and pins that he could reach. This he did successfully, and was just removing the first wheel to lay it on a large white paper for future cleaning, when—"B-z-t-t—Blim!" The mainspring uncoiled with a vicious snap, and flirted the entire digestive economy of that clock to the four corners of the room. Doctor McWiggin stared about him for several minutes, and then got down on his hands and knees and went prowling around the room to gather up what he could find of wheels and things, and then he put them away on a platter in the closet. But every few days, for a week or so, he stepped on something that seemed to flatten out beneath his weight, only to discover that it was some wheel or pinion or wire concern that he had overlooked. And there in the closet, to the present day, those remains repose in dust and "innocuous desuetude;" for although the Doctor had snatched scores of men from the very jaws of death, and that, too, after they had been not a little masticated by those same jaws, and although he had patched up men after powder mill explosions and railroad wrecks, and football matches, and although he had even put the man together again who undertook to be the Santa Claus at the Christmas entertainment of the "Newsboy's Retreat," he was forced to admit that the case of the clock was beyond his diagnosis.

A FEW HINDRANCES TO MISSION WORK IN WASHINGTON.

The good people of the old states early saw the need of sending aid in religious work to the newer portions of the west. Sometimes this aid took the form of money sent to a struggling community; at other times, of preacher and money. As the settlement of the United States steadily continued westward, and as the newer portions of the country became populous, the people were able to support their own ministers. Hence the field for mission work during recent years has been confined largely to the states and territories in and west of the Rocky Mountains. So broad and so general has been this work that it would be impossible to refer but briefly to any particular phase of it. Let us then direct our attention to the hindrances to the mission work being done in western Washington.

The growth in population of this state during the last decade has been phenomenal. Settlers have been drawn thither from all other portions of the Union. Not only the intelligent, hard-working homeseeker has gone west, but the scapegoat, the thief, and the gambler have been attracted to this state by the hope of hiding their past crimes, or of finding new pastures. It is safe to say that none of these vicious classes are Christians except in name only. Infidelity appeals strongly to the unscrupulous, and, accordingly, we find infidelity more wide-spread on the Pacific coast than on the Atlantic. Even institutions of learning in the two sections show a marked difference in their number of Christians. Among the ten thousand academic and college students of Ohio only about one-fourth are non-Christians, while the colleges of the Pacific slope number four-sevenths of their students in the same category. Though every non-Christian is not an infidel, the fact remains that the number of the latter is more numerous in the west than in the east.

Imagine a new settlement in western Washington. Forests are to be levelled, homes to be erected, and the soil to be cultivated. Most of the settlers are poor; all their energy and means go toward the obtaining of a home. Hence such a community must be dependent upon outside aid in church work. On this account the mission boards of various denominations assist struggling churches in the support of their pastor. Now, when one of these churches has secured its minister, let us observe what will specially hinder him in his work.

First, the topography and climatic conditions of the country. A minister located in a small town cannot sit down, fold his hands and expect the people to come to him. He must go to them. There is where the trouble arises. There is a settler on nearly every one hundred and sixty acres of tillable land in Washington. The people are scattered, the roads are poor, in many places there are none, a trail doing service for a road, and the country rough and cut up by streams that must be forded. So much for topography. Western Washington has more rain than any other portion of the United States except Alaska and Florida. The greater portion of this rain falls during three months. During six months the roads are well nigh impassable, and neither preacher nor people can very easily get to each other.

Secondly, the people themselves tend to make the work of the minister difficult. It has been stated that infidels are numerous. They take advantage of every opportunity to belittle the Gospel work and also to interfere with it. During the winter of '90 and '91, a revivalist was brought to Chehalis, Washington. As soon as the infidels of the place heard of it they sent for a lecturer on infidelity. What was the result? The revivalist was forced to leave the place. There are many weak-kneed Christians. If such people reside in a live Christian community, they may be safe, but when they live in a section of country where they are hooted and jeered by scoffers, they quite frequently withdraw allegiance from the church. Again, it may be said, that some men do right as much from fear of incurring the displeasure of the community in which they live, as they do right for right's sake. When such people get beyond the restraining influences of home and neighbors, they very frequently lapse into infidelity. The weakness of one finds support and encouragement for weakness in the weakness of another. Many people who live thirty or forty miles from church or minister forget their Bible and God in their mad chase for money.

But worst of all, one preacher counteracts the influence of his brother across the way. It is a lamentable fact, yet nevertheless true, that many preachers have gone west to grow up with the country, who had wearied and worn to death their congregations in the east. What influence for good can a preacher have if his actions continually belie his words? Such men give infidels a splendid opportunity to attack the church and its work. What the west needs are young, enthusiastic, warm-hearted, earnest missionaries. Let the old fogies stay at home and the young men go west.

Some people imagine that the citizens of these new portions of the United States are fully able to take care of themselves. The attempt has been made to show a few of the difficulties of people and pastor. As long as these exist, so long will mission work be hindered. We are not expected to build roads for Washington, but we can help to furnish houses of worship and better preachers.

Athletic.

Bromley Smith, who carried away several prizes last year, has been appointed instructor of the field sports.

Prof. Bartol is playing a fine game, and will, undoubtedly, represent the alumni in the coming tournament with Prof. Hulley.

The manager has arranged dates for several games. The first game of the season will take place on the College campus with Milton.

One of the associations of the University is considering the advisability of offering a silver cup as a prize to the class which secures the most points on field day. This will doubtlessly increase the interest in field sports.

Great interest is taken in tennis. The courts are filled every day. Prof. Hulley and Harvey Smith are in better form than heretofore. Prof. Hulley came out second in a tournament at Philadelphia in which a great number of professionals took part.

The representative players of the Senior class are H. F. Smith, Wood and Bush; of the Junior class, Allen, Jackson and Kauffman; of the Sophomore class, Harris, Harper and A. T. Williams, and of the Freshman class, Kunkle, Rodgers and Moyer.

With respect to athletics in general, there is a grand field open. All the "sprinters," with one exception, who carried away the prizes on field day last year will not contest this year. There are no recorded champions left ; no one to claim the prize of the hundred yard dash, the throwing of the shot or hammer, or the mile run. Yet we believe there is the material here which, by thorough training, can break any record that has been made at Bucknell.

On account of the last fall of snow, which prevented all outdoor sports, baseball has suffered. Previous to this the outlook for a winning team was favorable. There is an abundance of material this year, two or three aspirants for each position on the team, which is very encouraging, but the spirit and enthusiasm which should characterize every player is greatly needed. Thus far, however, several of the boys have been playing good ball. Geary and Stanton, both new men, have displayed much proficiency and may yet be the battery for the season.

Local.

Keep your eye on Brown, the sporting editor.

Colestock preached at Winfield on Easter Sunday.

Prof. Phillips preached at Edwardsdale Baptist church on the 15th.

The new course in civil engineering is proving a very attractive one.

There's not an exam. at the end of a term given,
But brows have ached o'er it, and souls toiled and striven.

The Bucknell band recently had the courage to face the camera in Cornelius' studio.

"Jennie can have me," said B. Smith to some of his friends after the second Schumann concert.

Powell escorted a large party of Northumberland friends to the concert on Tuesday evening, April 10.

Rev. I. N. Hill, brother of President Hill, and formerly a teacher in the Academy, died recently in Danbury, Conn.

The Junior contestants are chosen for the oratorical exhibition on May 11. Warm weather is predicted for that evening.

'Twixt a Sophie and Freshie a strange contest arose,
A "pony" set them unhappily wrong,
The point in dispute was, as the whole college knows,
To which the said "pony" ought to belong.

Elkanah Hulley, '92, professor of Greek at the Keystone Academy, spent April 14th with his brother, Prof. Lincoln Hulley.

W L. Zeller is secretary of the South Jersey Association of Naturalists, with headquarters at Vineland and Wildwood, N. J.

Where, oh where is Charles B. Reno?
Where, oh where is Charles B. Reno?
Where, oh where is Charles B. Reno?
Ask at the Anderson Club.

The probabilities are that there will be established ere long an advanced chair in logic and ethics which Fisk will try to fill.

Mr. Miller, one of East Wing's promising bloods, desires the fact mentioned that he was a witness of the recent boxing contest in town.

Here's to the springtime, its sunshine and play !
Its baseball and tennis, its flowers in May !
The campus all covered with velvety green !
The river bright sparkling in its silvery sheen !

Rev. C. F. Hall, ex '95, on April 1st, had the honor of baptizing Sarah Ulrich Kelley, the so-called bard of Shanty Hill and poet-laureate of the nation.

Rev. C. E. Tilley, of Bridgeton, N. J., preached the sermon before the Y. M. C. and Y. W. C. Associations on Sunday, April 15. While in Lewisburg he was the guest of the South Jersey Institute Alumni club.

We sadly miss Reno, but we cannot say that we are sorry for the departure of that bass horn or that homesick fiddle. The recent change of headquarters would seem to indicate that Reno had found his "ideal of feminine perfection."

Mr. F. D. Finn, in order to maintain the character which his uniform would indicate, recently purchased a very valuable pop-gun. Accompanied by his chum, A. A. Cober and F. M. Simpson as instructors, he frequently sallies forth in quest of light game.

The election of this term's officers for Euepia Literary Society resulted in the following : President, Bromley Smith ; vice president, D. S.

Grim; critic, A. O. Miller; secretary, H. F. Harris; treasurer, F. W. Jackson. The retiring president, H. M. Pease, was in due form elected "librarian."

Prof. Ford's recital on the 9th was thoroughly appreciated by his select audience. We hope he will again visit the town. The famous selection from Mark Twain has since been paraphrased thus:

> Flunk, brothers, flunk, flunk with care,
> Flunk in the presence of the Pro-fes-sare.

The English Bible class has received several new members this term. Prof. Hulley's instruction is very critical and opens the way for useful discussions on the New Testament as literature. A careful study of the Book of Acts has been the feature of this month's work.

Friday evening, April 6, Theta Alpha Literary society elected the following officers for the spring term: President, A. Douglass; vice-president, Frank Hollinshead; secretary, J. Y. Sinton; critic, S. R. Wood; treasurer, Brown; censor, M. R. Collins; curator, F. W. Dillon.

The first sounds to greet students returning from their spring vacation came from Joseph's room. "O, wretched man that I am! Who hath warned the smallpox to flee from me? This is a time of tribulation and woe. O, generation of vipers give me liberty or give me death, etc."

Under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. of the College, Miss Wilson, Missionary to Japan, addressed a meeting in the Baptist church on the 12th, on the customs of the Japanese and women's missionary work in Japan. Miss Wilson was formerly a student at this University and was welcomed here by all.

On Sunday, April 8th, a pleasant missionary meet was held in Bucknell hall. The subject of India was discussed in two papers, one by Mr. Colestock on geography, and one by Miss Taylor on religions. Reports of the Detroit convention were heard. Miss Kunkle spoke on Miss Guinness, Mr. Ware on the "Educational Side of Missions," and Mr. Allen on "Missionary Personal Work in India. Excellent music was provided by Messrs. Fisk, Harper and Flint.

The Chemical and Physical Society held its first meeting for this term on Thursday, April 12. Prof. Owens gave a very interesting talk on points of interest in chemistry and physics in the Anthropological building at the World's Fair. The next meeting will occur on May 3, at which time will be carried out the following program of exercises in honor of Antoine Laurent Lavoisier: "State of the Science of Chemistry before Lavoisier," W. B. Sheddan; "Sketch of the Life of Lavosier," Miss Jessie J. Wheeler; "Work of Lavoisier in Chemistry," F. M. Simpson; "Subsequent Influence of Lavoisier's Work on the Science of Chemistry," Prof. W. G. Owens. A cordial invitation is extended to all the students to be present.

Mr. C—— has already drawn the ticket which destines his seat in the Botany class for the whole term. He hastens away to the biology rooms to learn his fortune, and finds that "Flora" has favored him with the best seat in her garden. Great is his joy and broad are his smiles until the other seats are one by one appropriated. One especially on the other side of the room had suddenly risen greatly above par, but Mr. C—— was too late to lay claim to it. His face grows pale, his heart is sad, until he is fortunate enough to exchange his seat with the envied occupant. Cupid is always more successful than Flora in such adjustments, and can greatly enhance the pleasure of the plant analysis although he knows so little about the beauties of nature.

Dr. Aviragnet has organized a male chorus to aid talented students in pursuing a musical education after leaving College. The organization is to be permanent, one student being selected each year from the graduating class as the object of the benefit. A novel treat is in store for Lewisburg on May 3. The leading tenor singer of the United States, M. Guille, is engaged and will sing the air "Aida" by Verdi. His wife, formerly first soprano in the Grand Opera in Paris, will sing the "Prophet" by Meyerbeer; and together they will represent the fourth act of "Hugenot." The union will render the grand male chorus in Rigoletto. A fuller program will be prepared later. The renowned accompanist, M. Guarro, is also engaged for the same program.

The following item in the catalogue is worthy the attention of students: "Advanced courses in Literature, Philosophy and Science have been established, leading respectively to the degrees of Master of Arts, Master of Philosophy and Master of Science. These courses are open to graduates of Bucknell University only.'' Any graduate who takes nine courses will receive the Master's Degree. Three courses must be taken in one department. The other six may be selected from any department. The studies may all be taken in non-residence. Honor studies which have not been substituted for studies in which the student has made less than nine are counted, each as half a course, toward the Master's Degree. Industrious students can, therefore, make up more than half of the required nine studies during their undergraduate course. A man who has taken the Master's Degree can get his Ph. D. at Chicago in two additional years, one of which must be in residence at Chicago.

The material for the opening chapters of a delightful little romance, in which several Bucknellites figure, lately came to light. It appears that one of Altoona's belles, in her anxiety to penetrate the veil of the future, consulted Dame Chance in the form of an old Gypsy fortune teller. She was informed that she would shortly make an unexpected visit and there, among a number of young men, meet her fate, that two of the gentlemen would be smitten, that she would like one better than the other, that none of the parties would be aware of the others' affection until sometime afterwards, and that the meeting would have results vital to the happiness of one of the young men. To make a long story short, the young lady made an unexpected visit to Lewisburg, and met the members of the A—— club. She was fascinated, enraptured, bewitched, nay intoxicated with enchantment by the gazelle eyes of one and the liquid voice of another. The gentlemen silently endured the pangs of a passion too deep to be fathomed, too subtile to be analyzed, too entrancing to be expressed. A glance from the one or a word from the other was ambrosia and nectar to the distracted girl. The predictions of the professor of the occult art were fulfilled to the letter. The young lady left Lewisburg without making her preference known, or either of the lovers giving utterance to his feelings. The denouement is awaited with interest.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Misses Ruth Tustin, '83, and Annie Evans, '86, have entered the Woman's Missionary Training school in Philadelphia.

Miss Nannie J. Wilson, '87, gave a talk in the Baptist church, April 12, entitled, ''My work in Japan.'' Miss Wilson will return to Japan in September.

Mrs. Truman J. Purdy, treasurer of the Young Woman's Loan Association, was present at the last annual meeting. The Association is reported in a prosperous condition.

During the recent vacation the annex halls were greatly improved by delicate tinting and stenciling. Several etchings and steel engravings have been added to the reception room.

The first contest for the Lippincott prize occurred on April 6. The theme assigned was, ''Give in your words at least four of the character portraits, in different eras of English literature.''

''Music hath charms'' to soothe the average Institute girl, as well as the proverbial ''savage breast,'' as was evinced by the very general attendance at the second appearance of the Schumann Lady Quartette. Every one present was delighted, and one young lady was heard to remark that Miss Shoemaker was the bella-donna of the company.

Through the thoughtful efforts of the registrar, forty-eight bound volumes of Littel's Living Age, have been obtained for the library, from the late Backus estate. Mrs. Dora W. Spratt, '78, has also presented her late book entitled, ''Married Life.'' It is a choice little volume, daintily bound and contains selections from the bible and other classics. In addition to this Mrs. Spratt has subscribed for several magazines for her Alma Mater.

The following program was presented at the Physical Culture exhibition: Grand March, Dumb-Bell Drill; Attitudes of Emotion, Clubs; The Message, Blumenthal, Miss Sarah Merriman; Vivant Tableau, a, Farewell to Home, b, In Sight of Home, c, A Charm from the Skies; Pizzacati Chorus; Tableau, Parting of Orpheus and Eurydice; Hoop Drill; Statuary, Night and the Fates. ''Vivant Tableau'' elicited much applause.

An interesting Alumnæ meeting was held on April 10. Music was rendered by Misses Morgan and Aikin. A paper, ''Current Events,'' was read by Miss VanGundy, and Literary Notes by Miss Ruth Sprague. At the close a puzzle contest was held. A box of delicious bon bons was awarded Mrs. Larison as first prize. The following puzzle attracted much attention:

"It was in the early dawning,
Just between (a book by Bulwer)
That along the highway fair
Rode the brave (a book by Black)
And as he rode, he sang this song,
(A book by Charles Reade ;)
Like a brilliant star on high
He saw (a book by Besant and Rice,)
And in the peaceful morning hush,
A lark sang in (a book by Miss Mulock.")

A noun there is of plural number,
A foe to peace and tranquil slumber ;
Now any other noun you take
By adding s you plural make ;
But if you add s to this,
Strange is the metamorphosis.
Plural is plural now no more,
And sweet what bitter was before.

ACADEMIC NEWS.

[S. J. Cleeland, Correspondent.]

Perrine is quite an enthusiast at ticket selling.

A number of new students have been added to the Academy's list.

Quite a few of the boys have painful arms, resulting from vaccination.

Primus—"What's the racket up the hall?" Secundus—"K-g is declaming."

The Fourth Form's offices are President, Purdy; Vice President, Anderson ; Secretary, Martin ; Treasurer, Slifer.

Now-a-days when people meet they do not talk about the weather. The first question is, "Have you been vaccinated?"

It is strange that Giffin, being an Irishman, was not green enough to know the difference between Hibernians and Herbariums.

At a recent meeting of the Third Form, the following officers were elected : President, Cober ; Vice President, Bayard ; Secretary, Harvey ; Treasurer, Bell.

Prof.—"About ten years after you leave college you will begin to find out that you don't know as much as you thought you did." Student—"I find that out three times a day."

The Fourth Form challenged the Third Form to a game of baseball and a tennis tournament. The Third Formers, like heroes have accepted the challenge, and intend to make their upper classmen bite the dust.

Prof.—"Mr. P., if you saw a Greek noun, how would you determine the case?" Mr. P.—"By instinct, I suppose." Prof.—"Ah, yes, I have heard it stated that the lower animals do things by instinct."

The following are the officers of the Adelphia Society for this term: President, Lindemann; Vice President, Purdy ; Secretary, Meeker ; Chaplain, Wilkes ; Treasurer, Nesbit ; Sergeant-at-Arms, Lewis ; Censor, Bayard ; First Critic, Bell ; Second Critic, Anderson.

Richmond College awards a medal to the best literary article contributed to the college paper.

In New York city there are eight millionaire brewers whose wealth ranges from $2,500,000 to $15,000,000 each.

The Student court at Cornell recently convicted two men of cheating in examinations, and recommended their suspension. The faculty acted upon the suggestion and suspended the men until next January.—Brown and White.

We are glad to acknowledge the receipt of the Messenger of Richmond College as a new exchange. We trust it shall continue to be a regular visitor. In style of publication and character of its material, it ranks among the best of our exchanges.

"The Nobility of Labor" is a phrase which has been going the rounds of the rostrum these many years, but an article on this theme in the Northwestern College Chronicle has opened a new way of applying it. The writer has taken hold of a new handle, which the theme suggested, and treats it in a very unique and practical way. It shows the originality and independent thinking of the author.

We congratulate the author of the "College Kicker," which appeared in the last issue of the College Student, on his successful description of that most unpleasant species of the human race. No doubt the "College Kicker" referred to in the above mentioned article is none other than the "University Grumbler." It might be well to give the grumbler and kicker a corner in our college papers to give vent to their grievances. "Grumbler's Corner" might be an appropriate term.

THE RESURRECTION.

The hand of Rome had sealed the doom
And Jewish priests had wrought their will;
A guard was placed around the tomb,
The shaken hills at last were still.

And in the still and starlit night,
When all around in slumber lay,
The soldiers sat in armed might
To wait the slow approaching day.

Within the city dark and drear,
His chosen ones sad vigil kept
With hearts surcharged with grief and fear
That all the night has never slept.

They waited for the morn to break,
That they might bid their last farewell,
The last sad offerings to make
To Him they knew and loved so well.

But Hebrew law and Roman sword
And Pilate's seal cannot avail;
The sepulchre gives up its Lord,
And all the powers of Darkness fail.

The night is past, the day is come
That puts an end to doubts and fears,
The brightest day the earth has known,
Henceforth the Queen in all the years.

For Roman guards in awful fear
To wondering scribes have brought the word,
And sweetly sounds in Mary's ear
"All hail! Fear not, 'tis I, thy Lord!"

A COLLEGE IDYL.

Ram it in, cram it in,
Students' heads are hollow;
Slam it in, jam it in,
Still there's more to follow--
Hygiene and history,
Astronomic mystery,
Algebra, histology,
Latin, etymology,
Botany, geometry,
Greek and trigonometry—
Ram it in, cram it in,
Students' heads are hollow.

Scold it in, mould it in,
All that they can swallow;
Fold it in, hold it in,
Still there's more to follow.
Those who've passed the furnace through
With aching brow will tell to you,
How the teachers crammed it in,
Rammed it in, crammed it in,
Rubbed it in, clubbed it in,
Pressed it in, caressed it in,
Rapped it in and slapped it in,
When their heads were hollow.

Editorial.

QUITE a number of larcenies have been committed about the buildings lately which should be inquired into and stopped. It is hardly possible that any students are engaged in this, but the offenders, whoever they are, should be brought to justice.

AT PRESENT the tennis tournament seems pretty well assured. The committee has opened the entry books and posted the customary notices. Altho we may not have as many strong players as we had at the last tournament, we still have enough to make matters interesting. A few players are hesitating to enter because they are not experts. But that fact should not deter them. While it is true that not all will become champions, yet the practice and training which the preparation for such an event will give a player are invaluable.

IT HAS long been thought that a running track is necessary for the success of outdoor athletic sports. And truly it would be a valuable addition to our campus. Furthermore, plans are nearing completion by which this necessity may be met. A nucleus of money, the proceeds from last Field Day, remains in the hands of Mr. Gretzinger, who expects to add to it private subscriptions until the amount necessary is raised. The track will probably be put in during the summer.

THE bathing facilities afforded by the gymnasium forcibly remind one of the advantages of a backwoods boarding school. More than half the sprays are out of order, the heating apparatus has long since ceased to operate, and even when these were at their best, it was rather difficult to make the few gallons of hot water available suffice for the hundred or more applicants. The worst of it is that apparently no effort is made to remedy the defects, and students are compelled to bathe in cold water, which has sometimes resulted in illness. This matter ought to receive immediate attention.

THE prize cup offered by THE MIRROR to the class scoring the greatest number of points on Field Day is creating a little enthusiasm in the preparation for the exercises of that occasion. Previous to this offer the interest was languishing considerably so that only a few were doing any training at all. Now, however, the condition of affairs has taken a rather favorable turn and members of the different classes have begun a vigorous training for the events. But these are not as many as are necessary for the full success of the day. The cup that is offered, aside from the intrinsic value, will be a trophy worth the utmost efforts of any class to win and to hold. Let the classes strive to make the spring sports interesting this year.

WE ARE indebted to The Red and Blue, of recent date, for information that ought to prove interesting to our literary societies. It is proposed that a committee of five, one each from Yale, Harvard, Princeton, Columbia and Pennsylvania, choose once a month a question for common debate in all college literary societies of the country. To further this scheme such periodicals as The Forum, Public Opinion and The Arena have consented, because of the probable increased demand, to discuss fully these questions, so that there will be no lack of material. To quote from The Red and Blue: "We would have two great things gained. (1) All the colleges will be at one time discussing one subject, a fact which will add zest to every individual debate, and (2) there will be an abundant supply of material ready at hand, so that every man can have his debate well prepared with comparatively little trouble. Furthermore, there will be an indirect advantage in this arrangement in the fact that the outside public will of necessity become interested in college debating; and when we say the outside public, we include college professors and college faculties, who have proved themselves very plainly to be such, and from this oratory will be vastly encouraged." It is hoped that this will have a revivifying influence on literary societies, which in some colleges are in a state of "innocuous desuetude."

Apropos of the above it may be pertinent to inquire the cause of the decay of literary spirit in colleges. That something is radically wrong is obvious, else why these schemes to revive and maintain an interest? The inattention to literary work is prevalent, not merely at a few colleges, but at nearly all. Wherein lies the fault? This is a question that might well be propounded as the first of the proposed series. And in its discussion there should be no mincing matters, but the blame fastened where it belongs. Different charges are made. The increase of fraternities, which, it must be admitted, have often clashing interests, and which, it is charged, take time that might otherwise be given to literary work; then, there is the failure to obtain credit for such work, and even the non-attendance of the faculty upon literary meetings is held chargeable for their failure.

Now it is manifest that in a certain loose sense it is easy to shift responsibility, and to evade the real question by laying the blame where it does not belong. While these facts may have a deteriorating influence, they certainly are not the whole fault. Lack of interest or actual dislike for such work is inherent in the students themselves, and here is where the remedy must be applied. Baseball, football, tennis are participated in by all regardless of fraternities. Who ever heard of anyone's asking credit for work done on the diamond, the gridiron, or the court? or, when was an athletic game stopped because the faculty was not present to encourage the players? What we have an interest in, we find time for. And whatever be the real reason for the lack of interest, it must be evident that those commonly adduced are not wholly correct ones.

And we are rather doubtful as to the efficiency of the proposed plan beyond the colleges directly involved. For it has no sure foundation. A temporary interest may be started, but like all other plans that do not begin at the root of the matter, the present one will soon lose its potency. It is difficult to see how the matter can be remedied short of inculcating in the student a love for the work itself, and a desire to excel in it just as he desires to excel in athletic contests. If this could be accomplished, schemes such as proposed would greatly aid in maintaining the interest thus secured.

THE STUDENT'S RETURN.

All hail to thee, sweet B!
'Tis glad I am, indeed, to hie me back,
Although vacation sadly short I see
For efforts large I meant to pack
Within its meagre, measly week or two,
Yet, somehow, coming back I cannot rue.

For smiles thy campus green
On thronging youths who but reflect its hue;
In this thy most resplendent term 'twould seem
That Nature did herself outdo
To robe each graceful shrub and stately tree
For glories that are presently to be.

How many these appear!
For Soiree's gorgeous pinions soon will flop,
And, following closely in her rear,
The buildings shake from floor to top
With roars of Demosthenian eloquence,
While "elocute" the girls with force intense.

No farther I proceed
With this my category grand,
For I recall that I will doubtless need
All words at my command
To write one thesis, and construct excuse
For several others which I should produce.

An if I now should try
On Baccalaureate glories to dilate,
How my vocabulary'd fly
And leave me when I next "orate."
And so, dear B, I plunge into thy din
With no more analytic musings thin.—O. M. W.

TOUCHSTONE.

In Shakespeare's "As You Like It," the characters of Rosalind and Orlando claim the largest percentage of attention and interest. Of the two, the interest in Rosalind doubtless surpasses that felt in Orlando. But there are characters who claim less attention from us, but without whom, however, we feel that the production would be in a measure incomplete.

Of this latter class is Touchstone, the fool. A name is far from being an index of the character, whether it be the name of the individual or his calling. We feel that this negation exists between the name and character of Touchstone. Often much is hidden under an outward semblance, not always of evil but of real worth. Touchstone reveals a depth of character suggestive of an inner self when he says, "The more pity, that fools may not speak wisely what wise men do foolishly."

"Still waters run deep," is an old maxim, but its converse is not always true; namely, "Deep waters run still." Sometimes in these deeper currents some local disturbance may ruffle the surface until it is suggestive of the noisy rush of a shallow brook. We do not desire to assert nor attempt to establish that Touchstone's nature was of a great depth, but that it was deeper than many readers think. We doubt not that almost every reader would be sorry to dismiss this character of the fool from Shakespeare's comedy. His wit and good humor are like the occasional glints of sunshine on a cloudy day, or like those little rays, which, even in bright sunshiny days, find their way through crevices and give some brightness to what would otherwise be in complete shadow.

Again, Touchstone shows himself possessed of common sense when, from overhearing Silvius discourse to Corin of his love for Phebe, Rosalind is drifting into a somewhat sentimental mood. By a humorous reference to one of his own love affairs he hits with witty sarcasm the tendency of love "to run into strange capers."

At another time when he and Jaques are conversing we see two characters of directly opposite nature. His is a character completely the reverse of that of Jaques. Each has a wisdom of his own, and while Jaques is doubtless the better educated, yet we are more disposed to be pleased with Touchstone's apt statements than with those of Jaques, for there is about some of the sayings of Touchstone a brightness and vigor that is wanting in the moralizing of Jaques. They live in the same world, but, as it were, on different sides of a wall; Touchstone in the sunshine, seeing the bright side of everything, and Jaques on the shaded side beholding everything in shadow. Touchstone's very nature is optimistic, while Jaques views the world from the standpoint of a pessimist. There have been many men who have wished that they possessed in a greater degree this trait which was so happily blended in the character of Touchstone. After he has enumerated to Jaques the seven degrees of a lie, and presented "If" as "the only peace-maker," Jaques himself remarks, "Is not this a rare fellow, my lord? he's as good at anything and yet a fool."

Touchstone was not fitted to be a hero, but he belonged to a class which the world could ill afford to lose. No play is a true representation of life in which all are "leading" characters. We accord credit to this man who, while occupying a subordinate position, yet adds in the advancement and development of stronger men. Shall we not be equally just with those who learn the world's seriousness and give a golden tinge to the clouds? If so, we shall then ascribe to Touchstone some commendation, admitting that he was a good fool.

W.

MILTON'S CONCEPTION OF ADAM.

An author, in order to interest his readers, must have something in common with them; there must be some mutual bond of sympathy common to both In Epic poetry this law holds good the same as elsewhere. Homer and Virgil recognized this fact, and chose their subjects accordingly.

In the Paradise Lost, Milton tells us that his object is "to justify the ways of God to man."

This is of interest to us because we are all concerned in, and subject to the ''ways of God'' toward us. But when he conducts us away from the earth, where those ways are manifested, down into Hades, his imagination surpasses that of most mortals, and we follow his flight more out of curiosity than choice. It is only when he leaves the lower world, Satan, and the bad angels, and introduces us to Adam, that we realize he is coming to that which directly concerns us, and our interest revives.

Milton is not Adam's biographer, but is, rather, the historian of the period in which he lived. Hence his descriptions of Adam are not quite so full as might be, yet full enough to inform us of his conception of our ''First Father.'' It is with his idea of man in his sinless condition that we will deal mostly, since that is a question requiring greater imagination and poetic power.

A man's personal appearance is that which usually attracts us first, and so Milton places this at the very beginning of his description of Adam. His moral and mental qualities will come later, because they must be learned by closer acquaintance.

In stature, he was ''tall,'' ''erect'' in bearing, muscular and ''majestic.'' In countenance, his forehead was large, denoting intelligence and force of character, and his fine, brilliant eye proclaimed absolute authority. His hair, we presume, was dark, because Eve's was golden, and hung in locks ''round from his parted forelock,'' and shorter than that of the woman. And through these features ''shone the image of his glorious Maker.''

We may form an opinion of his general features, but this expression of countenance, we cannot imagine, for it was the image of a sinless soul, while we see only that image marred by vice and crime.

His moral condition, together with that of Eve, is described in two lines :—

> ''So passed they naked on, nor shunned the sight
> Of God or Angel, for they thougth no ill.''

The entire life and character of Adam is so closely joined to that of Eve that they can hardly be separated, therefore we will next examine his attitude toward, and relationship with her. Eve was added to creation at Adam's request ; he felt the need of a companion. ''But in these I found not what methought I wanted still.'' He pleads with God that each beast has its mate, but man was alone. The Creator hesitates, but Adam is firm in his wish. In this Milton goes a little beyond the Scriptural record, but it seems very natural that Adam should make this request.

We may easily conceive that man's social nature is not a part of his sinful nature. The fact that she was formed from his own flesh and blood would naturally make their relationship very close, but he realized, and she admitted that the man was the head.

> ''He for God only, she for God in Him.''

But this difference in position seems to have been a matter of little concern to them. No ''domestic jars'' are recorded while they were sinless. One explanation for this presents itself. Adam, though husband, was still lover. Eve, though wife, was still sweet-heart. With regard to Adam's expressions of regard, Addison says : ''The sentiments are chaste but not cold ; and convey to the mind ideas of the most transporting passion, and of greatest purity.''

In Book VIII, while conversing with the Angel, and not in the presence of Eve, he pays her the highest tribute man can pay to woman.

> ''Neither her outside form so fair, nor aught
> In procreation common to all kinds
>
> * * * * * * * * *
> So much delights, as those graceful acts,
> Those thousand decencies that daily flow
> From all her words and actions, mixed with love
> And sweet compliance, which declare unfeigned
> Union of mind, or in us both one soul.''

Adam's superior intellect made him her adviser and teacher, as well as husband and lover. He instructed her regarding the one test of their obedience, and pointed out how just was this one prohibition, and how easy to abstain from it. And Eve herself confessed that Adam was a good teacher, for she withdrew from the Angel's discourse, for—

> * * ''Such pleasure she reserved,
> Adam relating, she sole auditress :
> Her husband and relater she preferred
> Before the angel, and of him to ask
> Chose rather ; he, she knew, would intermix
> Grateful digressions, and solve high dispute
> With conjugal caresses, from his lip
> Not word alone pleased her.''

But, you say, it was easy to love in Paradise, while all went well. This is doubtless true, and so Adam shows the highest love after Eve has sinned. He realized her lost condition fully, and that he must either die with her or be separated eternally from her. He chose the former. In the Scriptures he excuses himself thus: "The woman, * * * she gave me of the tree, and I did eat." Milton reasons for Adam as follows:

> "How can I live without thee, how forego
> Thy sweet converse and love so dearly join'd,
> To live again in these wild woods forlorn?
> Should God create another Eve, and I
> Another rib afford, yet loss of thee
> Would never from my heart; no, no, I feel
> The link of Nature draw me; flesh of flesh,
> Bone of my bone thou art, and from thy state
> Mine never shall be parted, bliss or woe."

When we think of the difference between yielding to a serpent's temptations, and to the pleadings of a gallant and loving heart, we see an advantage Adam has over Eve in the matter of the fall. But such were Milton's conceptions of domestic life in Paradise. Perfect concord, because the actors were perfect, and in this relationship we see some, yes many, of the noblest traits in Adam's character.

But we do not wish to make this entirely a love story, surely not to a greater extent than Milton does. Adam was a business man. He was created for a purpose, and his work was designated to him by his Creator.

> "To prune these growing plants, and tend these flowers."

The poet confines himself strictly to the Scriptural facts in this connection, but makes them the foundation for many beautifully poetic thoughts.

Adam was not only a teacher, but also a learner. He had a great desire for knowledge. This caused him to ask many questions of the angel

> * * * * * * "and now
> Led on, yet sinless, with desire to know
> What nearer might concern him, how this world
> Of heav'n and earth conspicious first began,
> When and wherefore created, for what cause."

It might seem at first thought that it ill behooves a being, placed in the midst of beauty and perfection, to be so inquisitive. But I think that this desire places Adam upon a higher plane than he could otherwise maintain. It is not a part of man's nature, brought out by the fall, that makes him want to know. To know more of God's creation is to know more of our Creator, and, to know more of Him is to worship Him more and better. Adam expresses this in his thanks to the angel.

> "What thanks sufficient, or what recompence
> Equal, have I to render thee, divine
> Historian? who thus largely hast allayed
> The thirst I had for knowledge, and vouchsafed
> This friendly condescension to relate
> Things else by me unsearchable, now heard
> With wonder, but delight, and, as is due
> With glory attributed to the high Creator."

But Adam did not wish this knowledge for his own gratification alone. He wished it to enable him to worship his Creator better, and this suggests what a reverent soul he had. At the close of the day's work, in the midst of all the beauty of Paradise, when about to retire to rest,

> * * * * * * "both stood,
> Both turned, and under open sky, adored
> The God that made both sky, air, earth and heaven,
> Which they beheld, the moon's resplendent globe,
> And starry pole."

Then in the morning, when about to begin the day's duties, they again worshipped their Creator. The poet attributes to them the thoughts of David, in Psalm CXLVIII, which thoughts are the most natural possible, as they look out upon the universe of God.

Such are some of the characteristics of Adam in his sinless state, as they have appeared to us in reading the poem. They are based upon the first chapter of Genesis, and as far as Scripture describes Adam, Milton has followed it closely. He has taken the bare skeleton of facts, and has clothed it, by means of his imagination, with flesh and blood, but in such an indefinite manner as yet to leave much to the reader's imagination. In this, the poet has proved himself to be a master.

We can find no fault with any of the mental or moral qualities of Adam's character—they are perfect. And yet, with all his perfection, there is something lacking to draw us toward him. Perhaps it is individuality, but he was not a copyist; perhaps it is because we, in our sins, have so little in common with the sinless condition, cannot imagine ourselves in perfect purity. One thing is certain, up to the time of the fall, no one would make Adam the hero of the poem. We would rather think of him as such after his perfection is gone; after he has disobeyed his Creator; after he has spoken harsh and cruel words to his companion; after he has seen the sorrow and suffering caused by his sin; after he has wept in compassion for his sinful progeny; after he has repented of his sins; after he has spurned the idea of self-destruction and childlessness; after he has heard, and, by faith, accepted the promise of a Messiah, with hope for the future; after he has met conflict, and although conquered, is still a conqueror, through grace; and when after having been driven from the garden of Paradise, hand in hand with Eve,—

> "Some natural tears they dropped, but wiped them soon,
> The world was all before them, where to choose
> Their place of rest, and Providence their guide."

Athletics.

The principal thing in the sporting line at the Sem. is several bicycles, but none of them built for two.

The interest taken in preparation for Field Day is increasing daily. Miller, Snow and Koons are training for the 100-yard dash and mile run. In throwing the hammer and putting the shot, Lesher, Collins, Wilson and Kauffman are doing good work. Collins and Lesher have broken last year's record.

The schedule for the month of May in baseball is as follows: Dickinson, May 11, at Lewisburg; Bloomsburg, May 19, at Bloomsburg; Washington and Jefferson, May 24, at Lewisburg; Dickinson, May 26, at Dickinson; Bloomsburg, May 30, at Lewisburg. The games for the month of June have not been arranged.

The Neyhart club recently had the courage to issue a bold challenge to play baseball with any other club in the University. Their challenge was scarcely posted before the Anderson club took up the gauntlet and promised to meet them on the campus at 2 p. m. Saturday, Appil 28. The game was exciting from start to finish and was marked by much brilliant playing on both sides. The score was 6 to 4 in favor of the Anderson club. The Neyhart club attribute their defeat to their inexperienced captain, Shorty.

The first baseball game of the season was played Thursday, April 26, with Milton, on the University campus. Over a thousand persons witnessed the game, and it was interesting from beginning to end. The players on the "Varsity" team were as follows: Harris, c; Bourn, p; Cregar, 1b; Smith, 2b; Geary, 3b; Carey, ss; Parker, lf; Shorkley, cf; Scatcher, rf. The game resulted in favor of Bucknell by a score of 19 to 13. The chief features of the game were Harris' batting, catching and throwing to second base. All the players deserve congratulation and our hearty support.

Entries for Field Day and for the annual tennis tournament will be open until May 12. The class of '95 are entering a number of good athletes to contest for the class cup on field day; here will be an opportunity for the Freshmen to win trophies from their rivals, the Sophomores. Eleven events are scheduled, and it is quite probable that new records will be made for our College. Many have already entered for the tennis tournament. The Alumni and the Academy will each have a good team, while the Seniors and Sophomores seem to have the choice class teams of the College. At all events the class doubles will prove exciting contests. Mr. H. F. Smith will not play in the singles, but will play as champion—challenging the winner of the singles in order to retain the College championship.

DEDICATED TO RENO.

And am he gone
And has he went
And be we left without him?
He ain't never seen
He ain't hardly heard
We don't know noth'n' about him.

Talk about sportsmen! Watch Nelson Davis and that little rifle.

"Oh, dear! Oh, dear! Oh, dear! Oh, dear, oh!" sighs Wilson.

The oddest-fellows in the parade on April 26, were Haddock and Douglass.

Reno quite seriously objects to either Suiter or Crawford acting as his proxy.

The photograph of Dr. Aviragnet's band has been taken recently and is a masterpiece of the art.

W. B. Lewis, of Shenandoah, a former member of '96, spent Odd Fellows Day with Bucknell friends.

Colestock is reported as being dissatisfied with the notoriety he achieved from a squib in the last MIRROR.

If all the members of the scrub baseball team practiced as diligently as Jackson, we would soon have a surplus of skillful players.

The mad chase for heart's-ease, spring beauties and forget-me-nots by the Botany class is interesting, even when viewed from a distance.

The Junior class is delighted with the work in Astronomy. Star-gazing and moonlight strolls have acquired a new fascination for some.

Fred Finn is contemplating a visit to his home and to Philadelphia for a few days. We hope it is nothing more serious than contemplation.

Prof. Lincoln Hulley has rented the property opposite the Institute, formerly occupied by Captain J. A. Owens, and set up housekeeping.

The playing of Dr. Aviragnet's band on the 26th ult., was remarkably fine. The Bucknell boys received high compliments from all sides.

Mr. Lathrop has been supplying the church at Lansford, Pa., for a few Sundays, and will, we hope, accept the invitation to take charge of this flourishing field.

J. D. Macnab, '96, spent Sunday, May 6, with W. W. Irvin, of Mifflinburg. While absent from Bucknell he despoiled the vicinity of Mifflinburg of a large variety of choice flowers.

Mr. T. S. Fretz proved himself the hero of the fire on Fifth street on April 27. Although there were no beautiful maidens to rescue from the flames, the occupants of the house owe their lives to his timely warning.

Haddock in the observatory was looking at Jupiter and her three visible moons. He insisted, however, that there were four moons visible, and explained that there was ''one great big one and three little bits of ones.''

The attempt by some smart Freshmen to mutilate a classmate's essay, in order to annoy him, simply indicates that the kindergarten spirit of destruction remains with some children long after leaving the primary school.

The caps and gowns of the Seniors were a decided novelty at the soiree on the 5th. We hope that the precedent will become an established custom, and that the other classes will be able thus to grace such occasions in the future.

Some well-minded student found recently a little brown whiskey bottle and exposed it in chapel to advertise its owner. A Prof. recognized the bottle, for he immediately removed it from the piano and secreted it behind his chair.

The Alumni of the University, in the western part of the State, are arranging to hold their annual banquet. It will be held at one of the leading hotels in Pittsburg, presumably the Duquesne, where the banquet took place last year.

Dr. Freeman Loomis, who spent several weeks at Atlantic City, on account of ill health, has resumed his duties in the class room. During his absence from Bucknell, Strayer had charge of the German class, and Davidson the French class.

We are surprised that our spring poets are so easily discouraged. The necessary refusal of a few verses, which were even worse than those accepted for the last issue, has had the unfortunate effect of quenching—perhaps forever—the sacred flame.

The recent brilliant conflagration in town was attended by a large and appreciative audience, composed mostly of college students in evening dress. The program was then varied and continued until well into the morning, by the celebrated chanteurs de cantine of the East Wing.

The ''sporting editor'' has laid aside his eyeglasses. We are glad to see him hopeful, and trying to look young again. But, however, he appears to be careful of his eyes, for on a recent botanical expedition he took with him a young lady, who possesses a fine pair of optics, (to examine the flowers for him?)

Mr. F. R. Strayer, '94, has been elected to and has accepted the position of Professor of Mathematics at John B. Stetson University, DeLand, Florida. This institution has an enrollment of about two hundred and fifty students, is heavily endowed and is presided oyer by Dr. John F. Forbes, a graduate of Rochester University.

The Lavoisier meeting of the Chemical and Physical society will take place on May 17, instead of May 3, as previously announced. The meeting on the latter date was devoted to a discussion of explosives. Papers were read on Gunpowder, by E. E. Hall ; Fulminates, by W. H. Carey ; Gun-Cotton, by L. L. Riggin ; Nitro-Glycerin, by B. K. Brick.

The cause of temperance is in need of workers. From our colleges shall come many of our future advocates of Prohibition. It needs the support of our college students. On May 17, at seven o'clock in Bucknell Hall, the Prohibition club of the University will hold a Demorest Silver Medal contest. The Prohibition Glee club, of Williamsport, will furnish music for the exercises. It is desired that the student body be present at the contest.

Returning from the Y. M. C. A. convention at State College, a number of the delegates stopped off to view Bucknell's grounds and buildings. Among those who tarried here for a short time were: Daniel Longsdorf, of Schuylkill Seminary; Horace Ritter, of the Keystone State Normal School; Mr. Kine, of Lehigh University; Mr. Harris, of Lafayette College; Mr. Conkle, of Ursinus College, and Mr. Fassett, of Keystone Academy.

Ezra Allen attended the conference of the Y. M. C. A. college presidents of Pennsylvania held at State College. Messrs. Mott, Hurlburt and Beaver were present as instructors and gave much valuable information in regard to the best methods of conducting schools in the Y. M. C. Associations. Allen reports that the entertainment provided for the delegates was all that could be desired, and everyone felt like congratulating P. S. C. on having so cordial and social a lot of fellows.

Those who attend a circus generally have considerable difficulty to watch the performers in two or three rings at the same time. But it appears that we have at Bucknell a set of men who can easily do two things at once, for they are able to play tennis and watch a game of baseball without the least difficulty. Whether these actions are the result of an economizing spirit in money or in time might be difficult to determine. Perhaps the object of the tennis players is merely to show their contempt for those who twirl the ball.

Various parties have made a request for a supplementary chapter to an article that appeard in the last issue of the MIRROR. It seems that twice in the choice of seats in the Botany room Cupid's arts were almost thwarted by chance. Two hearts that beat as one were located in different rooms. Great was the tribulation of the separated parties. Anxiety was depicted in every lineament of the countenance. Could not an exchange of seats be effected? Would fate be so cruel for an entire term? Such were the anxious questions asked by the unhappy pair. Finally, however, diplomacy on the part of Mr. S—— combined with compassion and magnanimity on the part of Mr. P——, secured a perfect adjustment of what threatened to be a very serious trouble.

During the winter term Theta Alpha Literary Society decided to render the trial scene in Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice." On Friday evening, May 4, the long looked for performance took place. Though the hall had been arranged for the occasion, there was an absence of some of the grand scenery which metropolitan theatres possess. The costumes of the actors, while elegant, might have been criticised by a less classical audience. However, what was lacking in tinsel and show was supplied by the enthusiasm of the audience. Douglass in the cast of Antonio, was superb. The disappointed and worried merchant never had a more faithful double than at this time. What a noble judge was Duke Hollinshead! The Roman toga well became his learning and patrician bearing. Then there were Collins, Dillon, Suiter and Ware, who acted the parts of Nerissa, the clerk, Salerio and the attendants, each an adept in his particular line. The learned Balthasar, or gentle Portio, exactly suited Allen. But what of noisy Gratiano? To say that Davis was inimitable would be telling only half the truth. Kauffman as Bassanio was a true lover and a faithful friend. Last and best of all was Shylock. It was not the first time Wood played this part, so that he had the air of a professional about him. His acting was realistic, partaking of the strong qualities of McCullough, Booth and Irving.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

The elocution contest will occur on Monday evening, May 12.

Miss Ella Reese spent several days at her home in Fairview Village.

The undergraduates now have the privilege of leaving the grounds, at stated times each week.

Six of the Institute girls enjoy the fascination of bicycle riding. Rosy cheeks and ravenous appetites are happy results.

Through the thoughtfulness of one of the fraternities the members of the Institute enjoyed the parade on Odd Fellows' Day.

Miss Alice Lyman, a graduate of the music school, was married to Dr. Milner on May 2, at Austin, Pa. Washington, D. C., will be the home of Dr. and Mrs. Milner.

A unique program was arranged by the Fourth Year class for their annual soiree. Further details will be furnished in the next issue.

On Saturday morning, April 21, fortune smiled on the second arbutus party of the season. After a long and ineffectual struggle with the weather, the Phi Gamma Delta fraternity finally prevailed, and secured for their guests from the Institute, a charming day, which was spent among the hills at Turtle creek. The arbutus was never lovelier, and the fragrant masses of it which came back to the Institute bore eloquent testimony of a delightful day, well spent.

Miss Sara Johnson, '92, who is teaching in a private school at Lumberton, N. C., writes: "The climate is delightful here, with the exception of mid-summer. We have had a very mild winter, with one fall of snow about six inches deep, which did not last two days. Several weeks ago the roses and magnolias were ready to open, but the cold frosts came and killed them. Here there is no public school system, and if the father is not able to pay for it the child does not receive an education."

The girls, of '94, are delighted with Julian Hawthorne's text book on American Literature. The author has a special gift of presenting, in choicest prose, the salient characteristics of a writer. Few can equal him in vigorous metaphor and there is often a delicate trace of humor; as when he says, "For Daniel Webster to speak on an ordinary theme was like harnessing Niagara to run a saw mill." One would hardly expect one born in Boston of true Puritan stock to say that "Wendell Phillips and Charles Sumner exhorted the north and antagonized the south, in season and out," or that Edward Everett, who achieved such high and varied public distinction, "was always in a state of admiring contemplation, pensive reminiscence or glowing premonition over something it mattered little what; and though but twenty-five years in the grave, he has faded out of men's memories." Such utterances show that Mr. Hawthorne is certainly not biased by the prevalent opinions of his native city.

ACADEMIC NEWS.

[S. J. CLEKLAND, Correspondent.]

A new mission has been started by a few Academy students near Fairfield.

Mr. Harvey when asked "How it was he did not declaim in the Third Form contest, said he "swore off."

Mr. Harvey has recovered from a very severe attack of throat trouble. We are glad to see him in class again.

Saturday morning, April 21, the Third and Fourth Forms played a game of baseball on the campus. The score was Third Form 9 runs, Fourth Form 19 runs.

Mr. Cober recently favored the Main Hall boys with a treat of maple sugar. Mr. Cober has a quantity of sugar for sale. Those desiring to purchase will please send their order at once.

Saturday evening, April 28, the Third Form held its declamation contest. Bucknell Hall was well filled by town and college folks. Between declamations and the soft strains of music, the evening was spent very enjoyably.

The Hermania Literary Society has elected the following officers for this term: President, J. B. Martin; vice president, F. G. Perrin; secretary, C. W. Harvey; treasurer, R. Koons; first critic, D. H. Elliott; second critic, H. W. Geary; censor, A. Hutchinson.

Through the efforts of Mr. Suiter and Mr. Sherman a cut of the Academy football team will appear in the next issue of the MIRROR. Much can be said of the good showing the team made last season, but modesty compels us to refrain. With a few exceptions the team will take its stand upon the field next fall, ready to make as good a record as last season's.

Personal.

'56. Rev. Geo. Freer has resigned his pastorate at Wilkes-Barre.

'57. Dr. Geo. A. Peltz has relinquished the editorial care of the Temple Magazine, on account of his being fully occupied with the work of the church and Sunday school of Mr. Conwell's church, Philadelphia.

'58. Col. Thos. C. Chamberlain will deliver the oration before A. G. Tucker Post, G. A. R., on Decoration Day, in Lewisburg.

'61. O. W. Spratt, L. L. B., visited England lately with a view of introducing into that country the publications of the American Baptist Publication Society.

'61. Col. W. H. Harrison, of Philadelphia, was in town recently on business connected with the Peter Beaver estate, of which he is one of the executors.

'76. Rev. Owen James is one of the chaplains of Hollidaysburg Female Seminary.

'81. Rev. F. W. Cramer, of Cleveland, Ohio, is Secretary of the Cleveland Baptist City Mission Society and superintendent of Foreign Missions in that city.

'85. Carl C. Law, better known in college as "Lex," is paying and receiving teller of the Freehold Bank, Fourth Avenue, Pittsburg. In addition to his manifold duties as a banker, Mr. Law is also treasurer of a steel company, which has a new process of tempering steel. This process, it is presumed, will revolutionize the entire mode of tempering steel.

'85. Rev. W. R. Granger has had an almost phenomenal ingathering at Oswego this winter. He has a large congregation and an enthusiastic people. Between three and four hundred have been baptised and have united with the Oswego church.

'88. Rev. R. B. McDaniel has been elected secretary and treasurer of the Philadelphia Baptist Ministers' Conference.

'88. Rev. A. W. H. Hodder has, for the fifth time, been chosen to drill the Lehigh University men on their commencement orations. His house is said to be the handsomest Baptist parsonage in New York City.

'89. F. B. Hargrave, Esq., has been elected solicitor of the Latrobe, Pa., borough, for the current year.

'92. A. R. E. Wyant was ordained to the ministry at Ocoya, Ill., on March 30, 1894.

Ex '94. Theodore Heysham was one of the victorious debaters in the contest held April 20, at Ithaca, N. Y., between University of Pennsylvania and Cornell. Mr. Heysham is also a member of the Red and Blue editorial staff.

Ex-'95. Paul E. Weithaas was recently ordained and is pastor of the Newport, N. J., Baptist church.

College News.

There are at present no literary societies at Buchtel College.

The edition of the Wittenberger, published April 17, was double its usual size.

Dickinson Liberal suspended publication for one issue during the Easter vacation.

The Bayard Taylor edition of the Amulet is one of the best put out for some time.

Boy to Waiter (at dinner)—"Ed, is this chicken or turkey? Ed.—"Gobbler."—R. M. Mascoe.

The Villanova monthly contains several columns devoted entirely to mathematics. Something new.

The Baseball Association, of Colgate, has secured a trainer to be on the diamond at all hours of practice.

The Civil Engineering corps of Lafayette recently made a tour among the mountains of Western Pennsylvania.

Westminster College conducted a course of lectures on the "Poets of the Revolution Age" by Dr. Clarke Robinson.

The Freshman class, of Lehigh, has arranged for a series of baseball games with Freshmen classes of other colleges.

We acknowledge the receipt of the following exchanges: Antiochian, Central High School Mirror, Villanova, Mercersburg Monthly, Eatonian, and College Messenger.

The College Student in the April 10th edition contained a plan of the battle of Waterloo. A series of articles on that famous battle shall appear in the College Student from time to time, written by Brev. Maj. Gen. J. Watts DePeyster, Litt. D., LL. D., A. M., etc.

The April number of the University Cynic contains three cuts showing the stages of improvement of the University. There is quite a contrast between the first building erected and the present structure. The first, erected in 1824, according to the cut was a very unassuming structure. The second, erected in 1860, shows a marked advance, and the present building, reconstructed in 1882 and 1883, is a building of beautiful proportions.

Editorial.

ACTIVE preparations are still in progress for Field Day, and from present indications the events of that day will be quite interesting. The date at this writing has not been definitely fixed, but very likely will be June 2d.

L'AGENDA for this year will be more attractive than ever. In it will be represented the peculiarities of college life set forth by words and pictures. Such publications are always welcome, and we predict for the coming issue a large circulation.

THE tennis tournament holds the attention of quite a number of students who have entered as contestants. The courts are in active demand while the training is going on. The tournament will commence about May 19th, and the final sets played near commencement time.

THE men on the baseball team are certainly faithful in practice, and as a result, marked improvement may be seen in their playing. Of course they are not professionals, nor do we expect that their work should equal that of those who make baseball a business. As it is, they do some excellent playing, and altogether present a fairly strong college team. As this team represents the University, it should receive the cordial support of the students and their friends.

THE increase in the number of graduates sent out from Bucknell is a sign of the sure growth of our Alma Mater. In looking over the list of classes from '86 to '93 inclusive, it will be noticed that the average number of graduates is 14, with a minimum of 7 and a maximum of 20. This year, however, the number leaps to 30, and the remaining classes give promise of being nearly, if not quite, as large as the class about to graduate. But not only in numbers has the college advanced. The requirements are higher, new electives covering a much wider range of subjects are offered, and a new chair established. Surely there is much cause for congratulation on account of the many and growing opportunities here afforded for higher education, and the manifest and increasing desire on the part of so many young people to make the best of them.

THE Y. M. C. Associations in college and academy, under their new officers, are still active and progressive. It is difficult to see how schools could do without such organizations. Not only do they keep up the spiritual tone and maintain a healthy religious atmosphere, but they also form a strong bond uniting the various colleges and schools of the country. Nowhere is this latter feature seen to greater advantage than at the state conventions where the college men, laying aside whatever rivalries they may have, heartily join in the work of extending the Kingdom of Christ. And not of the least importance is the relation of these associations to the annual Northfield meetings. Here many of the delegates have been led to devote their lives to the great missionary movement, and all of them have disseminated an influence as beneficent as it has been widespread. It is likely that the delegation from our Associations will be larger than usual this year.

THE seniors have decided to celebrate class day. In doing so they revive a custom which has fallen somewhat into disuse lately at Bucknell. In many colleges the exercises of class day form the most enjoyable part of the commencement season. In the hall or on the campus large crowds of the graduates' friends gather to hear the histories and prophecies read, and see represented various phases of college life. Here the interest has languished among those on whom the work devolved, with only spasmodic attempts to revive it. It is a custom that deserves to be kept alive as long as commencement seasons exist, for it depicts a side of college life not often visible to the outside world. When the day has been kept here in the past, the exercises were always interesting, and the coming occasion we are assured will not be devoid of interest. While the present class are to be commended on their enterprise, it is also to be hoped that their successors will not allow this custom to fall into disuse.

THE Chemical and Physical Society is an organization deserving the hearty support of all students interested in the sciences. As the name would seem to indicate its scope is broad, and the topics discussed in its meetings cover almost everything aside from literature and art. This affords plenty of room for the natural inclinations of the students in making original investigations and experiments. The society, ever ready to discuss the subject presented, furnishes an incentive to be well prepared. The benefits accruing from such an association are at least twofold: 1. It affords to the members a means of obtaining a vast amount of information on miscellaneous subjects in which they are more or less directly interested, besides the advantages of discussion; and, 2d, it forms habits of independent research which are simply invaluable in after life; it gives exercise in expressing, either in writing or orally, clearly and forcibly the results of such investigation. Furthermore, the society of Bucknell has not been merely selfish in its aims. Each year a reception is held at which the members give an exhibition of the laboratory appliances and perform some experiments. These have been interesting in the past, as the large audiences have signified; and it is to be hoped that in the future, as in the past, the Chemical and Physical Society may be a guide in the scientific thought of the University.

THE ADVANTAGES OF THE NORTHFIELD STUDENTS' CONFERENCE.

"Northfield" is a well-known word among us. For several years, one or more of our number has enjoyed the pure Massachusetts air and invigorating influences of the Students' Conference in July.

The advantages that accrue from these gatherings are immeasurable. The past is bright with their influence, and its effulgent radiance reveals telling facts. Space gives chance for only an outline picture. These conferences have created a new bond of strong sympathy between the colleges; they have given a marked impetus to college Bible study; they have lifted thousands of students to a much higher plane of Christian life, the result of which has been a stronger spiritual life in the home Association; they have made possible the student uprising in the south, in the west, in Great Britian, in Germany, in Scandinavia, India and Japan, until the globe is encircled with Young Men's Christian Associations.

What the conference has done in the past, it is doing now. The student who goes there next July may expect to come in contact with representative men of this and other countries. A. T. Pierson, of fame in the United States and England as a powerful speaker, will charm by his Rhetoric, arouse to action by his eloquence and leave a marked impress upon character by his powerful personality. Bishop Thoburn, a man who has had large experience on the mission fields of India, will relate his experiences, and from a heart overflowing with love for all mankind will teach valuable lessons. And Mr. Moody! He will preside at all the platorm meetings. Every student of human nature ought to come in contact with the man who of all men in this generation has had the widest, and at the same time the closest, contact with men. The man who has shown to the world what a life wholly given up to God can accomplish. Other prominent men from college, professional and business life will be in attendance, who never fail to appeal favorably to the student.

Robert E. Speer is to conduct one branch of Bible study. Of Mr. Speer it is often said: "A marvelous combination of sturdiest manhood with kindest tenderness." Many a student speaks from experience thus: "Not to know him is not to know yourself." Besides conducting the Bible study, Mr. Speer will give addresses. Mr. James McCanaughy will have charge of another division of Bible study. For him no better recommendation can be offered, perhaps, than that he has for some years taught the Bible in Mr. Moody's school at Mount Hermon.

The opportunity this conference affords for personal acquaintance with college men must not be underestimated. Representatives from almost every state in the Union, as well as from Great Britain and "the far east," will clasp hands and find new ties of friendship. Contact with strong, earnest, active, chosen—yes chosen—men, such as these is a chance that does not come to every man more than once in a life time. The arrangement of the work gives abundant opportunity for little conferences, long walks and pleasant excursions. There is not a student who does not delight in having a broad acquaintance, especially among fellow students. Northfield gives time for more than mere acquaintance. One has well said: "The strong and helpful influence of a fellow student has been among the brightest memories of former conferences."

One cannot speak of Northfield without mentioning the delightful outing it affords. Just after the year's work a student needs fresh air and change of scene. Here he finds both. The afternoons are left free for this very purpose, and tennis tournaments, baseball and basketball games, athletic contests between the various colleges, long walks among the mountains, or a tramp over the line into Vermont, together with excellent bathing facilities, afford plenty of exercise and sport. All this, mingled with the advantages already named, makes a pleasant as well as profitable outing. The day begins with Missionary and Bible study meetings in various places, followed at 10 o'clock by the platform addresses. An afternoon spent in the open air gives hearty appetite for supper, and just as the sun is setting we join the processions which tend toward "Round Top." In the glow of such sunsets as only Northfield can prepare we listen to informal speeches on missions, and many a soul has there seen God's plans more clearly for itself, as tho revealed in letters of gold across the western sky. In the twilight we pass thoughtfully to hear the last addresses of the day.

The advantages to the Association are not slight if the Northfield delegates are made use of. They are men who possess methods tried and approved by the leaders of the Inter-collegiate work and by the students of various institutions. They come back to school with fresh purposes and new spiritual life. They are ready for service and have the determination to do something. The Association must give them important work. Too often this is not done, and the men, from modesty, do not assert themselves. The result is a latent force unused. The leaders of the Association (not the delegates) are thus unwittingly to blame for lack of large and important results from sending men to Northfield.

The man who attends will never forget the trip. The ride on Long Island Sound by moonlight from New York to New London will make an ineffaceable impression. Nor will the days at the conference be forgotten or regretted. The influences of these powerful speakers, the Bible study, the "Round Top" meetings, the new friendships, and the holy atmosphere of Northfield, will have painted many an indelible picture upon the walls of the many-chambered mind, which "fond recollection" will delight in uncovering and exposing to renewed, thankful contemplation.

VIEW FROM MY WINDOW IN MAY AND ITS SUGGESTIONS.

Faultless sky, flecked with fleecy clouds, and active with the flight of migratory birds. Rolling fields, that stretch away into more wooded and steeper hills, and, finally, become mountains, whose hazy blue blends with the sky itself; such in general is the view from my window this perfect May day.

After the eye has delighted itself by so general a prospect, it longs to rest, first here, then there, on some particular object that attracts by its beauteous harmony with the whole. There is the old road, lined with ancient trees, and reaching as far as the eye can see, and seeming to narrow itself to a point until it is lost in perspective. On this side of the road, and near at hand, are broad fields; this one, of oats, is of dark, rich green; and, as a gentle breeze passes over it, it runs in waves like a lake. Beyond are fields of wheat and corn and pasture land.

Across the way from these stands an old frame house, built rather for strength than beauty, and standing like a guardian over all the fields about. A glance at the well constructed buildings tells of the thrift of the sturdy occupants. Looking closer one may see, through the half-open door, the faithful wife kneading out the bread which her husband has provided, or preparing the plain, but wholesome and abundant repast.

As the dinner hour draws near, the farmer and his "help" start for the house, while the older son takes care to give the horses a generous allowance of oats. And now the men wash their faces and brawny arms and sit down to their noon-day meal with appetites made keen by the work of the morning. As they eat they exchange many a jocund story, and take their simple delight in life as they find it. One might easily look at these men and envy the toil that brings such contentment as theirs.

But the eye passes from this group and out into the meadow. Here are cows, some lazily cropping the grass, others standing indifferently beneath the shade of some large tree. In another part of the field are some old work horses huddled together, with necks overlapped, as if to caress and comfort each other. Two or three young horses, conscious of their strength and freedom, are galloping up and down the field in wild sport and hurling clods of earth high in the air at every leap. And the bits of woodland, although they have been invaded, during the winter, by the destructive axe, are trying to conceal their loss by a covering of floral and leafy beauty and thus give pleasure to those that look upon them. Even so the world would be brighter, if each man and woman would present to view only the brighter side of their lives.

On the top of one of the hills stands a little white church. There is no grove about it, for it is a church where the true God is worshipped. Its whiteness may symbolize the purity of the simple folk that worship there. And as it can be seen from all the country for miles around, it seems to invite the sons of toil to its shelter and rest when the week is over.

Thus one gazes on this expanse of country, variegated with light and darker fields, checked with patches of woods, dotted with farm houses, some on elevated spots of the upland, others sheltered in the valleys; but all sprinkled with a hazy light and canopied by the "hollow shield-shaped" sky.

One cannot look upon this beautiful picture of nature without perceiving much more than the physical eye can see. The walls of the farm house and the church are like glass and the pure simple lives of these people are laid bare for us to read.

The matchless coloring of grove and meadow leads us to consider the beauty of soul which is painted and perfected by the same Master-hand that painted these lovely fields.

IS FOOTBALL A DANGEROUS GAME?

(Dr. Geo. G. Groff.)

There has recently been published by Dr. W. W. Keen, of Philadelphia, a comparative statement of the injuries from football, riding and in the gymnasium, as reported by Major P. F. Harvey, the post-surgeon at West Point. This is believed to be the first accurate comparative statement of injuries in the games above noted for the same class of persons, and for this reason it ought to appear in the college journals. Dr. Keen's statistics follow:

LIST OF CASUALTIES AMONG U. S. CADETS FROM SEPT. 1, 1893, TO NOV. 30, 1893, DUE TO FOOTBALL AND INSTRUCTION IN RIDING AND GYMNASTICS.

C. Percentage of days lost per accident :
277-54 = 5.01 days in football.
57-17 = 3.04 " riding.
11-9 = 1.02 " gymnasium.

1. Percentage of accidents. From the table the following deductions may be made: First, the percentage of accidents per man playing in the place, and for the season to which this table refers, was twenty times as frequent in foot-ball as in riding or in gymnastics (1.6 : : 0.09 : : 0.08, II.)

2. The number of days lost from football accidents per man playing is twenty-six times as much in football as compared with riding, and over fifty times as much as from gymnastics (8.01 : : 0.31 : : 0.15, III A.)

3. The number of days lost per man injured is 5.01, 3.04, and 1.02 (III C), showing that the football accidents in the table were nearly twice as serious as those from riding, and five times as serious as those from gymnastics.

4. Number of men continuously off duty. There were five times as many men off duty per diem from football accidents as from riding accidents, and twenty five times as many as from gymnastics (3.01 : : 5.63 : : 0.12, IIIB). It must be remembered, also, as Dr. Harvey says in his letter, that "in addition to the cases enumerated, there were, of course, others which were either very slight or temporary, or failed to come under observation on acount of pride," etc. This, however, is an observation which would probably apply equally well to any of the other accidents. It may be added also that the relative proportion between football and riding accidents is much more unfavorable to football, from the fact that twenty-seven days of the whole fifty-seven lost in riding were due to a single case, leaving therefore thirty days to be divided among the other sixteen accidents from riding. And when one considers the "dare-devil" character of the riding at West Point, it seems to me that the liability to accident would be perhaps greater there than among those who ride more quietly. On the other hand, however, we must remember that the West Point riders are among the best trained and most competent in the country, and hence accidents are comparatively few, perhaps less than among the general public.

COMPARATIVE STATEMENT OF INJURIES TO CADETS FROM FOOTBALL, RIDING AND GYMNASTICS AT WEST POINT, N. Y., FOR A PERIOD OF THREE MONTHS IN 1892.

1. Injuries of All Kinds.

Football injuries, Sept. 1, 1892, to Nov. 30, 1892,	37
Injuries in riding hall, Oct. 15, '92, to Jan. 15, '93,	26
Injuries in gymnasium,	10

2. Number of Men.

Who played football,	27
Under instructions in Riding hall,	198
" " in gymnasium,	101

3. Days Lost.

From foot-ball accidents,	106
Riding injuries,	71
Accidents in gymnasium,	58

Per Cent. of Accidents per Man.

	1892.	1893.
In football,	1.05	1.6
Riding,	0.11	0.09
Gymnasium,	0.10	0.08
Days lost per man in playing football,	3.93	8.01
" " riding,	0.35	0.31
" " gymnasium,	0.57	0.15
Men off duty per diem in football,	1.18	3.01
" " " riding,	0.79	0.63
" " " gymnasium,	0.64	0.12
Days lost per accident in football,	2.98	5.01
" " " riding,	2.74	3.04
" " " gymnasium,	5.80	1.02

It will be observed that there is but little difference in the two series of injuries. The serious disproportion, therefore, against football, as compared with the two other forms of athletics, seems to be normal rather than accidental.

*27 days of this, in one case, due to kick of horse on shin, causing periostitis.

One other point to which Dr. Harvey calls attention, and of which I was not aware when I wrote the last letter, emphasizes very clearly the relative frequency of the accidents. Football games he states, are played only on Saturday afternoons. Instruction in the riding hall is given three times a week, and in the gymnasium six times a week. ''In other words,'' as Dr. Harvey says, ''if accidents always happened in the ratio here given, the number which would have occurred in football had it been played as many days as instruction in riding was given would have been three times the number stated, and six times the number if played as often as instruction in the gymnasium was given.''

Dr. Keen is so eminent a surgeon and educator that his words ought to carry great weight. He contends as follows : ''My own opinion, as a surgeon who has seen a large number of accidents, is that football, as played at present, is a needlessly dangerous sport. The price paid for the good it does is too high, both in life and limb. Strip it of its needless dangers, and no one would be a more hearty advocate of the game than I. This revision of the rules to eliminate its dangers must be made by football men themselves. If they do this the game will hold its present place in the esteem of all who value manly and invigorating sport. If they do not, then it should be prohibited, at least in our colleges where the faculties have the power to do so. Prohibit it there, and it will be doomed to an innocuous desuetude.''

With the above the writer heartily coincides.

Athletics.

The Sophomore-Freshman game resulted in Sophomore 18, Freshman 10.

A second baseball team has been organized for the purpose of giving the first team practice. Grim has been chosen captain of same.

The Angstadt club which refused to take a good lesson from the haughty Neyharts, and desirous to learn rather by experience, issued a challenge to play a game of baseball with each of the following clubs : Kauffman, Summers, Reitmeyer and Hall. The Kauffman club accepted the challenge, and on May 12 the game was played and resulted in the defeat of the Angstadts by a score of 19 to 4. Fretz played the game for the Angstadt club, and their defeat was probably due to the absence of Davis, one of their best players.

Probably the best baseball game ever played on Bucknell campus was played on Friday, May 11, between Dickinson and Bucknell. This year Dickinson has been spending her best energy in base ball and has won more than her share of the games played. Without a doubt she came here expecting to place a 0 for Bucknell's score. However, to her surprise our boys put up an excellent game, and the score resulted in Dickinson 12, Bucknell 8. The infield played with but one or two errors. The phenomenal triple play of Carey, assisted by Smith and Shorkley, was the exciting event of the game. For good playing, both on first and at the bat, Cregar played an excellent game. In fact, everyone of our boys played well and are worthy of congratulations. At one point in the game the score stood 5 to 3 in favor of Bucknell, and it looked as if Bucknell might win the game. But Dickinson's batting was so good that our defeat was inevitable. Our men were placed as follows : Harris, c ; Brown, p ; Cregar, 1b; Smith, 2b; Shorkley, 3b; Carey, ss ; Parker, lf ; Bayard, cf ; Scatchard, rf.

The entries for the annual tournament in athletics has been closed, and the contest will probably take place June 2. Many more than was at first expected have entered. This is probably due to the fact that each class is anxious to win the ''Cup.'' The entries for field day are as follows : 100 yard dash, Jackson, Carey, Bunnell and Summerbell ; 220 yards dash, Koons, Dillon, Carey, W. H. Bunnell and Miller ; 440 yards dash, Koons, Colestock, Firth, Dillon and Miller ; one mile run, Colestock, Firth, Jackson, Rodgers, Davis, J. W., Hanna and J. Carey ; putting the shot, Brick, Davis, N. F., Lesher and Collins ; running board jump, Jackson, Bunnell, Carey, W. H., and Williams, A. T.; throwing the hammer, Bunnell, Davis, N. F., Lesher and Collins ; pole vault, Miller, Kauffman, Jackson and Collins; running high jump, Carey, W. H., and Williams, A. T.; 120 yards hurdle pace, Kauffman, Carey, W. H., Bunnell and Williams, A. T.; tennis tournament singles, Kunkle, Ware, Kauffman, Hughes, Purdy, Allen, Bush, Anderson, Wood, Williams, A. T., Rodgers, Reynolds, Jackson and Phillips, D.; mixed doubles, Miss Bartol and H. F. Smith, Miss Wolfe and Barclay Reynolds.

Little Hudsonius Sciurus was dead. Tenderly had Sinton watched over Huddie as he hovered between life and death. Lovingly had he cared for him during a long illness. The choicest bits of food and the daintiest crumbs that fell from the table were carried to him. No labor that would add to the comfort of his darling was irksome to the devoted godfather. And now little Huddie was dead—dead—dead. Tears, great big scalding tears, coursed down the proud guardian's cheek as he gazed upon little Huddie. All the bright hopes he had cherished for him were blasted forever. Life without his pet, his joy, would be a dreary waste, a Sahara of despair. Meanwhile some kind friends consoled the living, while others prepared the dead for burial. Rev. H. T. Colestock was asked to preach the funeral sermon and gladly agreed to do so. Messrs. Powell, Hanna and Macnab furnished the music, Walkinshaw had charge of the funeral arrangements, and Davis, Firth, Wood, Dillon, Crawford and Rogers acted as mourners. After the body had been consigned to the grave, the friends gathered at No. 29, West Wing, where an eloquent discourse upon the life and virtue of the deceased, was delivered by Mr. Colestock.

The following letter, written to Mrs. Larison, was read to the Literature class, while studying Holmes. The class of '85 were especially interested in Dr. Holmes and the result was a letter written by the "Autocrat" himself:

216 Beacon St., Boston, Mass.,
June 1st., 1885.

My Dear Mrs. Larison:—I hope nothing that I have written shortened your letter very much, for it is a very pleasant and a very welcome one. I have been ill for the past few weeks and am just in the convalescent state when a cordial and a tonic are what is most needed, and I find both in your kind letter. We never get tired of hearing that we have made new friends among strangers, who have never looked upon our faces. We can never be told too often that our words have found receptive readers; that our thoughts and feelings have met with a response from other minds and hearts. I am much pleased to be told of the attention your scholars propose paying to my writings. I wish they were worthier of it, but what I am, they are, and they could not be more without a change of personality. I am not quite equal to writing long letters and I hope you will accept these few words as coming from one who is Very truly and gratefully yours,

Oliver Wendell Holmes.

Please give my kind regards and best wishes to the class which has paid me the compliment of taking my writings as the subject of one of their literary exercises. I enclose a copy of a poem I read at a dinner given in honor of Dr. B. A. Gould, of which I had a few copies "struck off" for my friends.

Certainly, on Saturday, May 12, fortune smiled propitiously on legendary Blue Hill, "which has for many ages frowned upon the less imposing hills around," and the Phi Kappa Psis and their friends smiled too. Everything combined to make the day a success, the bright, warm sunshine, the delightful drive along country roads, fragrant with spring blossoms, and a whole afternoon at that enchanted spot of storied lore, where the "winds brought joyous music from the pines, and sang a chorus 'twixt the measured lines." Even had it not been the home of Nenaoma, one does not wonder that "Shikellimy pleaded to remain." The happy day is destined to live long among joyous Bucknell memories, and goes far toward making "that shore of rock and shade' one of the "dearest spots that nature ever made." Here one hears low murmurs floating on the air:—

"'Loved Shikellimy:'—say the waves that rise,
'Fair Nenaoma,' back the wind replies;
And so forever and forever more,
Their names shall live on Susquehanna's shore."

ACADEMIC NEWS.

[S. J. Clerkland, Correspondent.]

In Virgil class. Student—"Eloquar, an sileam?" Prof.—"You may go on."

At a recent meeting of the Y. M. C. A., Prof. Hulley gave a very interesting talk upon "The Bible as a book of life." The professor showed in many ways how the Bible deals with men. Those who heard the talk pronounced it grand, and wish they could have more of such talks. Prof. Hulley has consented to speak to the boys at some future date on "How to study the Bible."

The Main Hall boys were recently treated to a royal feast. When the bell had tolled the study hour into eternity they were called into Wilkes' and Sherman's room. There a pleasing sight met their gaze. The table groaned under the weight of good things. Cake, pineapples, lemonade and peanuts were a few of the delicacies. Mr. Wilkes was the generous donor. Wilkes, many thanks.

On Saturday, May 5, Messrs. Craig, Mitchell, Hobbins, Wilkes, Bowers, Davis, Koons, B. Bower, T. Bower, Gundy, Niles and Sherman, with Prof. Fisher as guide, set out to explore Dale's cave, situated about four miles from Bucknell. All were pleased with the visit, and found the cave more extensive than anticipated. Several large chambers were entered and inspected, which were reached by means of long ropes. Some fine specimens of stalactites were procured. The cave is characterized for its much mud, of which the boys brought a goodly share home on their clothing.

It was a beautiful day. The golden rays of the morning sun arrayed the campus and college hill in a scene of gorgeous splendor. It seemed as though nature was animated by a keen sense of expectancy.

Long before the sun reached the meridian of the heavens the two literary factions of the Academy stood upon the field of honor. The weapons used were not the glittering steel or thundering gun, but the mighty ball and bat. Soon the umpire gave the call to begin. The Herms. took the field with stately grace and measured tread. Each man was soon in his proper position, with set teeth and knit brows ready to grasp the flying sphere rebounding from the "oak."

It was a beautiful sight. The words of wisdom heard in chapel before the game were secreted in the bosom of each man. Victory was the inspiration that stirred every player to do his utmost; Honor set the faces aglow with enthusiasm; Good Will put speed into the feet, and Justice lent a double energy to the muscles.

The encouraging shouts and lusty cheers arising from the spectators were given in a good spirit. The game was characterized throughout with good nature, and if any antagonism was manifested it was done under an impulse of forgetfulness.

At the close of the game the victors gave long and joyful shouts, and after a general handshaking all around the boys dispersed, ready to do justice to a good dinner.

The game was the best seen on the campus this year. At different points in the game the score was tie.

Score was—Hermania 12; Adelphia 16.

Editorial.

THE recent flood delayed the last issue of THE MIRROR considerably, as the presses and in fact most of the printing establishment were under water. We deem this explanation sufficient to account for the tardiness of the last number.

THE first round of tennis singles has been played, and the interest quickens somewhat as we near the finals. The rain has interfered seriouely with the tournament, but by watching their chances between showers the players have accomplished something towards getting their sets played.

COMMENCEMENT NEWS this year will be edited by Mr. A. C. Lathrop and an able corps of assistants. It will be issued in four numbers and contain the addresses of the various speakers, reports of exercises, and the news of each day during commencement week. We trust that as heretofore it will receive the cordial support of the students and our visitors.

EXTENSIVE improvements in the bath-room of the gymnasium will be made during the summer. Overhead shower-baths will be put in; the present faulty heating apparatus replaced by an improved heater, and a 400 gallon water boiler added to the equipment. It is also in the plan to put in, at some future time, a lining of slate, which will greatly add to the appearance of the room, besides being more durable than the present lining.

ANOTHER commencement season with all its pleasures is upon us. Soon our campus and halls will be filled with former students and their friends. Old acquaintance will be renewed and memories of olden times will be revived. Especially is this true of class reunions, which have always formed an interesting part of the commencement programme. It is expected that the attendance this year will fully equal that of former years. As there will doubtless be many strangers here, our student should hold themselves in readiness to direct them to such parts of the University as they may desire to visit.

WE have tournaments, matches, or contests with almost every game played in college. Why not have a tournament in chess? At Lehigh there is a club of forty or fifty; Lafayette and State Colleges both have strong clubs, and other colleges right about us are forming them. A tourney could easily be arranged to take place near the latter part of the fall term, which would give all ample time for preparation. The annual contest played in New York between Yale, Harvard, Princeton and Columbia is full of interest and attracts many favorable comments from the metropolitan press. A tourney between some of the colleges of our own state would not be without interest and profit. We would like to see early action taken towards such an end, that chess may be recognized as a game worthy of inter-collegiate contests.

THE course of lectures provided by the University during the past year has been both interesting and instructive. We are glad to note that a large number of students attended the lectures regularly. For next year another interesting course has been planned, the particulars of which are given in another column. Each student should make these lectures a part of his regular work, and attend them as faithfully as he would recitations. In this way he will obtain the greatest good from them, and encourage the University authorities to increase the list of speakers.

IT IS rumored that the prospects for a good football team for next season are quite fair. While it is not yet safe to calculate very closely on the incoming men, the next Freshman class will probably contain some who, with those remaining, should constitute a good team. We will lose some of the best men, however, and it will be well to keep this fact in mind in training for the work of next season. Those intending to play should return early in the fall term and get in condition to play as soon as possible. This calls to mind the necessity of electing a captain before the term closes. It is to be hoped that this will not be delayed, as failure to do it this term may result in a serious crippling of the team next season.

WITH this issue the present Board rises from the editorial chair and resigns its pen to the new Board of next term. The work has not been without its pleasant features, and tho beyond doubt we have erred at times, our friends have been patient and lenient. From our contemporaries we have received the kindest treatment, and we can safely say that we have acted in the same honest spirit toward them.

A year's progress! What does it mean? For THE MIRROR it means a great advance. The change from monthly to semi-monthly issues was a rather hazardous experiment in this year of financial crises, and it was at first doubtful whether our journal would stand the strain. But the change proved eminently successful. To the readers the news has been fresher; and financially, under judicious management, the paper has held its own. We trust, too, that some advance has been made in the literary matter. But that is something of which our patrons can best judge, whom we desire to thank for their kind and hearty support.

Literary.

A RAINY DAY'S EXPERIENCE.

Some of the old-time almanacs picture Winter, jealous of the upstart Spring, laying an icy hand upon her lightly clad form, and whirling her hither and thither with blasts from the ever frozen seas. There are other pictures which represent him blowing from his lips blinding clouds of snow, while spring drenches him with rain.

Both pictures well describe the day of my mortifying experience. The night before a blizzard had struck the Metropolis. All night it snowed, a wild, fierce storm, and by morning the ground was covered with three feet of snow. Then came one of those sudden changes which make the seasons seem envious of one another. The snow changed to rain, accompanied by a hurricane of wind.

When I left home that morning, it was with no premonition of what the day had in store for me. Only the day before I had purchased a "perfect love" of a mid-season hat, delicately shaded and daintily trimmed with violets. I hesitated long about wearing it. The whole family advised against it, but at last, from some contrary impulse, I put it on, and bade defiance to the unpropitious elements.

The streets were almost as impassable as if the bay had inundated the island. At every corner boys and girls, even men and women, were doing a thriving business with temporary bridges of boards or stepping stones of boot-blacking kits. An old German and his wife had constructed one of these gutter bridges, and woe betide the unwary one who refused the toll they asked, for they pushed him with small ceremony knee deep into the water and slush below.

I had nearly reached the office, and was feeling comfortable and well satisfied with myself and my new hat, when, without warning, a vicious gust of wind lifted my umbrella like a feather, and carried it I knew not whither. I looked up and down the avenue, but it had disappeared as mysteriously as Aladdin's palace. It was a borrowed umbrella, too. The rain beat pitilessly on the new hat. Vanity of vanities! Why had my common sense forsaken me that morning? But it was not a time then to reflect and regret. The wind played hide-and-seek in my hair, and the rain drenched me from head to foot. People looked strangely at me, I thought, but I explained that by the singularity of being without an umbrella in such a storm.

An involuntary movement revealed to my horror that I was hatless. Can you imagine my chagrin, my despair, at the discovery? To go back home hatless, to face curious looks and amused smiles on the street and in the elevated — I could not. But I knew if I should go on, my shorn condition would excite the disrespectful allusions of the office boys for months to come.

In my distress I became conscious of a great commotion in the road. The "down stage" driver was cursing and shouting hoarsely for some one to "take that thing out of the road." The horses reared and plunged, and the one occupant of the stage, a lady, was mingling her cries with the curses of the driver and the shrieking of the wind. "That thing" was my umbrella. It stood upright in the snow, its cover torn to shreds, waving its skeleton arms like a demented thing. A small black boy darted after it, and brought it to me with a comical grin, and a "Say, Missus, does yer want it?" Just then a gentleman stepped up with the remains of my hat—a many sided figure drenched in mud. I wiped it off hastily as best I could and started for home. People looked at me; and well they might. My hat was dissolving. The mud, the purple from those violets which had been my pride, and the green leaves, all flowed harmoniously together, or raced each other in rivulets down my cheeks.

Shall I ever forget the ride home? The stations dragged by, 18th street, 23d, 33d,—each adding its quota of amused eyes—would they never, never pass! I tried to be unconscious of such remarks as—"Streaky weather, this!" "Wonder did she get that hat at Rothchild's?" "Plenty of color in her cheeks!" etc. Whether there was any one on that train who knew me, I do not know; neither do I know whether I met any one in my walk home. I looked neither to the right nor left until I reached the refuge of home. Never did I feel, if I did not sing it, "Home, Sweet Home," so deeply. My umbrella gone, my hat disgraced, drenched with the rain and buffeted with the wind—what did it all matter now that I was safe from the hundreds of eyes, laughing, mocking eyes!

Thus ended my "rainy day's experience."

POPE AS A POET.

It is profitable to study the lives of great men. We can see wherein they have made their impress upon the world. We can determine the causes that operated upon them to mould their characters. All the good influences that were brought to bear upon the man whose life we are studying, can be sought by us, and the evil ones avoided.

There is something, of course, in influence, but every phase of it has been harped upon so much until it has become almost threadbare. But there is, in reality, a certain amount of good to be derived from the association of eminent men. While this is true, yet it is not our fortune, generally, to have the privilege of associating with the men to whom the world pays its homage.

Then, again, the world has not known many illustrious men. Every age does not produce them; hence it is impossible to meet them otherwise than upon the printed page.

Every man has some excellent things in his works and also some things that are depreciative of him. One of the defects of Pope's poetry is that it is unsympathetic, and devoid of pathos. Pope, himself, did not seem to have a magnanimous heart, and in truth, he could not sympathize with men. Poetry in its highest type must possess that characteristic which will touch men's hearts. The reader must feel the inspiration, to some extent, which the writer had, as a rule. We fail to get this from Pope's poetry.

Good poetry should also possess that element which appeals to the imagination. All the great poems of the world have this element, more or less. "Milton's Paradise Lost," "Virgil's Aeneid" and "Homer's Odyssey" have this in a high degree. But the poetry of Pope, for the most part, is composed of current ideas arranged attractively in verse. For instance, what do we find in his "Essay on Criticism" that is new? The essence of nearly every argument is what we have heard many a time put in an elegant poem.

Then, again, Pope's philosophy is not true. Some say that it is not his, but that it is simply borrowed or plagiarized. He has acknowledged it to be orthodoxical by the fact that he has used it as "law and gospel." The oft quoted verse, is not true. There is, perhaps, some truth in the former verse, but the latter is not at all correct. If a man cannot "drink deep," cannot get a good education, cannot attend colleges, universities or higher institutions of learning, according to Pope's philosophy, he should not endeavor to get all the education he can, whether it be little or much.

> "A little learning is a dangerous thing, > Drink deep or taste not the Pierian Spring."

Pope, again, says that the man who criticises literature should be the person who writes best. But the fact is, that very rarely do we find an excellent writer a good critic, or a renowned critic a fluent writer, consequently general observation and history seem to be against Pope in this direction.

Pope also thought that the ancient models were infallible in style and sentiment. He placed them too high and undervalued the writers of later times. Pope's works contain many such errors as these.

But Pope's works have some excellent qualities. In some respects he ranks high as an author. The first quality of his, revealed in his works, is the ability to use the English language. It seems to me that no writer has surpassed Pope in this respect. Give him the thought, and he could express it as well as any other writer.

Pope could express his thoughts in an impressive manner. How many current sayings of today do we get from Pope! While he was not a deep thinker, yet he could so handle the English language and mould it into such a form that he has left his influence upon the literary world.

Pope has the ability in a high degree to make his style conform to the thought that he was presenting. If he were writing upon some deep, laborious thought, his style would be heavy and slow. On the other hand, if his thoughts were light and trifling, his style would correspond. A good illustration may be found in the following four lines:—

> "When Ajax strives some rock's vast weight to throw,
> The line too, labors and the words move slow;
> Not so when swift Camilla scours the plain,
> Flies o'er the unbending corn and skims along the main."

The former two lines are very different in thought and style from the latter two. The former must be read slowly, while the latter flow along smoothly and can be pronounced quickly. Pope has the ability to make the sense and sound harmonize in a greater degree than any other author whose works I have read.

An author's writings are affected by his physical constitution, his time and his surroundings. These influences have had something to do with the character of Pope's works. He was an invalid. His life was a continual struggle from the beginning to the end. Pope also lived in a superficial age. The pendulum had swung from the restrictions of Puritanism to the revelry of socialism. It was an age of show and vanity. Again, Pope never seems to have had any real experience with men further than the fact that he came in contact with them in the drawing room and in society. This is evident from his writings. What a difference there is between him and the nature-loving and close observing Wordsworth! These influences, viz: his constitution, his age and surroundings have materially affected Pope's works.

Athletics.

The Athletic Association expects Jennings back next year to play center on the football team.

Iron bars instead of wire screening will be used in the baseball cage, now in course of construction in the gymnasium.

The Athletic Association, with the aid of the institution, has decided to construct a running track which will be completed before September 1.

Dr. Loomis has lately become the owner of a fine Columbia bicycle which he rides very gracefully. No one bears witness of his first lessons.

June 2, Bloomsburg Normal played a victorious game of baseball with our boys. Only six innings were played on account of the rain. Our defeat was due to lack of practice. Score—Bloomsburg 10, Bucknell 3.

Owing to an error on some one's part, the score of the Freshman–Sophomore game was given in last issue incorrectly. The right score was Sophomore 18, Freshman 19.

Formerly at Bucknell only one man trained faithfully for field day. We feel that there is a decided increase in the field sports when we say that twelve men have trained this year with no less faithfulness than the one of previous years. Davis and Brick have both broken the record in throwing the hammer, by more than ten feet.

The Bucknell Chess and Checker Club accepted a challenge some weeks ago to play a limited number of games with the club at Factoryville, Pa. Cregar and Waid represent the club in chess and have been playing two simultaneous correspondent games. They have just checkmated their opponents in game one, and still have hopes in the other. Brick represents the club in checkers. Two games have been played, one resulting in favor of Factoryville, the other being a draw.

Commencement.

The college Senior class will make things lively when it holds class day exercises.

Former students and alumni desiring Bucknell pins can get them of Mr. W. B. Sheddan.

L'Agenda this year will likely be a commencement feature, as its publication was delayed by the flood.

The Seniors on graduating day will wear the conventional silk cap and gown. They look real scholastic.

Rev. E. M. Brawley, D. D., '75, will deliver the oration before the Alumni Association next commencement.

Reitmyer orchestra will furnish music for the College Seniors, the University band and orchestra will play for the other events on the program.

Card orders giving special railroad rates to commencement, and information concerning boarding, trains and hotels can be had by addressing the Registrar of the University.

The chiefship of the Commencement News has fallen into the care of that efficient news hustler of the Senior class, Mr. A. C. Lathrop. Mr. J. B. Suiter will look after the finances and the publications.

The annual banquet of the Pittsburg Alumni Association was held on the evening of June 4, at the St. Charles Hotel, Pittsburg. A full report will appear in the first number of the Commencement Daily News.

Room No. 2, College building, will be used as a general waiting and reception room during commencement. A registration book, writing, mailing and messenger service will be among the features of this room.

The corporation dinner, as usual, will be served by the ladies of the First Baptist church, of Lewisburg. The menu will be a novelty this year, and will far excel the very excellent dinners served by the ladies in the past.

Cortland Meyer, the noted lecturer, will deliver the annual address before the Literary Societies. His subject will be a popular one, and his address will at the same time retain the great literary merit for which his public utterances are noted.

Every commencement visitor should buy the Commencement News, and subscribe for a year to the MIRROR, besides buying copies of L'Agenda, thereby making the hearts of the respective managers of these representative publications happy.

The College fraternities will hold their annual symposium at the customary time. Phi Kappa Psi will hold forth at the Baker House, Sigma Alpha Epsilon at the Cameron House, Sigma Chi in the Iron Front Block and Phi Gamma Delta at the Haag Hotel, Milton.

Of course the Spectator will visit Lewisburg again, and will have some interesting things for the readers of the News. The four issues will be mailed to any address for 15 cents. Single copies 5 cents each. All interested in the commencement at Bucknell should send in their subscriptions immediately to J. B. Suiter, Manager.

The eighth volume of the Daily Commencement News will be published during commencement week. It will be ably edited, and will contain all of interest that transpires during commencement. The class of '94 is the largest in the history of Old Bucknell. The commencement promises to be one of the largest and most interesting ever held here. There is no reason why the Commencement News this year should not be better than ever before. The News will contain stenographic reports of the "Baccalaureate Sermon," "Oration before the Literary Societies," "Oration before the College Alumni," and other leading discourses.

The following lecturers have been booked thus far for the Monday evening free lecture course next year, conducted by the University: George M. Phillips, Ph. D., principal of the West Chester State Normal School; W. W. Keen, M. D., LL. D., of the Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia; George N. McCain, of the Philadelphia Press; Hon. Rudolph Blankenburg, of Philadelphia; Prof. Sommerville, of the University of Pennsylvania, and Dr. Sommerville, of Philadelphia. The only lecturer in the pay course thus far engaged is Rev. Anna Shaw, M. D. There will be twelve lectures in the free course and three in the pay course, besides several concerts.

Local.

Mr. Gretzinger made a memorial day address at Mifflinburg, Pa.

Mr. H. L. Fassett, '94, expects to take a post-graduate course at Cornell.

Mr. J. Brown Martin was initiated into Sigma Alpha Epsilon on May 29th.

Messrs. Harvey, Ware and Fisk spoke at the Christian Endeavor meeting at Hartleton, May 19.

Col. Thos. Chamberlain, a former graduate of Bucknell, spoke in the opera house in town on May 30.

Force of habit illustrated—Nelson watching for chickens on the big barn yard that drifted down in the flood.

Allen, '95, served as court reporter during the forced absence of the regular reporter on account of the flood.

Mr. F. O. Schub, '94, will teach Greek and German at the Sharon summer school. He will begin work on June 17.

Lewis was shrewd enough to exchange pulpits with Barner on Sunday, May 29. Barner was detained several days by the flood.

The Bucknell Prohibition club was represented by E. C. Kunkle in the State Inter-collegiate contest at Williamsport opera house June 5.

A little red squirrel has been made appropriately the namesake of W. H. Parker. A lady friend in town calls them both "Willie."

The Commencement News will contain the only complete and authentic report of all the proceedings, meetings and events of commencement week.

P. B. Cregar, '95, has issued a challenge to play a series of five games of chess with any man in the State. N. F. Davis and B. K. Brick are his backers.

Prof. of German—"Mr. J——, you may read the next two sentences." Mr. J. reads, "Have you any tobacco? Yes, I bought some this morning."

The excellence of the music rendered at the Junior exhibition in oratory was largely due to the skill and experience of the leader, Mr. F. I. Sigmund.

The gravity of the faculty during prayers has been severely strained on several occasions by so insignificant an animal as a curtailed dog.

Graduation is too much for Deppen. Lewisburg cannot contain him and we fear for Herndon. All that psychology and theism will certainly appall the natives.

The annual Band and Orchestra picnic was held at the "Marsh," May 10. Despite several immersions and sprinklings it was pronounced a delightful affair by all.

Reno mourns the loss of at least two tender epistles supposed to be in the mail that was lost in the flood. Unfortunately the postal department can make no amends in such cases.

Vastine recently undertook to walk to Sunbury—three ties at a stride, but grew weary after a mile or two, and paced back along the railroad reflecting on the trials of life.

The missionaries to Chillisquaque were not deterred by the removal of the bridge, but crossed the flood, on the 27th, in a row boat. Stephens and Meeker are a good pair at the oars.

Lesher acted as host at his home near Northumberland for a party of sight-seers from the College and Academy. They all pronounce John a man of large heart and full cellar.

We dislike to encroach upon the athletic department of our paper, but when it is a matter of practicing the shot-put in our halls during study hours we must in this way acknowledge our gratitude for the entertainment.

A combat of very doubtful issue, between Marts and Vastine, was happily averted by other Seniors more prudent, who wished the class to graduate entire. "Let not your angry passions rise."

The Class Poem and Prophecy of the Class of '94, the Poem before the Alumni, and Oration at Reunion of the Class of '84, will furnish part of the valuable reading in the Commencement News.

Phi Kappa Psi gave a reception on the evening of Decoration Day to their Alumni, in Chapter Hall. In spite of the inclemency of the weather the evening was in every way a success.

Sunbury was the scene of much eating and drinking after the flood. Cold water was abundant, and Bucknell sent a great delegation who enjoyed it immensely, but classes were thinner the next day.

Mr. A. T. Williams recently visited Huntingdon to pitch in a game of baseball against the Altoona cricket club. His success was very creditable as his pitching was batted only three times, and only one run was made against him.

For sometime after the "flood" the library was not open during the evening. But why a person could study in his room without a lamp until nearly eight o'olock, and not be able to read in the library without gas light at 6:30 is inexplicable.

We are told that Guie's musical talent will no more entertain the peaceful sleepers of East Wing. A change of occupation will prevent his attendance here next year. Brown must practice his throat more faithfully if he wishes to fill the place of the departing Freshman.

The meeting of the Chemical and Physical Society for June 7, was devoted to the subject of Aerial Navigation. Short talks were given by H. S. Schuyler and Prof W. G. Owens. Arrangements were made at this meeting for the annual reception during commencement week.

On June 4 General Lewis Merrill, of Philadelphia, delivered an address in Bucknell Hall, on Indian fighting in the far west. General Merrill is well known in Lewisburg as a former student at the University. He has been awarded a gold medal for acts of conspicuous bravery on the frontier, and a bill was recently introduced in Congress to give him the title of Brevet Brigadier for meritorious service in the late Indian war.

Bofore this MIRROR greets its readers, '93's L'Agenda, with its elephantine humor, will have pleased some and wearied others. The business management has been under the very efficient charge of Messrs. Jackson and Simpson, who will be pleased to furnish copies of L'Agenda at 75 cents apiece.

It is an old saying that a tree is known by its fruit. As soon as the exercises of the Junior oratorical contest were over, yell after yell rang through the Hall. Even if the room had been dark it would have been an easy matter to locate the source of the sounds. Freshmen must make themselves heard.

Evidently they were members of the class in oratory. They were discussing the subject of degrees of gratitude. Said Crawford, "Supose one man gave you five cents and another man gave you five hundred dollars, wouldn't you feel more grateful to the latter than to the former?" "No," replied Phillips, "I wouldn't feel more grateful, perhaps less?"

On Thursday evening, May 17, an interesting Demorest prize contest in declamation, under the auspices of the College Prohibition Club was held in Bucknell Hall. The prize, a beautiful silver medal, was awarded Mr. S. J. Cleeland. Those who took part were: Misses Alice Hartley, Emily Williams and Mary Williamson, and Messrs. H. E. Dutton, S. J. Cleeland, E. C. Kunkle and S. R. Wood.

The flood gave some of our sailors a chance to take a row. Anything that would float was pressed into service. No serious casualties are reported on account of this suddenly awakened enthusiasm for the sea. However, Messrs. E. A. Bush and A. T. Williams were so unfortunate as to upset in about five feet of water. As both of them are more than five feet tall a rescuing party was not needed.

The Senior banquet was held on May 29 at the Baker House. After an elaborate menu, the program provided for the following toasts: "History of '94," by R. J. Davis; "Girls of '94," by W. S. Marts; "Alma Mater," by J. R. Wood; "The Faculty," by A. F. Anderson; "Future of '94," by Miss Guthrie. Mr. H. F. Smith was toastmaster, and carried out the program successfully. Three songs were rendered by the class.

She was a Seminary girl; he was a Sophomore. Like the wise men in Mother Goose they put to sea. Instead of a tub they used a boardwalk. Lightly over the silvery waves sped their frail craft. "O, how happy I am," she said, again and again. "My heart is all a flutter," he answered just as often. But, alas! their joy was suddenly brought to an end, and Walkinshaw had the rare privilege of rescuing a maiden from the cruel waves.

It all happened in the laboratory. Just why they quarreled is a riddle hard to guess. He said it was her fault. She declared that he was to blame. For a few minutes things were lively in their quarter. At one time it looked as if they might come to blows. The other chemists thought it immensely interesting. She was undoubtedly ahead as far as talking went. Finally, acting upon the advice of his friends, Brown held out the olive branch of peace, which she reluctantly accepted. At present everything is profoundly tranquil in their corner of the room.

SEMINARY ITEMS.

The number of bicycle riders has been increased to seven.

Miss Mary Wilson was "at home" to the Faculty and Senior class on Saturday June 3.

The engagement of Miss Carrie Lovell '89, to Mr. Charles Campbell, of Topeka, Kansas, has been announced.

The April number of the Wellesly Magazine contains a story—"Gregorio"—written by Miss Maude R. Kellar, who prepared at Bucknell.

Of all ideal places for a day's outing Shikellimy with its rugged beauty and poetic association, is the most charming. The Phi Gamma Deltas recognized this fact, and with a number of their friends spent a most delightful day there, on Saturday, May 26. At first Dame Nature seemed not to favor the expedition, but ere the day was over she smiled kindly on her happy children.

With the exception of the removal of boardwalks, but little damage was occasioned at the Institute by the recent flood. The lower end of the campus was transformed into a veritable lake, or "Gitchee Gumee, Big Sea-water," as named by the girls. Canoes and picturesque rafts were manœuvred around the oak trees as if the swift waters of "Squaw" creek had become their native element.

When upon pleasure bent, the trifling matter of rain in nowise intimidates the doughty maids of Bucknell. Therefore they appeared in full force at Dr. Aviragnet's annual picnic, given at the Marsh Chapel, two days before the flood of '94. You see the girls know when the generous doctor invites his friends, the word "entertainment" is no misnomer; it means entertainment in the fullest sense of the word; so they determined not to miss an opportunity for having a "good time" on account of unpropitious weather. First in the festivities was the walk to the "bridge," THEN intact, but NOW may-hap the center spans are drifting on the broad Atlantic; but why wander to the distant sea when we are on our way to a picnic? After the walk came the jolly straw-ride, then dinner. Well, we will say, in the words of the genial Rambler, (who, alas! rambles no more in the National Baptist) "that WAS a dinner!" No discounting that chicken and etceteras. Then came the boat race on the "raging canawl;" under the friendly shelter of umbrellas we watched the brawny muscles of Bucknell's best men row along the given goal, a clumsy boat laden with graceful freight. Do you want to know who won and who lost? ALL the contestants won, for best endeavors, the prize of a satisfied conscience. The happy ringing voices of young men and maidens joining in glad chorus, the delicious supper, the home coming in the misty deepening twilight,—all have their place in the precious memories of school life at Bucknell.

ACADEMIC NEWS.

[S. J. CLEELAND, Correspondent.]

The Fourth Formers are getting ready for commencement.

Prof—"Will you tell me what tense that verb is in, please?"

Student—"Oh, the what you may callum tense."

The Academy Y. M. C. A. is making preparations for aggressive work at the opening of the fall term. A committee on fall campaign has been appointed, and plans are being formulated to make the Association felt in the life of the school.

In the last issue of the MIRROR the picture of the football team appeared. As has been herebefore mentioned, the team has done some fine work and, with a few changes, will take the field next season ready to hold up the Cad in this line of athletics.

The Academy B. B. team, altho not having any games with teams outside of school, nevertheless shows good signs of capability, and will supply the 'Varsity team with good men in time to come. The manager expects to play several games before the season closes. At present the aid of all is needed in a pecuniary manner.

The Y. M. C. A. meeting of Tuesday evening, May 29, was one of special interest. The meeting was conducted by Edward Flint in a very interesting manner. Several instructive papers were read by Kulp, Cleeland, Giffen and Meeker on various phases of missionary life. All those present received a new inspiration for the advancement of the missionary cause and the spreading of the Gospel in general. Services of this kind are very useful in keeping the boys posted as to what our missionaries are doing in the "dark lands."

Personal.

'66. E. H. Painter is a successful lawyer at Chehalis, Washington, and Alonzo Hull, '67, is in the real estate business at Seattle.

'67. Chaplain J. J. Kane, of the U. S. navy, who graduated from the Theological department of the University in 1867, is the author of a very fascinating story, entitled "Miriam vs. Milton, or the Mystery of Everdale Lake."

Ex. '—. Nelson A. Mowton is editor of the Daily News of Brockton, Mass.

'77. Rev. Calvin A. Hare, of McKeesport, Pa., has just finished a three years' pastorate at that place. Besides the withdrawal of over 100 members, for the purpose of forming a new church, there is still room for rejoicing on his part.

'88. Prof. H. M. Kelly, of Northwestern University, Evanston, Ill., has accepted a professorship in Cornell College, Iowa.

'89. W. C. Gretzinger, our hustling Registrar, delivered a glowing address before Foster

Post, G. A. R,, of Mifflinburg, on the evening of Memorial Day.

Ex. '92. Rev. G. Fred Love, of Rochester, N. Y., is creating quite a stir by advocating individual chalices in communion service. This has become quite a popular service of late.

Ex. '93. H. W. Sneck, Esq., of Rochester, N. Y., has recently taken a stand on a point of law in regard to Building and Loan Associations. By his interpretation the individual shareholders are benefitted.

'93. Rev. E. C. Pauling sailed on June 4 for Corea, where he will take up missionary work.

Ex. '95.—E. M. Greene is a member of the tanning firm of Leas, McVitty & Co.

College News.

The present Freshman class of Dickinson College numbers 64.

The members of Greek Letter fraternities in colleges number 77,000.

The University of Chicago has twenty-one John Hopkins' men on its faculty.

A school of Electrical Engineering is about to be established in the University of West Virginia.

The baseball team of Hamilton College made a successful eastern trip, winning four games out of seven.

The baseball team of Lafayette, on its southern tour, played five games with southern universities, and won two out of five.

In the tennis tournament between Miami and Wittenberg colleges, Miami won the doubles while the singles were captured by Wittenberg.

Prof. E. H. Cook, the first Principal of West Chester State Normal, has retired from teaching and is now engaged in the insurance business.

The "mortar board" and gown, like the "star of empire," have taken their westward way as far as Ann Arbor, the Senior class of Michigan University having decided to adopt them.

The Inter-state Oratorical contest was held in Indianapolis on May 10. The first prize was awarded to C. F. Wishart, of Monmouth College, Illinois. The title of his oration was the Policy of Richelieu.

Princeton awards a scholarship of $1,500 for excellence in Latin and Greek. This is the largest scholarship given by any American college.

The registration this year at Cornell University shows an even 1,800 students, the eighteen hundredth student having entered about six weeks ago. Somewhat over two hundred of the number are women.

The high schools of Denver, Col., are reported to have a larger enrollment for the size of the city than any similar schools in the country. The proportion of young men and women in the schools is as four to five.

The Senior class at Brown has petitioned the faculty to excuse its members from examinations in studies in which they have reached a standing of eighty-five per cent. during the term. The request is likely to be granted.

A collection of seventeen fac similes of Greek statuettes in terra cotta, the originals of which are in the Hermitage, St. Petersberg, and other leading collections of Europe, have been presented to the archæological department of Cornell by Mrs. Andrew D. White.

At the Rutgers College Preparatory School the headmaster, Dr. E. R. Payson, is delivering a course of lectures to the Senior class on pedagogy, and requires the pupils to inspect the public schools of New Brunswick and report in writing on the methods of teaching pursued and the system of ventilation and light.

BOOK REVIEW.

Sir Francis Bacon's Cipher Story, Discovered and Deciphered by Orville W. Owen, M. D., is published by the Howard Publishing Co., of Chicago. Two volumes are at press in print. The first contains 200 pp, paper bound. Price, 50 cents. It is divided into three parts: Sir Francis Bacon's Letter to the Decipherer; The Epistle Dedicatory, and the Description of the Queen, General Curse, and Sir Francis Bacon's Life.

The aim of the Cipher Story is to prove Sir Francis Bacon the real author of the socalled Shakespearian works. If Bacon did not write the Cipher Story, Owen did, and he should have the credit. The Cipher is at all events a very ingenious story, a marvel in its literary merits. Four great keywords are disclosed in the Cipher to guide the decipherer, Fortune, Nature, Honor and Reputation. Whether or not the Cipher is an ingenious contrivance of its author as some claim, remains to be seen.

Editorial.

THE CUSTOMARY greetings and stereotyped expressions of self-esteem and ambition will be looked for from our Board as from those of the previous thirteen years. However, we make but one boast and express but one of our many hopes. Our boast is that we, as a Board, have a determination to make this volume of THE MIRROR, the best that the college has ever seen. Our hope is in Bucknell's recent increment of cash and intelligence through the class of '98. Our one boast will hardly be rebuked, our one hope will hardly be disappointed. Both may be justified by prompt contributions from pen and purse.

THOSE WHO attended the vocal recital on September 25, are all congratulatory on its success. The capacity of the department for vocal instruction is unquestioned; and the acquirement of such exceptional vocal talent has increased the interest in musical affairs. A great many friends from town were present at the recital and have promised a continuing interest in the musical proceedings connected with the University. It is certain that many will avail themselves of the opportunities now offered and that the number of students will be even greater next year. An added feature, in this connection, is Prof. Aviragnet's singing class, recently organized and open to all. The department of Instrumental Music is in the same excellent condition as last year.

IN THE athletic standing of the school there is much room for improvement. The results on Field Day were not disappointing, under the conditions that existed. But until we have a good running track we can never hope to reach the high rank which might be ours. In the ball games we have no such convenient excuse; and the fact that we did not last year meet with reasonable success shows a want of interest, a weakness of spirit that is quite in contrast with the tone of the college life in general, and which is destructive of all hope for athletic honors. We begin this year under favorable conditions—plenty of good football material—plenty of good advice from those who cannot play, and, fortunately, a wholesome disgust at some of the results on the other field last spring. The sympathy shown by many members of the faculty should be an additional encouragement to the work this season.

STILL MORE congratulations! Congratulations are always readable. The condition of the college Y. M. C. A. is especially gratifying and promises good results for the coming winter. The Bible study—so often attempted before—is now under perfect organization, and the classes are in a flourishing condition. The different leaders spent a part of the summer at Northfield and have come back with a full preparation for the work. The plan is to offer a progressive course covering the four college years and arranged under the four heads: the Life of Christ; the Parables and Miracles; Studies in Acts; McConaughy's "Christ Among Men." At present the last study is offered as an alternate for members of any class. An intense and widespread interest in Bible study has been remarked among the students in other colleges and we are glad to see such an interest awakened in Bucknell. The studies will increase the efficiency of the Association workers, and cannot fail to be of intellectual benefit to all who pursue them.

NOW IS THE time to apply the many suggestions for the improvement of our literary column. The use of short stories written by the students has often been advised and would no doubt be of great value. The Student must, of course, be represented; and this may be done by occasional well-selected essays. But the exclusive use of such productions fails to represent completely the abilities of the contributors, and most certainly fails to make a readable journal. Simply to reproduce essays that have been required by the curriculum argues a lazy spirit in the college at large. The editors are giving their labor gratuitously and without any credit on their studies for the time devoted. It seems as if others also should occasionally devote extra time—which is by no means wasted—to the improvement of their paper. If such effort were general, it is sure that a great change would be seen in the regular literary work of the college. How often our essays are criticized as either heavy or stilted. These faults would be largely corrected by practicing story writing. A smooth, readable style is acceptable in either an essay or oration.

AN ITEM in the Philadelphia Times last week illustrates one of the most contemptible uses to which journalism can be put. One of Bucknell's students was mentioned as having "mysteriously disappeared Sunday night." It is true that the student named left town at that time, without finding it necessary to publish his proposed destination. Such an event is of frequent occurrence among our students and seems hardly a worthy subject for the literary efforts of the Philadelphia Times. But, further than this, there were insinuations of crime or violence, and direct falsehoods as to searching parties from the college. This certainly exceeds the bounds of legitimate fun. Our students, with some exceptions, understood the whole thing to be an attempt at a joke; but not so could readers at large. We may picture the anxiety and distress when such an item should be seen at the home or by the friends of the one in question. If the notice was written or suggested by anyone in college, it shows a spirit which deserves and has received almost universal condemnation among the students. The daily papers might help to secure their questionable reputations by refusing to publish news except as received from authoritative sources.

LIFE'S MUTATIONS.

A boy on his vacation went
  To regions cool and shady;
By woodland stream he pitched his tent,
  Great show of fishing made he.

A girl her summer outing took
  Down by the dashing ocean,
In certain quiet little nook
  Just suited to her notion.

Yet, strange to say, that girl and boy,
  In their month apiece's vacation
Took very, very little joy,—
  Got small exhilaration.

The boy among the pines repined,
  The girl sighed by the seaside.
"O, were she only here!" he whined,
  While "All is lonely!" she cried.

When reunited were the pair
  Who'd suffered separation,
They vowed henceforth through life to share
  Both work and recreation.
(But changed their minds, most likely, ere Came 'round their next vacation).

THE CHARACTER OF ORLANDO IN "AS YOU LIKE IT."

The usual conception of the character of Orlando, in "As You Like It," is that he is lacking in energy, uninteresting and without personality. In "Sesame and Lilies," Ruskin makes this comment: "Orlando no less noble, is yet the despairing toy of chance, followed, comforted, saved by Rosalind." Andrew Lang says, in Harper's Magazine: "We find it difficult to see Orlando with the eyes of Rosalind. He comes, he looks, he conquers, as in Cæsar's 'thrasonical brag,' 'more than his enemies,' and we acquiesce rather than sympathize. Like Scott's young heroes, as described by Thackeray, Orlando is decidedly "not too clever."

It is the purpose of this essay to show that this opinion is unjust, and to determine to what extent circumstance and environment may be held accountable for these seeming deficiencies in Orlando's character.

The play itself is not characterized by bold action, daring attempts or deep plots. It is not intended to represent the "hurly-burly" of life, and it is more or less idyllic and pastoral. The main part of the play is laid in the forest of Arden, where they fleet the time carelessly as was done in the golden world. Here no important action takes place. Orlando, to be sure, kills a lion, but that deed is subordinated to the meeting and reconciliation of the two brothers. In fact, throughout the entire scene in the forest, action is secondary, while conversation is primary. Character, in this rural spot, is indicated by speech, not by deed. The men we find here are Duke Senior, Jacques, Touchstone—men who had seen the world and acquired experience before coming to this place where they felt not "the penalty of Adam."

In these circumstances Orlando is placed early in the play; amid such conditions he is to display his character. If he, then, contrasts unfavorably with these retired men of the world, should we judge him harshly? Clearly it is necessary to consider the tendencies of his character before he encountered this hindrance to his development in the play. We must judge him by his conduct in action, and to do this we must return to the opening, introductory scenes.

Supported by his older brother under Adam's care, Orlando grew up, a tall manly youth. Uncontaminated by court life, as his brother had been, he developed, early, those primary virtues which, later, compelled Oliver to say to himself: "Yet he's gentle, never schooled and yet learned, full of noble device, of all sorts enchantingly beloved, and indeed so much in the hearts of the world, and especially of my own people, who best know him, that I am altogether misprised."

On coming to manhood, Orlando's pride is aroused by hearing Adam recount his father's deeds, and perhaps the fact that he resembled his father physically spurred him on to be like him in other respects. When the play opens, we are immediately acquainted with the relations between Orlando, Adam and Oliver. "As I remember," says Orlando, "it was upon this fashion bequeathed me by will but poor a thousand crowns, and, as thou sayest, charged my brother, on his blessing, to breed me well; and there begins my sadness. He lets me feed with his hinds, bars me the place of brother, and, as much as in him lies, mines my gentility with my education. This it is, Adam, that grieves me; and the spirit of my father, which I think is within me, begins to mutiny against this servitude. I will no longer endure it, though yet I know no wise remedy how to avoid it." Orlando understood his neglected condition; he was aware that his education was not in accordance with his nobility.

Whether "wise" or not, a remedy soon presented itself. The duke's wrestler had challenged all-comers to a wrestling match, and Orlando, confident in his strength, hoped by winning the contest to gain friends at court by whose aid he might shake off this servitude and make an opening for further progress.

In this scene we find Orlando asserting his rights and not, as usual, quailing before his brother. Oliver was surprised and angered by Orlando's boldness and says to himself: "Begin you to grow upon me? I'll physic your rankness, and yet give no thousand crowns neither." So he urges the duke's wrestler not to fail to end Orlando's career when the wrestling match occurs. His instructions to Charles gives us a glimpse of Orlando as the people saw him, although it is colored by Oliver's jealousy: "I tell thee Charles, it is the stubbornest young fellow in France, full of ambition, an envious emulator of every man's good parts, a secret and villainous contriver against me his natural brother." This speech does not argue lack of energy on Orlando's part. He must have had an aggressive personality to arouse such a fear in his brother.

In the wrestling scene, Orlando reminds us strongly of Sir Walter Raleigh. Both were gentle, greatly beloved, never schooled, yet learned, modest, gracious and winning in manner. After his gallant fight in Ireland on the queen's behalf, Raleigh went to Greenwich at her embarkation. His speech to the queen at that time is not unlike that of Orlando to Rosalind. Raleigh received as a token from the queen, a chessman to wear at his collar. Orlando's queen, who was out of suits with fortune, took from her throat a golden chain for him to wear.

The duke himself was displeased only with Orlando's parentage. He tells Orlando at parting: "Thou are a gallant youth; I would thou had'st told me of another father." Le Beau, too, leaves him saying: "Sir, fare you well; hereafter in a better world than this I shall desire more love and knowledge of you." In ordinary circumstances, Orlando would have succeeded in his effort to win favor at court; but he happened upon an unfavorable time. As Le Beau said, "Such is now the duke's condition, that he misconstrues all that you have done."

What, then, is the character of Orlando as we find it up to the time of his banishment to the forests of Arden? He is young, ill-treated, but not insensible to his neglected condition; energetic and ambitious, as his brother admits, ready to improve the slightest opportunity for bettering his position; winning, gallant and subtle, as his conversation with Celia and Rosalind proves; proud, for he would rather be the youngest son of Sir Rowland than the adopted heir to Frederick; meditative, as when he attempts to analyze his feeling toward Rosalind—truly not an uninteresting character, although young.

Orlando, on his return, is greeted by these words of Adam:

"O, my sweet master!
O, you memory of old Sir Rowland! why, what make you here?
Why are you virtuous? Why do people love you?
And wherefore are you gentle, strong and valiant?
Why would you be so fond to overcome
The bonny priser of the humorous duke?
Your praise is come too swiftly home before you.
Know you not, master, to some kind of men
Their graces serve them but as enemies?
No more do yours; your virtues, gentle master,
Are sanctified and holy traitors to you."

Orlando's popularity has stirred up envy, and he must leave. Adam insists on accompanying him, and together they go to the forest of Arden. Orlando's tender care of his aged servant on the journey, is often commented upon; it seems unnecessary to emphasize that point, for it was but the exponent of his kind, gentlemanly nature.

In this forest, luxurious in its primeval grandeur, this lotus land where no ambition dwells, the remainder of the play is enacted. Here Orlando is placed in contrast with "Good Monsieur Melancholly," Jacques, whose chief occupation is to "rail against our mistress, the world, and all our misery." The contrast is rather unfavorable to Orlando, from the fact that Jacques is a more mature and experienced character. Yet Jacques says of Orlando's repartee: "You have a nimble wit; I think 'twas made of Atalanta's heels." Orlando's modesty is shown, when, in reply to Jacques, he says: "I will chide no breather in the world but myself, against whom I know most faults." Jacques assures him that the worst fault he has is to be in love. But, notwithstanding, Orlando, in the forest, is, as Mr. Lang says, chiefly a foil for Jacques.

There is no opportunity for the development of the heroic element which certainly existed in Orlando's character. He killed the lion and saved his sleeping brother, but that incident shows principally the attitude which Oliver supposed a man of Orlando's spirit would have toward the one who had so wronged him. When Oliver describes the scene to Rosalind, he says:

"Twice did he turn his back
But kindness, nobler ever than revenge,
And nature, stronger than his just occasion,
Made him give battle to the lioness,
Who quickly fell before him."

That hesitation is entirely out of harmony with Orlando's character. He would not deliberate an instant as to whether or not he should rescue his brother, and in the next line Oliver adds,

"In which hurtling
From miserable slumber I awak'd."

So Oliver was asleep during the encounter, and in relating it, he tells it as a man of his own revengeful nature would naturally have interpreted it.

The chief feature in the scenes in the forest, that concerns Orlando, is his love affair with Rosalind. In this, again, his youth and inexperience are evident. Rosalind is plainly his superior in acquaintance with life and love affairs. Orlando's wooing is crude and boyish. Yet the fact that he won the love of a woman like Rosalind shows that he must have had a manly, interesting character.

In view of these facts, we may say that Orlando had already laid the foundation of a strong, well-rounded character, devoid of the weaknesses and one-sided development of his associates in the play. He had potential ability which, in time, would have been called into action by his ambition. Orlando inspires confidence in us, as he did in his friends, so that we cannot imagine him, in after life, filling any but the highest place. All concede that Orlando is a young man of great physical vigor, faultless morality, winning demeanor, possessing a proper pride and ambition, and wholly fit to be the lover of Rosalind; it is only because of his youthfulness that he fails to find his way into the hearts of the maturer readers of Shakespeare.

Athletics.

After a lapse of nine months the football season has again arrived, bringing with it many fond hopes. Never have the prospects of Bucknell for a winning football team been brighter.

For the first time in our football history has the team had a trainer from the very beginning of the season.

Never before was so keen an interest taken in football by the student body as is manifested this season. The thirty applicants who daily show themselves on the campus, are doing excellent work.

The class of '98 has brought with it some excellent football material.

At a recent meeting of last year's football players Mr. Kauffman, '95, was elected Captain of the team for the coming season.

Manager Cregar deserves great credit for his able management thus far, and for the new men he has succeeded in bringing to Bucknell. He wishes to thank all who have supported him by liberal contributions so early in the season.

We feel confident that under the able coaching of Mr. Young our team will make a better record for itself than it did during previous years.

It is believed that the tendency of the new football rules will be toward a more open game, and one more interesting to the spectators.

Schedule of Games:

Oct. 6—Wyoming Seminary at Lewisburg.

Oct. 13—Wilkes-Barre Y. M. C. A. at Wilkes-Barre.

Oct. 20—Franklin and Marshall at Lewisburg.

Oct. 29—Open.

Nov. 3—Gettysburg at Gettysburg.

Nov. 7—Lafayette at Easton.

Nov. 17—Swarthmore at Swarthmore.

Nov. 29—Dickinson at Harrisburg.

The first game of the season was played with Milton, September 29, at Lewisburg. Bucknell put up an excellent game, characterized by hard, steady playing. The score was: Bucknell 54, Milton 0.

Local.

"Don't be an oyster."

Kunkle preached at Milton during the summer.

Colestock has taken charge of the Winfield church.

Can anyone tell what takes J. W. Davis down town so often?

Parker is just recovering from a severe attack of typhoid fever.

We hope to see the proposed cinder track laid before next spring.

David Phillips has been appointed organist for the Anderson Club.

A box has been placed in Main Hall for the reception of MIRROR locals.

Do you notice the broad smile on Joseph's face since his old chum has returned?

We regret the absence of Baldwin, who has been kept at home on account of sickness.

Mr. Bunnell and Mr. Harper will take charge of the gymnasium instruction this year.

We are very highly pleased to see the interest taken in the Y. M. C. A. work this term.

THE MIRROR'S energetic business manager, J. B. Suiter, spent his vacation on his father's farm.

Sheddan has resigned his charge of the library to take the position of instructor in the Seminary.

Collins has been raising a fine crop of hair during the summer, and is now in prime condition to play football.

We are pleased to welcome W. T. Harris back to Bucknell. He has resumed his former work in the ranks of '95.

The latest discovery in Natural Science has recently been made by Berger. He calls it the "circular force."

S. R. Wood has been confined to his room for a few days owing to sickness. We are glad to see him around again.

Did you see Macnab's exhibit of snakes at the fair? 'Mac,' is considered the chief authority of the University on reptiles.

Professor Lincoln Hulley preached to the congregation at the Erie Avenue Baptist church, Williamsport, September 23.

The many friends of B. K. Brick, '95, sympathize with him in the painful affliction which prevents his return to college.

Mr. Brown has been appointed to assist Professor Owens in the laboratory, and Mr. Stephens to take charge of the building in general.

Some time in November, Rev. F. S. Dobbins will deliver, in Bucknell Hall, an illustrated lecture on Japan. The lecture will be free.

Professor (in Constitutional History Class)—"The truth is, there are many criminals who come from Europe to America." Douglass—"Yes, I know it."

Dr. Perrine was in attendance at the Northumberland Baptist Association, which was held at Bloomsburg, and read before that body the Circular Letter.

Dr. Harris delivered a very thoughtful and inspiring lecture to the students of the University on the first Monday of the term. His theme was: "Morality is energy of the will in righteousness.

At the meeting of the Chemical and Physical society Thursday, October 4, A. W. Stephens read an interesting paper on the harvesting of india-rubber, and Prof. Owens explained the recently promulgated theory on the relation of dust to life.

The Prohibition club met in the Y. M. C. A. rooms Thursday, October 4, and organized for active work during the year. The election of officers resulted in the choice of Suiter, president; Crawford, vice-president; J. W. Davis, treasurer, and Schuyler, secretary.

The following are the officers of the Chemical and Physical Society: President, Professor W. G. Owens; Vice-President, W. B. Sheddan; Treasurer, H. S. Schuyler; Secretary, J. C. Carey. Prof. G. E. Fisher and Mr. Simpson compose the executive committee.

Rev. Cortland Meyers, who preaches to the largest Baptist congregation in Brooklyn, will, on November 12, in the opera house, deliver a lecture on "A Black Slave on a Throne." Mr. Meyers, as many will recall, was present with us last June at commencement. He needs no further introduction.

Freshman to Junior (who is showing the newcomer around the campus)—"Who is that clerical looking gentleman coming up the hill?" Junior—"Why, that is the Rev. Dr. Theophilus Harris, late of the University of Pennsylvania, who has been secured by the faculty, at great cost, to teach the Seniors Ethics."

We take pleasure in announcing the formation of a Natural History Society. The following officers have been elected: President, J. D. Macnab; Vice-President, D. S. Grim; Secretary, Nelson Davis; Treasurer, Professor Fisher. The first meeting was held on September 27. Dr. Groff gave a very interesting lecture on "2,000 Mistakes Taught in Our Public Schools."

Prof. W. E. Martin, who has been appointed Librarian, has been busy all the summer in rearranging the books in the library. He expects to have them catalogued in a short time. The appearance of the library shows marked improvements. The students fully appreciate the courtesy of Professor Martin, and desire to acknowledge the same through the columns of THE MIRROR.

It is gratifying to make mention of the many signs of progress going on in and about the University buildings. During the summer the dining room of the Seminary was thoroughly renovated and greatly improved. Other improvements of minor importance were also made. In the Academy, besides being completely renovated within and without, a public study room has been fitted out, and is under the supervision of Fred B. Hunt, who is a teacher of some years' experience.

The first regular business meeting of the Mirror Association for this year was held in Theta Alpha Hall, September 22. The election of editors resulted as follows: Senior Editors, F. W. Jackson and F. M. Simpson; Junior Editors, Alex. Douglass and J. W. Davis; Sophomore Editor, D. S. Grim; Freshman Editor, H. L. Purdy. At the organization of the board of editors, H. S. Schuyler was elected Editor-in-Chief; T. C. Hanna, Associate Editor in-Chief; F. W. Jackson and F. M. Simpson, Literary Editors; D. S. Grim, Sporting Editor; E. C. Kunkle and Alex. Douglass, Local Editors; F. W. Brown and H. L. Purdy, Personal Editors, and J. W. Davis, Exchange Editor.

The following are the officers of the various societies and classes of the University: Euepia Literary Society: President, Jackson; Vice-President, A. O. Miller; Secretary, Bower; Treasurer, Burge; Critic, Sheddan; Librarian, Bromly Smith.

Theta Alpha: President, Schuyler; Vice-President, Phillips; Secretary, Bunnell; Critic, Suiter; Censor, Hollinshead.

Band: President, W. C. Gretzinger; Vice-President, Jackson; Sergeant, Simpson; Business Manager, A. T. Williams; Assistant Business Manager, Macnab; Secretary, J. C. Carey.

Class Officers: Freshman Class: President, J. T. Anderson; Vice President, Miss Anna Rogers; Secretary, Miss Stifler; Treasurer, Mr. Roth; Historian, Mr. Flint; Poet, Linderman.

Sophomore Class: President, Bunnell; Vice-President, Kunkle; Secretary, Grim; Treasurer, Miller; Historian, Miss Hanna; Poet, Miss Taylor.

Junior Class: President, Wood; Vice-President, Davis; Secretary, Cober; Treasurer, Fisher; Historian, Miss Wolfe; Poet, Powell.

Senior Class: President, Sheddan; Vice-President, Schuyler; Secretary, Miss Cotton; Treasurer, Simpson; Historian, Jackson; Poet, Allen.

Sinton has been elected the Beau Brummel of the Sommers' Club.

Among the factors which aid in opening school pleasantly, and in making new men feel at home, none surpass the Young Men's Christian Association. One of the principles of this organization is the "brotherhood of man," with Jesus Christ as an "Elder Brother." The natural outgrowth of this principle is mutual helpfulness, prompted by unselfish motives. Through the efforts of the President, Vice President and Reception Committee this work was very successfully conducted at the opening of the term.

As the trains came into Lewisburg, bringing new students, they were met by members of the Association, who made themselves known to the new men, welcomed them, and conducted them to the "hill." In Main Hall was located a "bureau of information." Here the new student's name and Christian standing were obtained, and any needed information with regard to rooms, books, board, etc., was given. Thus the strangers immediately began to feel at home.

The annual Y. M. C. A. reception was held on Saturday evening in the gymnasium. Nearly one hundred students, old and new, gathered for mutual acquaintance and sociability. After introductions, hand-shakes and kind words, refreshments of the season were served by the committee. The literary part of the program was arranged in the form of toasts, with President Allen as toastmaster. The various departments of college life, as athletics, literary societies, the press, etc., were explained and emphasized by leaders in the respective departments. The toasts were interspersed with University and class yells, ending with the Y. M. C. A. yell. Space forbids giving the entire program.

The first Sunday at College is sometimes quite a long and lonesome day, but not this year, for it was a Y. M. C. A. Sunday. Mr. L. D. Wishard, who has recently returned from a four years' trip in Asia and Europe, made for investigating the advisability of introducing Y. M. C. A. work in foreign fields, spoke in the morning. His address was both scholarly and stirring. At 3 p. m. the classes gathered in separate rooms for class prayer meetings, and then marched in a body to Bucknell Hall. The meeting there was addressed by R. J. Davis, '94, who sails for Madras in October, to become General Secretary of the Association there. His theme was drawn from Dan. 1, 8, "The Duty of Making an Early, Firm and Persistent Stand for Jesus Christ." At its close many new men declared it their intention to make this stand. A farewell meeting was held for Mr. Davis at the Baptist church in the evening.

At the first Tuesday evening prayer meeting, the subject of Bible study was presented, and the organization of classes begun. A progressive system of Bible study has been arranged as follows: Freshmen, "Life of Christ;" Sophomores, "Parables and Miracles;" Juniors and Seniors, "Studies in Acts;" Alternate for all, "Christ Among Men." Good sized classes have been organized in each department. Their success depends upon honest, faithful work by leaders and members.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Miss Nanna J. Wilson, a member of the class of '87, expects to sail from San Francisco, October 16, en route to her former field of mission work in Japan.

The Y. W. C. A. promises to be very helpful under the wise leadership of Miss Cora R. Perry, who, during the summer, spent some time at Northfield.

The department of music is especially to be congratulated on the acquisition of Miss Minnie Gould, who has already charmed us with her sweet voice.

The places in our ranks made vacant by the girls of '94, have been quickly filled. Texas, Colorado, Maryland, New Jersey and New York have all sent us students of whom Bucknell Institute may well be proud.

The library is not yet "a thing of beauty and a joy forever," still we find here interesting and instructive literature, the standard works of fiction, the best scientific writings and the latest periodicals. Yet we often exclaim, Oh! that we had comfortable, easy chairs, and a light that would not flicker, then would the library be as it should, a pleasant place in which to read and study.

One of the most helpful features of our religious life is the Sunday evening Chapel, held in the Institute parlors. Mrs. Larison takes charge of the service and makes the hour one of real pleasure and profit. This term we are studying the writings of St. Paul. A theme is previously announced and each student in turn gives some verse with comments pertaining to the subject.

On coming in sight of the Institute and grounds after the summer's absence, we all felt, I am sure, a thrill of pleasure, as on meeting an old friend. Naturally enough, too, we were on the alert to discover something new in the old place, just as we look for changes in a friend from whom we have been separated for a season. First, we find the office looking fresh and inviting with its delicately tinted walls hung with attractive pictures. The reception room, too, with a firmer "understanding" and brighter "outlook" is striving its utmost to fulfill its mission. And now for supper! But what is this? Something is changed! Ah yes! We see, now; the walls have grown fairer, they have taken on the prevailing "tan" which everyone covets at the close of the long vacation. Out in the grove, also, we notice a change—a gravel path sweeps, with a wide curve, close to the enclosure, allowing the fair bicyclists an opportunity to exercise on the grounds. These are all signs of advancement, and as such, are sure to interest all who are loyal to Bucknell.

On the first Saturday evening after our return a reception was held by the Association for the purpose of making our new friends more at home in their unaccustomed surroundings. Upon entering the Institute parlors each person received a card on which was a list of numbers. Upon the tables were some curious groups of objects, also numbered. We were told that each group represented the title of a book that we were to find out and write upon our card. We all set to work, intent upon securing the prize for discovering the greatest number of titles. Some bits of bright green moss on a piece of gray sandstone were readily interpreted as "Mosses from an old Manse," but it was not so easy to decipher the meaning of a piece of pie, placed on two ears of green corn, until one good at punning wrote down "Pioneers." The committee found upon examining the cards that Miss Mary Barthol was the successful competitor. We were delighted with a choice solo sung by Miss Gould. A mimic well of lemonade embowered in ferns proved quite an attraction. The President set forth the object of the Y. W. C. A. at Bucknell, and urged the new students to join. All present agreed that the Association knew how to give its prospective members a pleasant greeting.

ACADEMIC NEWS.

[G. LIVINGSTON BAVARD, Correspondent.]

Tom Cooper plays the cornet, guitar, mandolin, violin and flute.

Cooper and Wittenmyer are new additions to the bicycle contingent.

We are glad to welcome Pierce back to school and hope that he will now be able to complete his studies.

The extensive improvements in both Main and East Halls call forth the commendations of the students.

The Academy team, in charge of Captain Perrin, played with Sunbury, September 29. Sunbury 12, Academy 6.

The new rules do not agree with the environments of some of the students who are accustomed to turning in early in the morning.

Manager Koser has arranged for the following games: Oct. 6, Bloomsburg at Bloomsburg; Oct. 13, Selinsgrove at Selinsgrove.

The officers of the Academy Athletic Association are: Bayard, President; Hutchinson, Secretary; Anstock, Treasurer; Koser, Manager, and Perrin, Captain.

The prospects for a successful football season are promising. There are several new men who should make first class players, if size has anything to do with success in the game.

The Academy begins the new school year with very bright prospects. Professor Edwards has already gained the affections and admiration of every student by his pleasant and hospitable manner. To him and Mrs. Edwards we extend our compliments and best wishes for a happy, pleasant and successful life at the head of our institution.

The Adelphian Literary society organized for the term by choosing the following officers: E. W. Cober, president; A. J. Hanna, vice-president; G. L. Bayard, first critic; E. Nesbit, second critic; H. B. Levis, secretary; J. W. Miles, chaplain; L. C. Crismyer, treasurer; J. T. Snyder, censor; C. P. Meeker, curator, and H. Craig, sergeant-at-arms.

The Young Men's Christian Association of the Academy gave a reception to new students Saturday evening, September 15. During the course of the evening, Mrs. Edwards rendered several charming selections on the piano. At 9:20 refreshments were served in the dining hall, after which speeches were in order. President Harvey introduced Professor Edwards whose speech called forth hearty applause from the students. Rev. J. T. Judd then entertained the students with a short address. Bayard, Meeker and Cleeland followed with brief talks on special topics. Thus ended the most pleasant social affair ever given by the Academy Y. M. C A.

HENRY WARD BEECHER TO HIS SON.

The following letter from Henry Ward Beecher to his son is authentic and should be carefully pondered by every young man :

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Oct. 18, 1878.

MY DEAR HERBERT : You are now for the first time really launched into life for yourself. You go from your father's house, and from all family connections, to make your own way in the world. It is a good time to make a new start, to cast out faults of whose evil you have had an experience, and to take on habits the want of which you have found to be so damaging.

1. You must not go into debt. Avoid debt as you would the devil. Make it a fundamental rule : No debt—cash or nothing.

2. Make few promises. Religiously observe even the smallest promise. A man who means to keep his promises cannot afford to make many.

3. Be scrupulously careful in all statements. Accuracy and perfect frankness ; no guess-work; either nothing or accurate truth.

4. When working for others sink yourself out of sight ; seek their interest. Make yourself necessary to those who employ you, by industry, fidelity and scrupulous integrity. Selfishness is fatal.

5. Hold yourself responsible for a higher standard than anybody else expects of you. Demand more of yourself than anybody else expects of you. Keep your personal standard high. Never excuse yourself to yourself. Be a hard master to yourself ; be lenient to everybody else.

6. Concentrate your force on your proper business ; do not turn off. Be constant, steadfast, persevering.

7. The art of making one's fortune is to spend nothing. In this country any intelligent and industrious young man may become rich if he stops all leaks and is not in a hurry. Do not make haste ; be patient.

8. Do not speculate or gamble. You go to a land where everybody is excited and strives to make money suddenly, largely, and without working for it. They blow soap-bubbles. Steady, patient industry is both the surest and the safest way. Greediness and haste are two devils that destroy thousands every year.

9. In regard to Mr. B——, he is a Southern gentleman ; he is receiving you as a favor to me ; do not let him regret it.

10. I beseech you to correct one fault—severe speech of others ; never speak evil of any man, no matter what the facts may be. Hasty faultfinding and severe speech of absent people is not honorable, is apt to be unjust and cruel, makes enemies to yourself, and is wicked.

11. You must remember that you go to Mr. B—— not to learn to manage a farm like his. One or two hundred acres, not forty thousand, is to be your future homestead ; but you can learn the care of cattle, sheep, the culture of wheat, climate, country, manners and customs, and a hundred things that will be needful.

12. If by integrity, industry and well-earned success you deserve well of your fellow citizens, they may, in years to come, ask you to accept honors. Do not seek them, do not receive them while you are young—wait ; but when you are established you may make your father's name known with honor in halls of legislation.

Lastly, do not forget your father's and your mother's God. Because you will be largely deprived of church privileges, you need all the nerve to keep your heart before God. But do not despise small churches and humble preachers. "Mind not high things, but condescend to men of low estate."

Read often the Proverbs, the precepts and duties enjoined in the New Testament. May your father's God go with you and protect you.—Selected.

Editorial.

THE Literary Department acknowledges the interest—though small—that has been aroused in its work. Some productions, in the way of original fiction, have been offered and others are expected. This column of our journal promises to be especially attractive in future issues.

WE recommend to our readers the columns devoted to the interests of the Academy and of the Institute. Both columns are under capable management and present much readable information. These departments of the University are important factors in the school life here; and it is our desire to represent them as fully as possible and to receive in turn their liberal patronage.

'96 MAINTAINS its claims to be an unusually progressive class and continues the work of improvement that is so generally manifest in our College. L'Agenda for next summer promises to be a remarkable volume. The board is actively engaged to make the work successful; more than two hundred subscriptions have already been secured, and at least twenty-five pages will be added to the usual number.

THE Natural History Society, recently organized, deserves notice by students of all courses. Its object is to arouse an interest in nature studies, especially to aid original investigation. The open meetings are held on alternate Thursdays at 4 p. m. in the Laboratory building. Three of our professors have engaged their interest in the society and all the members are enthusiastic and active. Many thanks are due Prof. Aviragnet for his contributions to the Society's program.

THE Prohibition Club has made special arrangement for its annual competition. The students chosen as their orators expect to make a short tour through this part of the state during the Christmas holidays, attended by our Prohibition Octette. After the return the competition will be held and the successful speaker will represent Bucknell in the intercollegiate contest. By this plan the value of the final meeting will be much increased, and meanwhile the cause of temperance will be advocated in a novel way in our neighboring towns.

SOME of our readers will be startled to hear that there is here in College—even in the Freshman class—a man who does not know the name of Pennsylvania's Governor; but such is the case. One of the brightest students in our promising new class, confessed that he could not name the executive of our state; and again, he wondered what in the world was this General Hastings doing around here. We learn that Judge Metzger, of Lycoming county, recently refused naturalization papers to a man because he could not name our Governor. Now, it is well enough to talk of application to study, of devotion to the inside college life; but it is embarrassing, at least for our part, to acknowledge that we have in our midst students who are unfitted through ignorance to become citizens of the United States.

ANOTHER unfortunate idea of the student life was expressed in a meeting of one of our Literary Societies. In a debate on the value of athletic sports in college, it was stated that our sole purpose here is to cultivate the mind. A man with this view seems almost as greatly mistaken as the man who comes to college to play football. To the latter we gladly recommend the American Association of Professional Football Teams. To the former we say that he is born a century too late and that he must get out on the track and run a long while until he can come up with the men who are leading the world in every department of life. The man who cares only for the body is little better than a brute; the man who does nothing but acquire knowledge is little better than a book; and the man who develops mind and body to the neglect of the soul is "worse than an infidel." Surely we do not come to college for any one-sided growth, but for education in its true sense—the development of body, mind and soul.

SEVERAL considerations forbid the free expression of our opinion on the football game at Wilkes-barre. In the first place, we see the matter from only one point of view, and should be moderate, whatever and however reliable may be the facts at hand. Further we can hardly expect that an imperfect organization playing under an unmerited title deserves any serious consideration on our part This is true although our team has engaged with that organization as a fair rival. This engagement, we insist, was a pitiable mistake by the management and should not compromise our College or its team. The general sentiment is interpreted as in protest against engagements with any teams outside of schools and colleges. Our football history will justify this feeling. Football, more perhaps than any other game, is dependent upon the honor and honesty of the individual player. What can we expect—what have we always received from a team composed of two or three past college players, who still enter the game because they have nothing else to do; two or three town boys who enter for the sport; two or three professional pugilists who enter for practice, and, if there is yet any room on the team, perhaps two or three Christian men?

ANTONIO.

The day of days was drawing to its close,
A time of joy to all the day had been.
All morn the people loitered round St. Mark's,
Or wandered in their black gondolas
Through the ancient city of the Latins.
But, when the noon heat too intense became,
Returned the people to their homes and slept.
A stillness o'er the city hung prolonged;
And hushed was everything—as when they stand
Around the bier of her beloved by all.
Alone the water lapped against the steps,
The marbie steps, along the water's edge.
The sun far past the meridian was,
It gently touched the gilded domes, the still
Lagunes, the lofty spires.
Long shadows o'er the Adriatic sea
It cast. They lengthened to the coming dusk.
A trembling haze ascended to the clouds,
The fleecy clouds, that hovered o'er the sea,
As on a frosty morn the heron lights
And pauses, ere it plunges in the stream;
So, the great, crimson ball of fire paused,
And then crept slowly o'er the horizon,
And disappeared at last, but o'er the land
Hung its refulgency a moment more,
Then passed away, and day gave place to night,
And gentle Adriatic breezes swept
Across the town. Dark clouds crept o'er the sky
And hid the queen of night and all her train
Of constellations. Here and there a light,
A tiny light, sprang up and battled with
The gloom. A small gondola glided down
Throughout the night. A young Venetian stood
Erect and stately at the end, the craft
Propelling slowly with his long, straight bar.
The splashing ceased. The small boat silent sped
Along the wave, and came to rest beside
A flight of broad stone steps, of marble steps.
The young Venetian raised his head and sang
A serenade, a short sweet canzonet.
Then sat and gazed into the bottom of
The boat. Perhaps his thoughts were all of her.
He did not see the form that noiseless moved
Unto the edge, the water's edge, but long
He waited, idly rocking to and fro,
Creating tiny waves that tumbled up
The marble steps and kissed the snowy feet
Of her that stood, and started as she spoke.
"How very cold you are," he then returned,
"You've changed since last we met." "No, no, my lord
Antonio. If change there be, my heart
Grows warmer when I think of thee." And then
The rifted clouds displayed the silver moon,
And he adored her as he never had
Before—so beautiful she was, as all

Alone upon the steps, the broad stone steps,
She stood. "Then fairest come with me, and we Will glide together through the water in
This small gondola." "No," she answered. "No,
Antonio, to-night I cannot go.
Some other night may do as well. To-night
He'd miss me." Not a word he spoke, but with
A shove he left the steps, the marble steps.
He paddled onward through the night, and left
Her all alone, upon the broad stone steps
Alone. But once he turned and saw the form
Of his beloved motionless. She sighed,
And said, "He will return, will soon return."
Meanwhile the black gondola disappeared
Into the blacker night. The count then turned,
And started back, and as he passed the steps
She cried, "Antonio, Antonio,
Monsignor Count. Good night, Antonio."
But there was no response, no sound, except
The labored breathing of the boatman.
And she was in the darkness left alone.

UNIVERSITY LIBRARY.

Recent valuable contributions of books and pamphlets have been received from the following friends: The American Baptist Publication Society, Mr. I. Baker Greene, Registrar Wm. C. Gretzinger, Prof. G. G. Groff, Pres. J. H. Harris, Pres. D. J. Hill, Rev. J. T. Judd, Capt. J. A. Owens, Prof. E. Perrine, William Jewell College, the family of the late Hon. Charles S. Wolfe, and various departments at Washington, D. C. Registrar Gretzinger and Prof. T. F. Hamblin have also loaned valuable works to the library for present use.

Lists of books needed in various departments, and of back numbers of Magazines and Reviews wanted to complete our library files, have been prepared and will be sent to friends on application to Librarian.

What in your garret is rubbish, on our shelves may prove treasure.

ADVANCED COURSES OF STUDY.

Thirty five courses of study leading to the Master's degree have been established in Bucknell, open to graduates of Bucknell only. This restriction is necessary, because of the large number of candidates for the first degree now in attendance upon the college. The courses may be taken in residence or non residence. The completion of nine of these courses is required for the degree. Three of the courses must be taken in some one department. The passing grade is nine. Honor courses taken by a student while studying for the first degree count as half courses for the second degree, provided the student has not fallen below ex. in any study. In that case one honor study is deducted for each such deficiency. President Harris offers courses in Psychology, in Ethics, in the History of Philosophy, in the History of Education and in the Philosophy of Religion. Professor Loomis offers courses in Goethe, in Lessing and Schiller, and in Racine and Moliere, each with collateral reading. Professor Groff offers courses in Vegetable Physiology, on Ferns and their allies, on "World Life," in Chemical Geology and in Physiology. Professor Barthol offers courses in Determinants, method of Least Squares, in Analytics and in Quaternions. Professor Rockwood offers courses in Early Latin, in Roman History and in Roman Antiquities, using Latin texts with collateral reading. Professor Owens offers courses in the Modern Theories of Chemistry, in Inorganic Chemistry and Organic Chemistry. Professor Perrine offers courses in Chaucer and his contemporaries, in the Development of the English Drama, in the Romantic Movement in English Literature and in "Pope versus Wordsworth." Professor Perrine also offers a course in Economics. Professor Hamblin offers courses in the Phaedrus of Plato, in the Medea of Euripides and in Grecian History and Antiquities. Professor Hulley offers courses in Hebrew Syntax, or in Cognate languages and in Bible study; also courses in Epochs of German History and in Epochs of English History. Professor Martin offers an advanced course in Logic. Electives in the Junior and Senior years may be taken by graduates.

THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE.

People everywhere have puzzled and vague minds about the Bible. Most people are densely and darkly ignorant of it, they seldom read or study it, and may not care anything for it. Others want to know the Bible and have long studied it, but they have done so only spasmodically, thoughtlessly and unsystematically. The trouble with most people who want to study the Bible is, they don't know where to begin, how to study, how much time it will take, or whose guidance to seek.

Long experience has proved that loose, vague, scrappy reading will not enable one to master the Bible in a lifetime. It never pays to do superficial work, for it must be done over and over again, and it never goes to the bottom of things. Nor can the Bible be mastered without effort. To learn it well takes years of study—some men and women give it their whole lifetime—but it takes far less time to master it, if one works with system and by a right method. The Bible is often obscure, but it is knowable and clear if studied. And it is surprising what a hold any person can get of the Bible in a few years' time by giving fifteen minutes every day to it. Everything depends on a right start, a definite plan, a good method, and wise guidance. For lack of a definite plan a great many people are floundering around in unrest, and getting no more out of the Bible than children just learning their letters. For lack of a good method and wise guidance, many are now doing double work for the same results that a proper course would bring. A willing worker under favorable conditions can cover the whole Bible as he would a school text book in four years, doing about two hours work every week. Most people do not know this, but many who are asking how to begin, inquire—Is there any good course of study, any good way to learn the Bible better? It is to help such as raise that question that I write this article. That question was asked me a score of times at the Lakeside Bible Work this summer. There is such a course or plan of study. It is now being offered by the American Institute of Sacred Literature of Chicago. To meet this very need with its own students it has prepared two four-year courses:

1. A Bible Reading Course.
2. A Bible Study Course.

These courses run four years and take a student or reader over the entire Bible. They require little time, little money and the minimum amount of labor. They aim to do everything that a right start, a definite plan, a good method and wise guidance can do for those who want to know the Bible. To those, therefore, who have asked me about the Bible Study, I may say these are the best methods and courses I know for Bible clubs, classes, schools or individuals. A letter to the Principal, W. R. Harper, Chicago, will, I am sure, bring an explanation of the course.

LINCOLN HULLEY.

AN AMATEUR CANOE RACE.

The day for the race dawned bright and clear. A good, steady breeze from the southwest tossed the waves in a saucy manner. Soon after breakfast the little clippers were launched and their bright sails hoisted. It was apparent to all that the "Sprite" had the greater spread of canvas and many looked upon her as the winner; but we, the champions of the "Nanon," trusting in the admirable "pointing" ability of our boat, looked forward to a close race.

While the "skippers" were trying their boats to see if everything was in working order, and the buoys, to mark the course, were being placed, the two camps were scenes of excitement, and all were hurrying to advantageous places from which to view the race.

The course was to be triangular, with the starting line between a float and a row boat just opposite our camp. From the starting point the boats were to run to the west, a reach of one-fourth of a mile; turning the buoy here the course was southwest, a beat to windward for three-fourths of a mile, to the buoy off the boat house; when around this it is a race nearly before the wind to the starting point. Twice around is nearly six miles, and gave the boats a chance to show their powers.

It was a pretty sight, just before the start, to see the "skippers" maneuvering for position. Here the Sprite showed a decided advantage over our boat in being quicker in "stays," and her followers were jubilant when, as the shot for the start echoed over the water, and both boats came about on the starboard tack for the reach to the first mark, it was seen that the Sprite had secured the weather position.

Although the maneuvering for the start had been exciting, it could not be compared with the "luffing" match which now took place. Soon after the start, the Nanon made an attempt to pass the Sprite to windward, but the latter seriously objected and luffed up into the wind, thus compelling Nanon to fall to leeward again. These tactics were repeated several times, but the Sprite was too quick in getting under way and so maintained her lead which she gained at the start.

"What an excellent turn the Sprite made," cried a friend of that boat as she glided around the first mark; but it had scarcely passed her lips when the Nanon, without a foot to spare, swung around the mark, and without slacking speed, came over on the port tack. The Sprite continued on the starboard.

“‘Now we will see which is more advantageous, ability to ‘point’ or ‘turn’ ”; said one of our party, as the friends of the two boats congregated on a rocky promontory with enough soil to support a few trees which afforded ample shade for the group. “Let me see; this leg to windward is three-fourths of a mile; if the Nanon turns the upper mark one minute ahead of the Sprite, and I am confident she will, the race will be hers; for the Sprite cannot pass her on the run home, and leading at the starting point means a stern chase for the Sprite to the first buoy, and therefore, barring accidents, the loss of the race.”

“Very good reasoning,” says one, “but the boats have tacked, and I think the Sprite will cross the bows of the Nanon.”

All is guess work now for we cannot see which is pointing higher. But the excitement is soon over; the Nanon's sails flutter and she is behind; but not much, for they are on the line between the first and second marks and so near that the Sprite's sails have blanketed the Nanon.

“Do you realize that the Nanon has gained nearly ten seconds on this one tack? At this rate H——'s figures may not be far out of the way.”

“Another tack will enable us to be more accurate,” is the rejoinder from the other side.

But meanwhile both boats have turned. How aggravatingly slow the Nanon is in turning! The Sprite has swung around and is well under way before her rival's sails have filled on the other tack; but is the Nanon pointing higher? We were not long in suspense, although it seemed hours.

The two boats are going toward each other at a rapid rate and the spray is flying from their bows, wetting the sails half way to the peak. H——, who has retired to a place where he has the two buoys in line, cries excitedly, “the Nanon crosses the line!” and five seconds later, “she passes the Sprite to windward! I knew she would do it.”

“Look! the Nanon is going to turn!” “We will see which is going the faster now.”

But the Sprite, after a few minutes sailing, turns also, but passes astern of her rival.

The Nanon turns again. It is a pretty piece of calculation to know just how far to go on one tack to make the buoy and not over-reach. But the Nanon made no mistake.

“H——, catch the time of rounding as I call; get ready with your watch.”

“Nanon!” “Now look sharp! Ha! Sprite missed the mark and must make another tack.”

“There she goes! What did you make it?”

“Just one minute and four seconds. Nanon will win.”

It was a beautiful sight, those two boats almost flying before the wind; and how exciting! It was conceded by all that Sprite would be defeated unless she could pass Nanon on this run. To overcome a lead of more than a minute in going to the home buoy was more than could be hoped for.

About two-thirds of the leg had been traversed when the cry arose that something was the trouble with the Nanon. Glasses were turned upon her, and it was seen that the jaw of her boom was out of place, and that S—— was forward repairing it.

“He returns to his seat,” “She is under headway again,” are heard in rapid succession. And none too soon, for Sprite is upon her. Any slip on the part of either means defeat now. Nanon is in the lead but Sprite ever on the alert to gain a point or catch the leader in error.

On they came with no apparent change in position. The Nanon swung gracefully around the home buoy and sped away for the second mark just four seconds in advance of her antagonist.

At the first buoy the struggle was exciting and the Sprite rounded first. But on the first tack Nanon regained her position in the lead.

As they neared the second buoy the wind swung a little to the westward and freshened. The lee decks of the boats were well under water and they were tearing along very rapidly. Nanon rounded the windward buoy and filled away for home, the last leg having devolved into a reach. One minute and six seconds later the Sprite rounded the mark and sped away after her fleet rival.

It was a close race home, but the Sprite, with her greater sail-area, could not overcome the lead which the Nanon gained in the windward work, and the latter crossed the line a winner by twenty seconds. “NANON.”

Pease (to group of students)—“Why is a geyser like Bucknell ministerials? As no one could guess the conundrum he gave the answer: “Because the frequency of spouting decreases with age.”

Athletics.

We are glad to see Megargee out practicing.

The faithful practice of the first team is highly commended.

Among the new men who have made favorable impressions on the football field are Thomas, Davis, Downing and Taggart.

We are glad to note that so many tennis enthusiasts are daily found on the courts practicing, with the view of making next year's tournament the most successful in the history of the University.

The first team's playing against the scrub team (often composed of fifteen men) is hard and snappy with enough vim and dash to interest the crowd of spectators that daily assemble to watch the practice.

We heartily endorse Trainer Young's methods of strengthening the College team. If a player on the second team has repeatedly proved himself better than his opponent on the regular team, it is no more than just that he be transferred. Let us all unite to have the strongest possible team represent Bucknell this year.

On the pleasant afternoon of October 6 all who strolled to the hill saw a pretty exhibition of football between the "pets" and the Wyoming Seminary team. The game was exciting from beginning to end, although the score might indicate otherwise. The Wyoming boys never came near making a touch-down. In the first half (25 minutes) three touch-downs were made. In the second half (15 minutes) three more touch-downs were scored, the second being made in three rushes, and the last in four. Thomas made four touch-downs and Bunnell two. Score 34–0, in favor of Bucknell. Umpire, Thorpe; referee, Young; lineman, Hulley.

On October 13 the College team played the Y. M. C. A. team of Wilkesbarre at that place. The score was reported 4–0, in favor of Wilkesbarre; but thereby hangs a tale. Our team was confident of victory. That they didn't win was not due to inferior playing on their part. It was due mostly, however, to the lack of sand and judgment on the part of the umpire and referee, one of whom, we are sorry to say, represented Bucknell. The "Y. M. C. A." players made repeated foul plays, and not once were they punished. However the climax was reached in the first half when, on an unsuccessfully attempted goal kick from the field by the Y. M. C. A.'s full back, a touch-down was allowed, whereas the ball ought to have been brought back to the ten-yard line. Two twenty-minute halves were to have been played, but only twenty-five minutes were spent in actual play. Once, when Bucknell had the ball within a few yards of Y. M. C. A.'s goal, time was actually called two minutes before the half was played. Bucknell can always stand an honorable defeat, but when the score ought to be 0–0, and it is called 4–0, she kicks. The Anderson Club has elected Jackson captain and Suiter manager of its football team.

The Sophs' hearts were gladdened on the 6th inst., the occasion being the arrival of their class canes.

One of the Seniors wears a suspicious looking ring with '93 engraved on it. The owner is unknown.

The Sommers Club has organized a football team with Firth as captain, Powell manager and Sinton as coach.

The Y. M. C. A. state convention was held in Johnstown on the 18-22d. Several of the students attended it.

Many of the University students assisted in the drama, ''Luther at Worms,'' in the opera house October 15 and 16.

Mr. A. F. Anderson, of the class of '94, led Y. M. C. A. on the 4th, previous to his final departure for Washington.

The Freshmen's canes are not quite so classic nor artistic as the Sophomores', but they seem to be a little more persuasive.

Who can tell? Does the Freshmen class intend to witness all the football games of the season in a body without paying admission fee?

W. T. Harris in History—''O, I don't doubt for a moment that the author is right, but my private opinion is, that he is wrong.''

Professor Edwards has taken charge of Professor Phillips' class in Sunday school. The boys are well pleased with their new teacher.

Mr. J. H. Wood, the accomplished and genial editor in-chief of the Wyoming Seminary Journal, was a visitor at Bucknell on the 6th inst.

On Saturday evening, October 6, Sheddan gave an interesting talk in the Y. M. C. A. Hall. His subject was, ''The Wonderful Country and the Wonderful Man.''

Mr. Gilbert A. Beaver, State Secretary of the Y. M. C. A., gave a very interesting and practical address to the Bible classes on the 8th inst.

Dr. Loomis met with a severe accident while riding his bicycle a few days ago. But it did not prevent the plucky Doctor from holding his classes.

At a meeting of the Natural History Society on Thursday, October 11, Professor Aviragnet gave a very interesting lecture on ''Life in Mauritius.''

The University Mandolin Club has organized and is diligently preparing for the winter season. Moyer, Martin, Walkinshaw, T. Cooper and Pierce make up the club.

A dancing class has been formed for the benefit of the students of the University. For further information apply to L. C. Walkinshaw, tanzkaiser, or R. B. McCay, tanzbodenkonig.

J. B. Suiter attended the C. E. convention held at York, Pa., October 17-19. He reports a good convention, pleasant time and a strong desire to push forward the work here in our own county.

The College and Academy boys who had the pleasure of witnessing the Seminary bicycle race were delighted with it. They were especially pleased to see plucky Miss Wells come out ahead.

''Two make a company and three make a crowd,'' said Mr. Powell to himself when he met an old Northumberland acquaintance the day of the Wyoming Seminary and Bucknell football game.

The Phi Kappa Psi fraternity has initiated the following members: Cutler, '97; Mulkie, '98; Clement, '98. Camp, '97, and Freas, '98, have joined Sigma Chi, and Collins, '97, was recently taken into Sigma Alpha Epsilon.

Miss Anna Lillian Dunkle, a graduate of the National School of Oratory and the Boston College of Oratory, will give an exhibition in Elocution, Posture and Delsarte in Bucknell Hall, October 25. Proceeds for the cinder track and the Y. M. C. A.

Kauffman, Elliott, Collins and Fetzer went along with Company A, Twelfth Regiment, on Wednesday, October 10, to pay the last tribute of respect to our old War Governor Curtin, who was buried at Bellefonte. The boys report a very pleasant trip.

L'Agenda Board: Editor-in-chief, H. T. Colestock; Associate Editors, L. C. Wilkinshaw, H. Harris, A. T. Williams, B. Reynolds, D. E. Lewis, S. R. Wood, Miss Mary Wolfe; Business Manager, B. B. Ware; Assistant Business Manager, A. W. Stevens.

The members of the Junior class who will take part in the annual Junior debate are: H. T. Colestock, A. A. Cober, J. W. Davis, Alex. Douglass, W. E. Hall, D. E. Lewis, R. B. McCay, E. R. Powell, Barclay Reynolds, A. C. Rohland, B. B. Ware and S. R. Wood.

On the gentle northern slope of a certain college hill, under a shady oak, stands a plain but historical memorial slab. An ancient tradition comes down to us concerning this memorial slab, which has withstood the winds and stormy blasts of many winters. Although weatherbeaten and somewhat worn, yet its inscription can easily be read. The tradition runs as follows: There once attended the college, on the slope of whose hill the memorial is erected, a student commonly known among the other college students as "Jimmy," the Adventurer. Jimmy was a very modest and unassuming fellow. He was quite industrious, scarcely ever being idle. He was also an excellent student, doing more work than most of his classmates. Natural history was his most enjoyable branch, and it is said that he was much given to the study of all living things, whether humani generis, or four-footed beasts or things that crawl – especially the latter. There is a fabulous story to the effect that by his diligent study of reptiles he had made himself known to every reptile in the community. Besides being an ardent student of natural history, Jimmy was very skillful in the art of mechanics. His services were frequently employed by the college boys in making various useful articles for their rooms. He also was employed by the Registrar of the college to do work in and about the college buildings. Jimmy had been attending college for several years and had become quite well known to everybody. He seldom was absent from school; but one autumn day he suddenly disappeared. His absence was soon observed by all. Many of his associates thought that he had only gone in search of plants or new specimens of reptiles of which he had quite a collection. This explanation satisfied the minds of the students for a while; but as he failed to appear after a full week had elapsed, they all concluded that something serious must have happened to him. His sudden and strange disappearance became known far and wide. Even the leading papers of the country caught up the mystery and published it throughout the land. Tradition has it that it was believed by some that he had accidently fallen into the river and drowned, and that dredging parties were sent out to dredge the river; and that even the professors of the college became anxious for a time concerning the mysterious disappearance of Jimmy. But the report that he had been drowned proved to be untrue; for later on it was learned that he had been seen in a distant locality of New Jersey. Many conjectures were made to account for his presence there. Some strongly asserted that he had gone there to enrich his collections of reptiles. Others more strongly held that he had gone there to rescue from a great chief a lovely maiden who was very dear to his heart. This conjecture seemed the most probable and was most generally credited, for it had been well known among his associates that his affections were bound to a young princess who lived in some distant region. Time rolled on and no trace of Jimmy appeared around the college. The students concluded that in his adventure with the prince who had captured the object of his affections, he had no doubt been defeated and, in his endeavor to escape, had hid in the bogs and morasses of New Jersey, where he finally perished from hunger and cold. But the memory of Jimmy was dear to the hearts of the students, and so, to preserve it for future students of the college, they, one dark night, by dim lantern-light, erected the monument which stands (?) on the northern slope of the college hill.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Miss Esther Green was made happy by the unexpected arrival of her mother on Friday afternoon, who will spend a few days at the Institute.

Mrs. G. R. Bliss and her youngest daughter are staying with us at the Institute while they renew associations with old friends at Lewisburg. Mrs. Bliss shows her interest in our work by meeting with the girls in classic reading. Her rendering of Queen Katherine's appeal to the King in the trial scene, in the play of Henry VIII, will not soon be forgotten by those who were so fortunate as to hear her.

On Saturday, Oct. 13, at 4.30 p. m., a bicycle race was witnessed by a number of the students. The contestants were all members of the Institute: Miss Esther Green, Miss Bessie Brubaker, Miss Laura Fague, Miss Mabel Wells, Miss Kate Goddard. Prof. Aviragnet offered three prizes for the swiftest cyclers. At his request Mr. Vincent B. Fisk took charge of the contest. Miss Mabel Wells took the first prize, going three times around the circuit in two minutes and forty-two seconds.

The Alumnae club of Lewisburg, held their first meeting of the term on the evening of October 9. A full attendance of members and many visitors attested the interest taken in this organization. A choice part of the program was the beautiful solo sung by Miss Gould. After listening to a digest of the current literary and political events by Mrs. Loomis and Miss Annie MacDonald, the following board of officers for the year were elected: President, Miss Annie VanGundy; vice-president, Mrs. T. F. Hamblin; secretary, Miss Annie Evans; treasurer, Miss VanDyke; correspondent for the Philadelphia Alumnae club, Miss Mary Bartol. The interest the recent graduates show in the club work is gratifying and promises well for the future.

The Tuesday afternoon prayer meetings, under the direction of the Y. W. C. A., are attended with steadily increasing interest as the term advances. Their power for good, the chastening and ennobling influence they exert in our lives, cannot be estimated. The meeting of this week was of special interest, since it brought before us the work of the Association in its various phases. Several papers were read and reports given, bearing upon the duties of the different committees in the state and international work. We were made happier by the words of Mrs. Geo. R. Bliss, who emphasized the thought that we should not despair of results, although we cannot see immediate fruits of our efforts. Thursday evening there was a special meeting held for prayer for the growth of our Association.

In order to introduce Miss Minnie Gould, the new vocal teacher, to the people of Lewisburg, Prof. Aviragnet asked her to give a recital in Bucknell Hall. Invitations printed on postal cards were sent to all the families of the town. A collection taken between the first and the second part of the recital produced for the students' loan fund a sum of $12.10. Two dollars were sent the day after by Mr. Eschenbach with a letter in which he said how much he regretted that he had not been able to come. The recital of Miss Gould was a great success. She sang six pieces of different kinds and all of the highest grade, and gave to each of them a special and appropriate rendering. Applause and encore followed each song. Miss Aikin played as usual with great maestria, and the Misses Louise and Josephine Lawshe, as well as Mr. Brown Martin and Mr. Moyer, gave great credit to the school of music. The program was as follows:

1 Air from Les Huguenots Nobil Signor-Salute, Meyerbeer
MISS MINNIE GOULD.
2 Alla Polacca Fantaisie Pour-Violin et Piano, Carl Bohm
MISSES L. AND J. LAWSHE.
3 Der Waldteufel . . . . Bohm
MISS MINNIE GOULD.
4 Caprice . . . . Wollenhaupt
MISS JULIET AIKIN.
5 Holy City . . . . Adams
MISS MINNIE GOULD.
6 Cavanita, (From Il Trovatore,) . . . . Verdi
MISS MINNIE GOULD.
7 Duet for Mandolin and Guitar . . . .
MESSRS. MOYER AND B. MARTIN.
8 Sing, Smile, Slumber . . . . Gounod
MISS MINNIE GOULD.
9 Sonata in G . . . . Dussek
MISS JULIET AIKIN.
10 Air des Noces de Figaro—"I Am Lost," . . . Mozart
MISS MINNIE GOULD.

ACADEMIC NEWS.

The study room is always well occupied during the day.

Craig and Hutchinson are suffering from sprained ankles.

Deibler returned home on October 6 to attend the funeral of his uncle.

Sam Wittenmyer is an excellent violinist, and also plays the guitar and mandolin.

Tom Cooper had a rib badly cracked in the Bloomsburg game, but is convalescent.

Professor and Mrs. Hamblin were guests of Professor and Mrs. Stewart at supper recently.

Cober is crowning himself with honor on the College team. The Academy is proud of him.

Professor in Greek, late for class—"Mr. H—, what do you understand by an attributive participle?" Mr. H——: "I don't understand anything."

The first case of “campusing” for years occurred the first week in October, but the fellow managed to see his sweetheart just the same. “Love will find the way.”

The students who went to Bloomsburg are glad they are students at Bucknell Academy, and appreciate more than ever before the luxuries and privileges which they enjoy in Lewisburg.

Paul N. Reish, who attended the Academy last year, and is now at Bloomsburg State Normal School, is longing to return to Bucknell. He came over to see some of the boys on October 12.

Elmer E. Conrath, one of the brightest students that ever entered Bucknell Academy, is editor of a Johnstown paper and Recording Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. of that place. Mr. Conrath will entertain two of our delegates at the Johnstown convention, October 18-21.

It was with deep regret that we bade Hobbins farewell on October 11. He is suffering from nervous prostration, caused by overwork, and is compelled to return home to recuperate the remainder of the term. We trust January will bring him back to us well, strong and happy.

The Academy team went to Bloomsburg to play the State Normal School on October 6, expecting to win, though deprived of the services of three of her best men on account of the other game at home, but, sad to relate, they were defeated to the tune of forty to nothing, and Bloomsburg had revenge for the overwhelming defeat of last year. The game was free from slugging and the boys were treated very cordially by Bloomsburg. Professor Edwards accompanied the boys and Professor Phillips stopped off to see the game on his way to Scranton.

Jordan, a new Academic student, is a fine baseball player. The Pittsburg Ledger says of him, “He has won himself great laurels in the eyes of the baseball cranks of Erie.” The Erie Daily Herald in an article on a game in which Jordan played says, “Jordan, who has been twirling the ball like an old leaguer, stepped to the plate and drove the ball over the fence for a home run which tied the score and eventually won the game. Jordan's work in the field was of a gilt edge order and if he is not found in fast company some day it will be because he does not care to follow the business.” We hope Joe will distinguish himself on the Bucknell team.

BUCKNELL MIRROR

SUPPLEMENT.

A THANKSGIVING HINT.

Where will a little kindness go so far as in a gift to the Library of Alma Mater? A little gift of a volume or a set, fresh from the press or stained by time, seems so slight a return to the old College that nurtured us! Yes, but multiply it by the years since you got your sheepskin, then multiply yourself by the other good men and true who have similar cause for gratitude, and the aggregate annual growth would make Alma Mater's eyes water.

See the generations of students gaze upon your name on the fly leaf! Hear their resolve to imitate your example! What an intimate and delightful fellowship might be maintained between yourself and the institution by such annual gifts. We need the good cheer of class and society comradship; the stirring enthusiasm over athletic victories. But we also need the close touch with faculties and students which your library benefactions would so easily maintain. Try it this year. The experience will prove so delightful that your wealthy friends will catch your enthusiasm and share in your subsequent pilgrimages to Mecca.

The interest in public libraries now so general throughout our country can have no more important result than the equipment of College libraries, Here books are genuine tools to fashion the fashioners of men. Never before did the schools make such good use of the tools. While the college library today supplements all lines of instruction, it is in itself a field of research in original sources of knowledge. History, Politics and Literature used to be read about; today they are studied at first hand in the college library.

This little homily is to prepare you for the invitation to participate in the Thanksgiving Book Contribution of 1894, when an opportunity will be afforded you to deposit your gift upon the library shelves, and to enjoy the gifts the other fellows bring. Please do not excuse yourself from attending, at least in spirit, for we need not only yours but you. Better bring your bundle under your arm, but if impossible to attend, the expressman may be trusted to help.

If timid about the selection of the gift, or fearful of duplicating some work already in hand, a postal query will bring facts and suggestions of help. Or if not in easy reach of metropolitan book-store, a check or money order will enable us to make selection for you, of which due acknowledgement will be made.

If Alma Mater is not thankful the morning after Thanksgiving, whose fault will it be? Gentle reader let us hope the truthful answer may rise to your lips, "Not mine." Your prompt action may warrant the truthful answer, "Not yours"!

Editorial.

THE success that has attended the BUCKNELL MIRROR is due in no small degree to the very excellent manner in which our publishers have done their work. In our opinion no college journal in the country is superior to the MIRROR in its mechanical make-up and general appearance. The Fred. R. Miller Blank Book Co. of Williamsport has done its work in every way satisfactorily to us, and in changing printers we do not hope to improve the character of the work.

By publication in town, the local editors are able to enter news several days later than was otherwise possible, and the whole journal is more directly under the control of the management and of the editorial board. We thank the Fred. R. Miller Co. for the many courtesies shown us during the past few years.

WE regret the protracted illness of Mr. G. L. Bayard our associate editor in the Academy. He seems now in a fair way to recovery. Meanwhile Mr. Perrin is doing excellent work as Academy correspondent.

We wish to encourage the mention in that column of the athletic interests of the Academy.

BUCKNELL has had good reason to boast of her foot-ball team thus far. We believe that a creditable record is before us. The scores of all games played by the first team up to this time amount to 142–12 in favor of Bucknell. This score represents the results of five games: Milton, Wyoming Seminary, Wilkesbarre Y. M. C. A., Franklin and Marshall College, and Colgate University.

WE know times have been hard and money is scarce; but, nevertheless, the MIRROR cannot prosper and meet its obligations without money. As our subscription list is large you can readily see that it occasions a waste of much time and energy for our Business Manager to collect from delinquent subscribers. If every one would pay promptly much needless trouble would be saved. If your subscription is not yet paid settle at once and do not wait to receive another bill.

WE are well proud of our personal editors but we cannot claim for them omniscience. Before the Alumni complain that they are not fully represented, they should inquire what is being done by their own societies to aid the editors of the personal column. Unless the different Alumni secretaries will enter into communication with us, our information will be scant and often unreliable. BUCKNELL MIRROR is improving as rapidly as Bucknell University and it should be a matter of pride to each Alumnus to advance our interests and to maintain a close relationship with Bucknell in its onward course.

EUEPIA Literary Society, through its energetic committee, has introduced into its programs the mock legislature which has proved so entertaining and instructive in other societies. The co-operation of all the members is desired so that the undertaking may be completely successful. The ordinary programs of debates, orations, and essays are varied occasionally by parliamentary drills, and dialectic exercises. All the Literary Societies are in a flourishing condition and have received many new literary lights and enthusiastic orators. The meetings already show an improvement over those of last year. The student who neglects these meetings is neglecting the most important side, it seems, of his intellectual training.

One of our contemporaries in the Eastern part of the State writes of "limits to underclass mischief" and declares that certain actions of the freshman class "will not be tolerated." This vague threat of course aims at terrifying the guilty freshmen, but it probably has no such effect. We have seen the deeds repeated every year and the threats just as often reiterated by some important upper-class man. The offense charged in this case was that of painting the gate to the athletic field. We can do little to prevent such nonsense; certainly weak threats will have no effect. As often as there is a new freshman class, so often will there be childish tricks by a few of its members, and we have but to wait a little while until this few shall learn to respect the sentiment of the class and the principles of common sense. Some of our freshmen recently spent several valuable morning hours in painting the class trade mark every where through the town. But we feel convinced that our freshman class is not responsible for this action nor in sympathy with it.

It seems a pity to spoil a long clean record; but when we do the spoiling, it is all right. The Colgate foot-ball team, so long unconquered, met more than a match when Bucknell went to Scranton to enlighten the natives. The Colgate team was there in full force and expecting an easy victory. Our game was won by fair hard playing, and in spite of the fact that we lost Bunnell and Capt. Kauffman early in the game. These two injuries are indeed great misfortunes and may serve to open our own eyes a little. Last year when popular indignation rose in protest against the "barbarities of foot ball" it was found necessary to amend the rules of the game and to quiet the public with promises of a better game in future. The rules were greatly improved and yet, so far as our knowledge extends, the list of injured is now nearly as great as it was last season at this time; and poor Bucknell has received more than its share so early in the year. The reason? The referee neglects or refuses to enforce the rules. In almost every case of injury this year, the trouble has resulted from the massing of the players after the ball is down. And yet there is a distinct provision in the new rules guarding against this, and a penalty of fifteen yards for every violation of the rule. It is time now to enforce these rules which all players approve but which are practically void. We hardly desire to repeat last year's experiences, nor to swell this year's "roll of honor." Foot ball is doomed unless our teams will play under the rules made for the protection of the players themselves.

Literary.

TO THE IDOL OF SUMMER.

These autumn days when you and I are parted,
  When the mysterious veil of duty is drawn between
Our fateful lives—will you, still loving-hearted,
  Think tenderly of moments that have been?

Not in your busy hours; life is too real
  Always to wear the mien of fond regret,
And we must work:—so in your heart will steal,
  Some mements when you may forget.

But in the golden twilight of the day that's dying
  When from the western hills the advancing shadows
You, with never a dreamy thought of sighing, [creep;
  Watch the stars as they awake from sleep;

When in the eventide—so free from duty,
  The thickening shadows hide the view from sight,
When Nature—still resplendent in her beauty,
  Lies tremulously in the arms of night;

Ah! will you then look back with tender yearning,
  And dream of one whose life is all for you;
One whose work will be forever learning
  The hopeless tasks that Fate commands to do?

Or is our love, as with so many, only
  A passion; O! so fond yet fleet?
No, dear; I trust your heart—still true, tho' lonely
  Will keep remembrance of a past so sweet.

ODE TO CHARLES XII OF SWEDEN.

The dauntless "Madman of the North"
With Sweden's army marches forth,
And undismayed by triple foes
To Copenhagen onward goes.
With trivial troop and petty fleet
He brings proud Denmark to his feet.
Advancing next to Narva's aid,
Away besieging Russians fade.
Invading Poland with his band,
Augustus stoops to kiss his hand.
Great honor to the potent king;
Let long and loud his praises ring.

ROBIN BYRD.

THE REV. ARTHUR DIMMESDALE'S PHYSICIAN.

In Hawthorn's "Scarlet Letter," the characters of the Rev. Arthur Dimmesdale, the young minister, and of Roger Chillingworth, the old physician, reveal some of the deepest traits of human character. Hawthorne has given the key to their characters in his introduction of them to the reader. In the case of the minister, however, the reader does not realize that the key has been given until, by rather extended reading, he finds himself face to face with the real man, when he sees it in the second sentence of Mr. Dimmesdale's exhortation to Hester: "If thou feelest it to be for thy soul's peace, and that thy earthly punishment will thereby be made more effectual to salvation, I charge thee to speak out the name of thy fellow-sinner and fellow-sufferer." This sentence might well have been repeated at the end of the book as a summary of the minister's character. The word "if," suggestive of indecision and with its plea to her affection for him, is the final notch in the key which fits it to open wide the minister's heart.

The actions of the physician when he recognizes Hester, as she stands on the scaffold, give, at once, a deep insight into the strong will which was such a predominant feature of his character. Nor was his determination less strong. As he sat with Hester in the prison, and sought to learn from her the name of the father of her child, he revealed this tenacity of purpose when he said to her: "Believe me, Hester, there are few things,—whether in the outward world, or to a certain depth, in the invisible sphere of thought,—few things hidden from the man who devotes himself earnestly and unreservedly to the solution of a mystery." And he expressed the purpose which became the controlling passion of his life, when he said: "I shall seek this man, as I have sought truth in books; as I have sought gold in alchemy. There is a sympathy that will make me conscious of him. I shall see him tremble. I shall feel myself shudder, suddenly and unawares. Sooner or later, he must needs be mine."

Roger Chillingworth is but an example of many another man who has been triumphed over by that which he sought to control. In a man of a strong positive nature every great purpose needs to be kept constantly under control, or else it will finally assert itself a tyrannical master. The old physician started upon his quest with a comparatively honest purpose. He meant to discover, if possible, him whom Hester refused to reveal. Hester's firmness in keeping her secret served only to make him more resolute. He apparently, at first, had no intention other than to simply discover the partner in her sin, but when he gave his whole energy to this object, he early found himself impelled by some spirit of evil.

A strong purpose, such as that which impelled Roger Chillingworth, must necessarily influence largely a man's development. It becomes a part of himself, because it exercises all those characteristics which make up his character. The same purpose may oftentimes either elevate or debase, as it is either his servant or his master, as it is controlled, or as it sways and controls him by its intensity. However honest may have been at first the physician's intentions, as he gave himself up wholly to their influence, they began to weave about him a web whose meshes finally held him beyond escape. And not only was his character dwarfed and debased by the imperious rule of this purpose, it even manifested itself in his face, changing its expression, until at times it was even repulsive. It embittered his whole nature, stealing away what good traits did exist and making his great intelligence subservient to his one overmastering purpose.

As the "little things" of life enter so largely into our characters, we should early learn to be undisputed masters of the seemingly unimportant purposes of every-day life. Only so can strength be accumulated for handling successfully the deeper and farther-reaching impulses of maturer age.

A SUNSET AT SEA.

We had often heard of the wonders of a sunset at sea. Its praises were sounded so enthusiastically that we were impatient to enter upon investigations of our own to see if they were not, in some degree at least, overdrawn. So we seized an early opportunity, while crossing the Pacific, to put to the test the veracity of our friends.

At the close of a day, in which the sun had shone in all his glory, a party of five of us gathered on deck at the stern of the vessel to witness his departure for the night.

Almost sceptical of the superior beauty of a sunset at sea to one on land, we stood and watched the sky flushing deeper and deeper as the sun sank slowly toward the horizon. The rosy hue sqread far and wide till it tinted even the East.

As the colors began to pale, pictures, recognized by the most unimaginative, took shape in the sky and in easy succession, passed away, leaving others as real in their places. First appeared a lake as if bathed in a sunset glow of its own, reflecting to perfection the brushwood growing along its shores. The sun of the picture was the bona fide orb which was even then just sinking out of sight in a bank of clouds. By degrees, islands appeared in the lake, and, at one end, a hill, shutting it in with its dark bulk, which contrasted well with the bright sparkling surface of the water.

As this picture faded, another took its place after the manner of dissolving views. The hill at the side turned to a rocky promontory rising abruptly from the sea, while the lake changed to a golden color flecked with patches of red, and the islands in it, diminished in size but increased greatly in number. All was indistinct during the interval of transition, when there came out, clear and bright, a strip of beach by the sea, evidently the scene of some recent battle. The bodies of the dead and wounded lay around, just as they would as they fell when shot, some still grasping their muskets, even in death. The marks of red on the sand, were blood stains from the conflict, making the picture too vivid to look upon without a shudder.

Gradually this paled into a quiet, rural scene. A far reaching marsh now stretched before us. Pools of limpid water showed in clear relief against the dark landscape, and in the midst of the picture was another large sheet of water. Small islands dotted the calm surface of the lake, on which we could distinguish, growing in profusion, great clusters of cat-tails with every stalk distinct. This was indeed a sight to gladden the eyes of the travellers who for days had seen nothing but the broad expanse of water about them.

But the ruddy glow could not long remain. The exquisite landscape changed almost imperceptibly in shape and color, growing more soft and soothing, as it faded from the brillant red, to a color more subdued, then on to a golden light and finally turned to the gray of early twilight.

A quiet restful peace seemed to settle upon us all as we gazed upon this beauty, in strong contrast with the tumult of pity and dread aroused by the lonely battle field. We stood silent for a while, after the sky had wrapped itself in evening shades, gazing longingly still at the place where the glorious panorama had so recently passed before us. Its early grandeur and later calm had left in our hearts a feeling of awe and of blessed peace, the influence of which has never left us nor the remembrance grown dim.

Athletics.

We miss Kauffman and Bunnell on the Campus during the foot-ball practice. Both are doing well at this writing. We hope and wish for them a speedy and permanent recovery.

Prof. Hulley's umpiring in the Scranton game was perfectly fair. It gave satisfaction to both teams.

Probably fifteen hundred foot-ball admirers occupied favorable seats on the natural grand stand on Saturday afternoon, October 20, and saw one of the most interesting games that has been played on the campus for a long time.

The outcome of the game for Bucknell appeared doubtful before time for play was called, as Franklin and Marshall, the opposing team, had been doing good work during the season. Her supporters were so confident of victory that they even offered odds on the result.

Their team was heavier than ours, but what Bucknell lacked in weight she more than balanced by pluck and training.

Bucknell led off with a kick amid wild encouraging yells; but when,after two minutes of actual play, she scored a touchdown, pandemonium reigned. Bunnell kicked the goal in fine style.

After this, touch-downs and goals seemed to be the order of the day, 30 points being scored by Bucknell before the first half of thirty-five minutes was over.

In the second half our boys scored 12 more points in fifteen minutes. Total score, 42–0 in favor of Bucknell.

The features of the game were the steady team work of Bucknell, which was very noticeable and highly commended, reflecting great credit on the trainer; the defensive playing of the home team, when on two occasions Franklin and Marshall had the ball almost on Bucknell's goal line and yet was prevented from scoring by losing the ball. In the evening, Judge McClure gave a supper to the players in honor of their victory. A parade in the evening celebrating the victory, was followed by a bonfire on the campus. Umpire, Young; referee, Apple; lineman, Prof. Hulley.

On Saturday evening, October 27, the heart of every body was gladdened when it was reported that Bucknell had been victorious in the Bucknell–Colgate game by the score of 12–8.

The joy of the unexpected news was not unmixed with sadness, however, when it was learned that Captain Kauffman had sustained a compound fracture of the left lower leg during the early part of the game and that Mr. Bunnell, who has been playing a brilliant game at half so far, had his left knee badly sprained while tackling one of Colgate's heavy men. Both were compelled to retire from the game. Mr. Kauffman was taken to the Lackawana hospital where the fracture was attended to.

It was Bucknell's ball when the game started. Colgate was slowly advancing the ball when, after three or four minutes of play, Bunnell was injured and Thomas took his place. Before ten minutes were spent in play, Kauffman was compelled to retire from the game on account of the above mentioned accident. Soon after resuming play, Bucknell made her first touch-down and kicked the goal. Before the half was over, Colgate had scored a touch-down and Bucknell had scored her second and last touch-down together with a goal. In the second half, Colgate succeeded in scoring another touch-down and, for the second time, failed to kick the goal. Score, 12–8 in favor of Bucknell.

The game was replete with brilliant plays many of which were made by the defenders of the orange and blue.

The star play was made by Wolfe in the first half. He took the ball, broke through the heavy centre of Colgate, dodged two men, and after a run of 65 yards scored a touch-down. Considering the odds our men faced, we cannot commend their good work too highly. Colgate was much heavier, and not having been defeated once during the last four years felt the defeat sorely.

Nearly one hundred friends of the players met them at Montandon and escorted them home. Speeches were made by Dr. Harris, Prof. Bartol and Judge McClure congratulating the team on its good work. Umpire, Prof. Hulley; referee, Prof. Harman; lineman, Jackson.

Attendance 500; time sixty minutes.

And blackened up my eye.

Professor. "Mr. M—, we will now listen to the explanation of your problem." Mr. M—. "I had it, but I didn't get it."

It is rumored that Mr. E. R. Powell has been seen on the streets of Northumberland under the escort of five young ladies.

Mr. W. C. Gretzinger, accompanied by his wife and little daughter Margaret, made a week's visit to Philadelphia, October 16.

Professor. "Mr. S— may state the first theory of retention of images." Mr. S—. "Images are stored away in the pockets of the soul."

The Freshmen won the hearty applause of the University on the 20th ult., by their brilliant display of flying banners and gay colors.

Mr. Gretzinger is having his office moved from the East to the West wing, opposite the President's office, where it will be more convenient.

Professor Stewart is a faithful Sunday School worker, and renders good service for the Master as Superintent of the Baptist Sunday School.

Rev. Dr. Stifller of Crozer Seminary, preached the first monthly University sermon on the 28th of October, in Bucknell hall, before a large audience.

S. R. Wood was recently the recipient of a box of good things from home. At his invitation, a few of his friends assisted him in disposing of them.

All the rooms in College are occupied this year. If the continued increase of students keeps on, we will have to make enlargements next year, for new students.

Mr. F—, in history class: "Professor, wasn't Alexander Hamilton in favor of the war of 1812?" Mr. W— answered, "No; he was in favor of peace. He was dead!"

Professor Hully delighted his Constitutional History class two weeks ago, by reading the early history of Lewisburg. The history was made all the more interesting from the fact that several members of the class are lineal descendants of the first settlers of our University town.

Professor Owens, J. B. Suiter and T. L. Josephs attended the Sunday School Convention held at Hartleton two weeks ago. Each of them addressed the Convention.

L. T. Fetzer and Donald Baker accompanied the 12th regiment to Philadelphia on the 24th of October and took part in the unveiling of the McClellan statue.

Judge McClure is an ardent admirer of our foot-ball team. After the splendid victory of the 20th of October, he gave the team a fine supper at the Baker House.

Every body enjoyed the student parade on the 20th of October; and our team was greatly encouraged by the lively interest taken by the students in the game.

Josephs was made happy two weeks ago by the arrival of his sister from England. Every day now, you can hear his melodious voice ringing through the halls.

The new type-writer at 12 East wing is kept busy by neighboring friends who are anxious to become proficient in the work. It seems to be able to stand even sledge-hammer blows.

We cannot speak too highly of our trainer, Mr. Young. It was largely through his excellent coaching that our team rolled up that magnificent score against Franklin and Marshall on the 20th of October.

Mr. C—, in mechanics. "Professor, you will have to use your imagination while I am demonstrating this problem." Professor. "Proceed; under the pressing necessity of the occasion we shall endeavor to supply it."

Mr. W. R. Woodington of Philadelphia was the guest of Mr. J. C. Stock for several days. Mr. Woodington came up from the city to witness the game of foot-ball between Franklin and Marshall and Bucknell.

Mr. J. T. Watkins of Scranton was an enthusiastic witness of the Bucknell–Colgate foot ball game. After the victory was won, he testified his appreciation of the work done by Bucknell in ways very pleasant to the members of the team. Mr. Watkins is a brother of Rev. W. G. Watkins and is a hearty supporter of Bucknell.

The Chemical and Physical society held its last meeting on the 18th of October. Mr. F. Simpson discussed the Photography of Colors, and Mr. Sheddan discussed Photography of Projectiles by Means of Electric Spark.

Dr. E. Perrine delivered a very masterly address before the Lewisburg Sunday School Convention, held in the Presbyterian church on the 21st of October. His subject was: The Relation of the Secular to the Sunday School.

Pastor Judd delivered a very thoughtful sermon on the 21st of October on the subject: "Buy the truth and Sell it not." The subject appealed directly to the students, and they gave the pastor their closest attention during the entire discourse.

If the Franklin and Marshall boys failed at foot-ball while they were here, they did not fail to admire the good and the beautiful. They were heard to express great admiration for the ladies who were seated on the hill witnessing the game.

October 28 was the day of prayer for the Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions, on which day seven members of the Student Volunteer Band of the University addressed the seven young people's societies of the town, on the subject of Missions.

The delegates from Bucknell to the Y. M. C. A. convention held at Johnstown had to stop off at Bellefonte on their way back and spend the night there. They improved the time, however, by holding an open air meeting near the courthouse which attracted a large audience.

It is very gratifying to note the great interest that is being taken in the Literary Societies this year. In former years it was difficult to find students enough to take part in the debate; now the Presidents are compelled to stop the debate nearly every meeting for lack of time, so many being anxious to take part.

The Natural History Society meets every alternate Thursday at 4 o'clock p. m. On October 25, several interesting talks were given before the society. Professor Fisher discussed Iron Mining of Snyder County, and Mr. Grim talked on the subject of Pearls. The society affords excellent opportunities for all to become well-informed on natural history subjects.

Mr. Homer Castle, Prohibition candidate for Lieutenant Governor, gave a short address to the students, in Theta Alpha hall, on Tuesday afternoon, October 16. In his address, Mr. Castle said that a great responsibility rested upon College-men for the success and welfare of the country, through the final overthrow of the liquor traffic.

Mr. T. L. Josephs, at the request of Rev. S. E. Whitmer of Mfllinburg, delivered his lecture on "The Sunday School in its Relation to the Church to secure a better Observance of the Sabbath," at Laurelton and at Mifflinburg, Sunday, November 4. Mr. Josephs is to be congratulated upon the success with which he has met in the delivery of his lecture.

On November 12, in the opera house, a lecture entitled "A Black Slave Upon a Throne" will be delivered by Rev. Cortland Myers of Brooklyn. All who heard Mr. Myers last Commencement, will be glad to hear him again. It is urged upon the entire student body to help swell the attendance at this lecture. Reserved seat tickets, 35 cents; gallery, 25 cents. The proceeds will be devoted to the track fund.

Coming! The Ariel Ladies' Quartet of Boston, assisted by Mr. McCormick of Chicago, the celebrated Whistler and Bird Warbler. The College Y. M. C. A. has secured this noted company for Wednesday evening, November 21 and feel safe in recommending it as first class in every particular. Three ladies of the Quartet are elegant soloists, while the other is an accomplished violinist. They have sung together for several seasons, and bring testimonials from all parts of the country. Mr. McCormick has entertained many audiences in Chicago alone, by means of his wonderful power as a whistler. He imitates all kinds of sounds, from the canary to the locomotive. Popular prices will prevail. Further announcements will be made later.

During the week preceding the foot-ball game with Colgate, at Scranton, our foot-ball Manager, Mr. Cregar, and Mr. Stock were engaged for several days in advertising the game in Scranton and surrounding towns. As they passed along the streets of Scranton dressed in their garnet turtle-necked sweaters and blue caps and coats, they became conscious of the fact that many of the citizens seemed to gaze at them with unusual interest. They could not understand why they should be observed so closely. The cause of attraction, however, was finally explained when a garrulous citizen stepped up and addressed one of them as follows: "Do you belong to the Salvation Army?" The answer came back emphatically— "No!!" A sigh of relief and,—well you can infer the rest.

Students of Peirce School, 917 Chestnut St., Phila., are given, without extra charge, a series of valuable lectures. Daily "quizzes" in Commercial Law and business forms are held by John R. Cassel, Esq., of the bar, who is a Princeton graduate, and also of the law school of the University of Pennsylvania. The weekly lectures on Economics will be continued during the fall to the advanced classes by Vice President Solly, to be followed in the winter by weekly lectures on Finance by the Principal, Doctor Peirce, The monthly lectures by the Dean, Rev. John Thompson, on Business Ethics, have been re-written and are largely new. The September lecture on "How to Build a Character" was very interesting. There is introduced this year, as last, a University Extention course on Civics or some cognate subject. Max O'Rell will address the graduating class in December.

The Students of the University were startled by the sudden alarm of fire, about one o'clock on the 24th of October. When it became known that the Gymnasium was on fire a rush was made for the fire department. Soon the fire engine was flying through the muddy streets, drawn by the firemen and students. On arrival at the Gymnasium, smoke was seen issuing from every window and door in the building. After some difficulty in getting the hose in working order a stream of water was soon playing on the fire, which was still confined to the inside basement. Willing hands, both of town people and students, rendered valuable aid to the firemen, and in about thirty minutes from the time of alarm the fire was completely extinguished. Both Students and town people heaved a sigh of relief when they knew the building was safe, for the Gymnasium is the handsomest and prettiest building on the campus. Much damage, however, was done inside by the water and fire, which is covered by insurance. The fire was caused by the overheating of a new hot-water stove,

The University of Chicago has discarded the name of Professor. Hereafter members of the faculty are to be addressed as "Mr."

The University of Michigan graduated 730 students last year, which is the largest number ever graduated from any American College during one year.

A correct and well-written account of the Wyoming–Bucknell foot-ball game appeared in the last issue of the Seminary Opinator. The Wyoming boys play a gentlemanly, but rugged game, and we are always pleased to meet them.

The faculty of Boston University has decided to allow work done on the College paper to count for English in the regular course. This seems to be a very good idea. The College paper is perhape better than it otherwise would be, and it is no more than just to the students.

Hon. Peter S. Grosscup, judge in the U. S. courts at Chicago, has been engaged to address the Senior class of Wittenburg College next commencement. Quite a number of Colleges are adopting the plan of having a class orator. Mr. Grosscup's ancestors came from Germany to Pennsylvania during the last century.

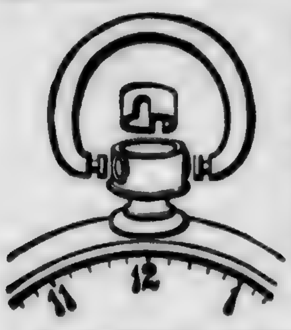
Non-pull-out

is an arbitrary word used to designate the only bow (ring) which cannot be pulled off the watch.



Here's the idea

The bow has a groove on each end. A collar runs down inside the pendant (stem) and fits into the grooves, firmly locking the bow to the pendant, so that it cannot be pulled or twisted off.

It positively prevents the loss of the watch by theft, and avoids injury to it from dropping.

Editorial.

THIS is our last issue before Thanksgiving Day —a good opportunity to remind our readers of the coming Book Contribution to the University Library. Many more books are needed to meet the requirements of the College work. We will undertake to acknowledge in the columns of this journal the gifts made at the Thanksgiving season, this year.

THE Indians now deny our score of 10–0 claiming that the stipulated time had expired while the score was 6–0. Let them remember that the referee was their own man and that he knew his business and was honest enough to perform it. Let them consider also that the latter half was much shortened and Bucknell was thus unable to disgrace the visitors by a larger score.

THE students who attended the meetings of the week of prayer for Colleges are deeply grateful to Prof. Hulley for his direction and assistance. The members of the Association experienced a revival of interest and activity such as for a long time the College has not seen. On those before uninterested, the full effects of the meetings cannot be known, but the leaders of the work have reason to be encouraged with the results already seen. Mr. Allen, the Y. M. C. A. president, hopes to arrange for special meetings of interest during the winter term.

THE College Girls have surely made a success of the square caps and tassels. To quote the characteristic expressions of the ladies and of the College fellows, the caps are "just too cute" and "out of sight." To be sure they have casued much fun and have been imitated in joke by inartistic milliners among the boys, but that only argues their worth. Dr. Perrine recently told us in a lecture that to parody an author's works was to offer a tribute to their excellence. The same principle may apply in this case. "Imitation is the sincerest flattery."

SOME of the students who expect to stay in town during the Thanksgiving holidays are talking of a hare-and-hound race for Thursday. There are plenty of runners in College and Academy, and excellent opportunities for cross-country running. Then let those who are interested arrange for a day's sport and recreation. This exercise is growing popular in many Colleges and is coming to be recognized as of benefit. It is entirely in the open air and yet is without the dangers that attend many out-door sports. Lindemann, '98, is the fast man who has suggested the idea, and others desiring to engage in the game will do well to talk it over with him.

THE members of the Institute may be assured that our readers are wonderfully interested in the "Sems" and that our Institute column is one of the most important in the journal. We ask that every one may join in the contribution of news to that column through the hands of the Institute Editor, so that the Department may be thoroughly represented. We express the universal appreciation of the excellent work of the Institute Editor and desire that the column may be still further improved by the co-operation of others in securing items of news. The literary editors also desire to enlist the talent of the Institute in their department. Our literary column in nearly every issue shows the influence of the co-educational element in our College. There are surely the same possibilities in the Institute.

SWARTHMORE was frightened evidently, but that did not justify their cancelling the game with our team. Such unheard-of demands and conditions as were made by them were ridiculous and showed that the management was vainly seeking an excuse for its action. It was rightly a question, with the manager of our team, whether to give the matter a moment's consideration. There are such things as reasonable terms and there is such a thing as over-weening presumption. "All gall is divided into three parts." Wilkesbarre Y. M. C. A. team possesses one and Swarthmore surely the other two. If they wished to weaken our team by excluding players on terms not suggested to us at any previous game this season—that was a matter between the two teams. If they wished to select the three officials themselves when playing on their own grounds—that was a matter which concerned their own reputation as rational creatures among all foot ball men. But when they insisted that our Alumni and other friends should not attend the game—that was a question of personal liberty and the rights of the public. A pity to let cowardice run away with reason. Yet Swarthmore was prudent to cancel the game.

WE were eager to arrange a foot ball game with State College, not because our repeated victories had led us to over-estimate the strength of our team, not because we were confident of victory in such a contest, but because some wild enthusiasts at State College suggested that they ought to be considered the champions of the State. They based their claims to superiority over University of Pennsylvania on comparative scores. If there is any value in deductions of this kind we would call to mind two or three pertinent facts. State College was clearly out-played by Annapolis even if we judge from State's own account of the disputed scores and plays. And yet Annapolis defeated the Indians of Carlisle by a score of 10–8 while Bucknell defeated the same team 10–0. Are these scores worthless? Are the inferences unwarranted? Then do not claim a championship unearned by solid victories. Our game on Saturday would have been satisfactory but for State College's umpire. In the first half there was no scoring as our honest umpire prevented State running five men with the ball and starting them before the ball was in play. In the latter half when State had the umpire those plays were made in direct violation to the rules. But even then, Bucknell resisted so sturdily that the umpire found it necessary to give State a further advantage of twenty-five yards. And thus they won 12–6.

OUR SOCIETY.

Read at the meeting of Theta Alpha Literary Society, October 12, 1894.

Never yet did any gathering of the world's distinguished men,
Who have made their names immortal by the sword or with the pen,
Meet with purpose that was higher than which brings us here to-night,
For we've met to use our talents and to train them for the right.

Noble men have here before us, laid the stones which since have grown
Into firm and strong foundations, which the years that since have flown
Have supplied with superstructure, winning praise and highest fame
For the men who then were loyal to our Theta Alpha's name.

They have builded. Shall we falter; shall we not with purpose strong
Imitate their high example; fit ourselves to fight the wrong;
Bidding welcome every duty that presents itself to us,
That by this we may gain power, pow'r to do our very best?

Welcome then oration, essay, declamation and debate,
Since they serve to make us stronger to o'ercome what men call fate.
In this hall we'll argue questions, deep, profound, of grave import;
Here the eloquence of masters will secure a wide report.

As the world has heard our brothers, those who've gone out from these halls,
It shall likewise hear from others, who are now within these walls.
Men shall ask in great amazement, "Whence are these who speak so well?"
And the answer shall be given, "Don't you know? The're from Bucknell."

Let the Theta stand for tharsos, meaning courage, fear abhorred.
Let the Alpha mean anasso being master of, or lord.
Let "still onward" be our motto, and success be still our aim,
And the world shall own our power, and all men ascribe us fame.

THE HUMAN FACE.

The panorama of a man's life is his face, whether it be white, black, red or yellow. God, when he created man, put the features of the face so under the control of the spirit, that it may also be called the mirror of the soul.

If one should stand for an hour or two at one of the crowded street corners of some large city, as New York or Philadelphia, and carefully watch the faces of the bustling crowd, he would have more pictures, in his mind, of love, hatred, wealth and poverty, than the reading of a dozen of the best novels could possibly give him.

Here struts the pompous statesman almost running over a poor blind woman. There hurries the busy merchant, neither looking to the right nor to the left, his mind intent on the puzzling problem of how to get rid of last year's goods or of getting some new materials without paying the duty on them. Across the street comes the overworked attorney-at-law closely followed by his client and two garrulous stock brokers. Around the corner comes the doctor's gig bearing its tired and hungry occupant to the bedside of some unfortunate being. There walks the Quaker in his modest gray and close at his side the scented dude with powdered hair, tight fitting clothes, cane and eyeglass, languidly watching with one eye that lady, with her arms full of bundles and two or three children clinging to her skirts, trying to elude the wagons at the crossing. Every face bears a different expression, from that of the pious clergy to that of the dirty street urchin; each presents an almost perfect picture of what is going on within. Here also we see the faces of the tried and loving mother, the ever patient dyspeptic, and the reeling drunkard whose ever wet palate is constantly dry. And no matter how long we stand we find a new picture in every new face.

In some faces truth and honesty seem so clear that one can almost imagine all that takes place within the owner's mind, while some are so clouded with sin that to pierce their knotty surfaces seems utterly impossible.

In general, the face of a child shows every internal emotion and as it gradually approaches middle age the face seems, like the heart, to become less malleable and those thoughts which prevail become stamped on the face with everlasting and vivid form. Is not the whole life of yon sad and sunken eyed woman written on her face? Can we not see unmistakable marks of hunger, poverty and suffering in that face? Contrast it with the face of that silk dressed individual who is passing her. In the one we read the story of long and patient toiling while in the other is plainly written the history of an easy and indolent life.

The Christian can be detected by his face and so can the murderer, no matter how intricate his schemes or stealthy his tread.

The face of an Englishman differs from that of a Frenchman nearly as much as a Chinaman's differs from the Negro's. The faces of people of different nationalities not only bear different expressions but every individual in every land.

Though many have similar prominent features, a close observer can detect many changes due only to the individual himself.

The face might be likened to a piece of canvas on which nature must paint the story of a life. But hard it is to believe, when gazing through the window at the passing throngs, that all those expressive faces were once blanks on which the painter, Nature, has only done his duty in recording the details of life.

It seems strange that man does not bridle his actions more when he knows, only too well, that all will be shown through the medium of his face and, stranger still does it seem, that he does not strive to keep that which was once made in the image of the Almighty as nearly as possible in its original and unblemished condition.

THE QUEEN CITY OF THE DOMINION.

On the northern shore of Lake Ontario lies fair Toronto, one of the most attractive cities to be found either in the United States or in Canada.

In the early days of its settlement it was known by the old English name, York, but some years ago its British title gave place to the more pleasing word Toronto, of Indian derivation.

The situation of the city is in every respect most desirable.

Before it the wide expanse of Lake Ontario extends beyond the distant horizon, while the bay formed by an island and peninsula lying opposite, affords a fine harbor for the numerous vessels constantly bringing their cargoes to this port.

Receding from the water, the city extends for some miles inland, occupying a broad level space, which rises very gently until it reaches abrupt hills crowned with villas and extensive estates. The streets are conveniently laid out at right angles, and very clean owing to their pavement of asphalt and cedar, while many are lined with shade-trees.

The business portion of Toronto is all life and stir, for its position upon the great water-way between the Dominion and the States renders it a commercial centre of much importance.

Then, too, numerous manufactories dot its entire water-front, giving employment to a large industrious population.

A well appointed electric street railway makes travel from one part of the city to another exceedingly delightful, and as the system of transfers is largely used, a long ride may be had for but a small sum of money.

The Queen City of the Dominion is preëminently a place of homes. The greater proportion of the houses are built in rows called "terraces," and by their cosy appearance indicate extreme comfort. The number of beautiful establishments is also very noticeable, many of them most ornate creations of rich-toned brick and cut brown stone, about which in pleasing contrast lie velvet lawns and carefully tended beds of gay flowers.

The English love for horticulture forms one of the most charming features of the city, for everywhere the pretty blossoms may be seen in great profusion, brightening alike the palatial home of the statesman, and the humble cottage of the laborer.

In addition to this home-like aspect, so manifest on every hand, Toronto abounds in numerous evidences of refinement and higher education in its manifold departments. Universities and colleges, both denominational and under goverment supervision, afford the youth of Canada the greatest facilities for advancement.

Foremost among these institutions of learning may be mentioned Upper Canada College, one of the oldest schools of the Dominion, where many of its most noted men have received their early scholastic training; also McMaster University, the pride of Canadian Baptists, founded and endowed by the late Hon. William McMaster. Trinity College and Victoria University, the latter under Methodist control, are likewise important educational factors.

The city also furnishes numerous "finishing" schools for young women, while Moulton College, for girls, holds a prominent position in Ontario. This, like McMaster, is chiefly under Baptist direction, and a portion of its buildings consists of the town home of Senator McMaster, presented by his wife for this purpose.

These and many other like institutions of equal importance are, however, but as satellites revolving about their more brilliant centre, the Provincial University, commonly called the University of Toronto. This seat of knowledge, which may easily take its place with the leading universities of our country, is situated in Queen's Park, one of the prettiest sections of the city. The architectural portion, of light gray stone, is decidedly Norman in style, while a campus of beautiful green turf extends on every side bordered by shrubbery and trees.

Not only is great care given by the citizens of Toronto to intellectual developement, but the spiritual in man receives the greatest attention. Throughout the entire city almost countless spires point heaven-ward, thus indicating the presence of God's temples.

Such is a brief survey of the charms and attractions of the Queen City of the Dominion, now buzzing with the hum of life, where but a few years ago the wandering Indian pitched his tent. But Toronto, a snow seen, is a true evidence of the character and enterprise of its citizens; many of whom, even if they claim Canada as the land of their birth, boast a strong tincture of English. Scottish or Protestant Irish blood. In every respect they may be termed a body of energetic. upright, warm-hearted people.

Distinctions of nationality may nominally exist between our sister-country and ourselves, but, in reality, the Queen City of the Dominion is very attractive to every American visiting Canadian shores.

Athletics.

Have you seen the Scrubs score?

We expect a large crowd of Bucknellites at Harrisburg on Thanksgiving day.

Why did Lafayette refuse to arrange a date with our foot ball team? Was it because we are so near to State College?

On Saturday, November 10, Captain Kauffman returned from the Lackawanna Hospital, where he had been confined on account of a fractured leg, to his old quarters on the hill. We are glad to welcome him back.

We cannot account for the fact that Gettysburg cancelled its date with our foot ball team. Last spring when it was an utter impossibility for our base ball team to meet Gettysburg on the appointed date, they were kind enough to lay at our feet the charge of cowardice. They evidently know little of the Bucknell spirit. However, we will not retaliate with a similar charge.

The most exciting and closely contested battle that has been fought for many a year on Bucknell's gridiron was witnessed on Saturday, November 10, by about one thousand people, between Bucknell and the Indians of Carlisle. To the delight of everybody, Bucknell maintained its victorious career by defeating the Indians by the score of 10–0. The game was a pretty exhibition of foot ball aside from the curiosity which the Indians excited. We must admit that our team was outplayed on the score of tackling. The Indians gave the finest exhibition of tackling ever seen on our campus. But in blocking and bucking the line, they were easily distanced by our players. Notwithstanding the fact that our team was outweighed by the Indians, it scored two touch-downs in the first half of thirty minutes, from which Elliott succeeded in kicking one goal. In the second half neither side scored. We must congratulate the Indians upon the clean, gentlemanly game which they put up, and trust that we may meet them more frequently in athletic contests hereafter. The teams lined up as follows:

BUCKNELL.		INDIANS.
Collins	right end	Am. Horse.
Davis	right tackle	Irwin.
Cober	right guard	Pierce.
Wilson	centre	Lone Wolfe.
Wolfe	left end	Austin (Capt.)
Firth	quarter back	Donnell.
Megargee, Carey	right half	Houk.
Elliott	left half	McFarlan.
Jennings	full back	Metoxen.

Umpire, Young; referee, Morrow, Dickinson; Linesman, Prof. Hulley. Touch-downs, Cober, one; Megargee, one. Goal, Elliott. Time, 30 and 20 minute halves.

Our annual foot ball contest, with State College was played November 17, on the beautiful grounds of the Athletic Park of Williamsport.

To the fifteen hundred spectators, the game was intensely interesting from beginning to end. Betting favored State; many bets being made that Bucknell would not score. True college spirit was displayed before, throughout and after the game by the sympathizers of the two teams.

State won the toss and took the ball, Bucknell defending the western goal. It became evident at once that the two teams were very evenly matched. The playing was quick and sharp, both sides being determined to win. During the first half neither side was able to score. The intermission of ten minutes was taken up by yelling and demonstrations. The second half opened with the ball in Bucknell's possession. Wilson made a beautiful kick-off. Play was confined to State's territory until umpire Wolfe gave State twenty-five yards for a pretended foul tackle, never seeing or pretending not to see the foul which one of State's men made. This seemed to dampen the ardor of the Bucknell players, and soon after, Sutter scored a touch-down for State from which Atherton kicked the goal.

On the kick-off, Wilson kicked the pig-skin back of State's goal. The ball was quickly regained by Bucknell, after which Bucknell scored a touch-down. Elliott kicked the goal.

State having once more kicked the ball into Bucknell's territory, they scored another touchdown. Atherton kicked the goal.

The features of the game were Sutter's running and dodging, Wilson's kicking, Wolfe's running and line bucking, and the team work of Bucknell. Following is the line up and summary:

BUCKNELL.		STATE COLLEGE.
Wolfe	left end	Harris.
Lesher	left tackle	J. C. Dunsmore.
Wilson	centre	Hoskins.
Cober	right guard	Dickson.
Davis	right tackle	J. A. Dunsmore.
Collins	right end	McGibbin, Curtin.
Elliott	left half	Sutter.
Firth	quarter back	McCaskey.
Jennings	full back	Atherton.

Touch-downs, Sutter, Megargee, Robinson; goals, Atherton 2, Elliott 1. Referee, Young; umpire, Wolfe; Linesmen, Haley and Prof. Hulley. Time of halves, 35 minutes.

The statement of the reasons for the cancelling of the Bucknell–Swarthmore game, which appeared in the Philadelphia Inquirer of November 17, is too outrageously unfair to pass unnoticed. Bucknell looked forward with great pleasure to the game with Swarthmore. We expected to beat, and Swarthmore, aware of our strength, was only too anxious to crawl into the first hole she saw. And to make a hole, she asked for everything. The attempt to excuse her actions is laid bare in a communication from one who has inside sources of information. We quote from his letter:

"The whole matter resolves itself into this: Swarthmore was scared. She used those exacting tactics simply as an avenue to cancel the game or put Bucknell in a weakened position in case the game was played. This was given 'straight' to myself and a friend by Swarthmore students who were disgusted with such dishonorable tactics. As to last year's game with Swarthmore, Dr. Schell was continually on the field directing and coaching the Swarthmore team. Every time a goal was to be kicked Schell and Brooke (U. P.) were right on the field directing the younger Brooke how to do it. The referee was absolutely powerless and unable to keep them back."

As a purist in foot ball, Dr. Schell is of such recent evolution that no difficulty will be had in securing a newspaper account of a game in which he played.

Local.

Remember the Library on Thanksgiving.

Crawford preached at Milton on the 28th of October.

Fred. Finn preached at Centralia on the 4th of November.

Bunnell, '97, our brilliant full back, is able to attend classes again.

Saul and Ware are running opposition to each other in the printing business.

Some of the students seem to forget when Sunday comes around by the noise they make on that day.

President Harris lectured before the students of the West Chester and Lock Haven Normal Schools three weeks ago.

Carey, J. C. (at table). Why is this piece of meat like Napoleon? (No answer). Carey. Because it is the bony part.

President Harris attended the ordination of Rev. A. F. Anderson of the class of '94 in Washington, D. C., Monday, November 5.

Anderson, '98, spent the 3d, 4th and 5th inst. in Washington, D. C. He went to Washington to witness the ordination of his brother on the 5th inst.

The Indian foot ball team was quite a source of attraction to both citizens of Lewisburg and the students. All were pleased with the gentlemanly spirit of the Indians.

The Natural History Society held its last meeting on the 7th inst. Dr. Groff gave an excellent talk on the subject, Some observations on the Life of the Honey Bee.

The University Sermon for November was preached in Bucknell Hall, November 18, by Rev. Dr. Reese of Philadelphia.

Dr. Aviragnet, with his accustomed generosity, gave the members of the band and some lady friends, a splendid supper at Huth's Café, Thursday evening, November 9.

It is probable that George Dana Boardman, D. D., LL. D., of Philadelphia, will deliver lectures during the coming term on Higher Ethics. Dr. Boardman's presence before the University would be hailed with delight by all the students.

Rev. Leroy Stephens, D.D., father of A. W. Stephens, '96, has been appointed to take the position of Dr. Spratt, as financial Secretary of the Baptist Board of Education.

Many of the students are anxiousiy looking forward to the game of foot ball with Dickinson on Thanksgiving, at Harrisburg. It is likely that a large delegation will accompany the team.

By dividing up some large rooms and changing the Registrar's office, a few additional rooms were made for the accommodation of new students. Three new rooms are already engaged for next term.

The second lecture in the University free course will be given by the honorable Rudolph Blankenburg, in Bucknell Hall, on the evening of December 7. His subject is: Fez., Chopsticks and Mummies.

H. L. Wayland, D. D., of Philadelphia, has been secured by the University to deliver a lecture and conduct a course in Sociology. The lecture will be delivered before the whole University. The course will be open as honor work to College students only.

Through the progressive spirit of Mr. W. C. Gretzinger the water service of the College has been considerably improved. The hydrants have been removed to the ends of each wing and the old sinks replaced by new ones. The change is a great convenience to the students, and is highly appreciated by them.

Arrangements are being made among the Bucknell Alumni to establish clubs in the following centres: Lewisburg, Scranton, Williamsport, Harrisburg, Altoona, Erie, New England, Washington, D. C., Denver, Cincinnati, San Francisco. Clubs have been in existance for some time in New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburg and the University of Chicago.

Is thirteen an unlucky number? Without a doubt. Here is proof positive. The Anderson club started out this fall with thirteen members. What happened? Before two months had passed one of its members met with a severe accident. Is this not conclusive evidence in support of the unlucky number theory? Now let all other clubs take warning and profit by the Anderson Club's experience.

Owing to certain changes which will be made in the Tustin Gymnasium, it is now hardly expected that the building will be open for use before the second term. The bath-room will be made more convenient and other changes will be made that will add much to the comfort and welfare of the students. The work of cleaning up, after the fire, was pushed vigorously, and now the merry ring of the carpenter's saw and hammer can be heard daily.

The first in the course of Free Lectures in Bucknell Hall was given by Rev. F. S. Dobbins of Philadelphia, November 8, subject. "China, Japan and Corea." He gave many facts in the history of these countries; spoke of their manners and customs, of the recent political troubles and especially of the influence of christianity among them. A large audience was present and all seemed to have been highly entertained.

The lecture delivered by Rev. Cortland Meyers, in the opera house, on the 12th inst., was most heartily received. For two hours and a quarter the speaker held the close attention of his audience. The attendance was not what the lecture merited. The small attendance, however, was not the fault of the students, who turned out almost en masse, but was due to the lack of patronage on the part of the town people. We venture to say that every student who heard Mr. Meyers would be glad to have him back at some future time.

Many of the students of our College will deeply regret to hear that the Rev. Dr. Spratt has resigned his position of Financial Secretary of the Baptist Board of Education. The Doctor has faithfully and efficiently filled this important office for many years, and has done much to advance the work of education in Bucknell. For several years his strength has been failing and it is on this account that he has seen fit to resign his position.

To know the Doctor was to love and admire him. His kindly smile and encouraging words have cheered many a drooping spirit. He was always ready to assist the students with his pocketbook as well as with his sage counsel. We shall miss him; but we feel that he has earned a well merited rest from his arduous labors, and trust that he may be spared for many years to enjoy it.

LINES TO A COLLEGE GIRL.

I knew a pretty girl,
And she had a little curl,
And it hung down on her forehead.
And she had a little cap
With a brilliant little flap
Hanging by her cheek from o'erhead.

LINES TO A COLLEGE BOY.

There was a college boy,
Who his time did employ,
Writing sonnets to a cap with a "floppy,"
And from his little brain
There surely came a train
Which a Bryant or a Tennyson mignt copy.

Dr. B— was a distinguished scientist whose nights were given to original research and his days to experiments. The transmutation of the baser metals into gold and silver, the patenting of vermicides and insecticides, and investigations into the source and nature of the glow-worm's light scarcely indicate the scope of his genius. One day as he was busy in his laboratory pondering over some new scheme for the extermination of Vermes the thought flashed through his brain that fruit saturated with a solution of copper aceto-arsenite would serve admirably for that purpose. "Well, well," chuckled the genial Doctor to himself, "it is just the thing. I will try it on these Hermaphrodites. Here are some pears suitable for my purpose." And so to work the good Doctor went. The pears were soon "fixed up" and set aside for use.

Now in the same laboratory there was another famous man, a savant called Professor D—. His time was devoted largely to the discovery of new methods for the conversion of tooth picks and inorganic matter into food. Shortly after Doctor B— left the room in which he had been working, Professor D— had occasion to pass through it. Ever on the alert for something edible his eyes caught sight of the pears. "These are splendid," said the Doctor to himself, as one after another they rapidly disappeared. He had scarcely finished the last one when Doctor B— returned. As the latter noticed the empty shelf, surprise, rage and alarm possessed him in turn. "O Professor, what have you done? Those pears contained paris green." Then it was the Professor's turn to change color. Fear magnified the danger. The actions of a life-time passed with lightning rapidity before his imagination. He was helpless in the hour of peril. The timely application, however, of drastic measures saved him to the cause of science. He still has a fondness for fruit, but not for that belonging to Doctor B—.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Remember the Book contribution on November 29.

Our numbers are still increasing. Two new students from Maryland entered the Institute on Saturday, November 10.

The week of prayer for Christian Associations was observed. Prayer meetings were held in the parlor at nine o'clock in the evening.

At the State Convention of the Y. W. C. A. held at Scranton, November 9–11, Miss Maud Hanna and Miss Bertha Watkins represented our association. Their reports, given at our weekly meetings, contained valuable suggestions for work.

Over thirty members were present at the November Alumnæ Club meeting. Mrs. Matlack reported upon the plan of uniting with the State Confederation of Clubs. Great interest is taken by the resident Alumnæ in these monthly meetings. The program was as follows:

Music,
MISS MERRIMAN.

Sketch of Mrs. Humphrey Ward's life.
MISS MABEL THOMAS.

Criticism of Marcella,
MRS. LARISON.

Social Events,
MRS WM. WALLS AND MISS HATTIE WALTER.

Literary Events,
MISS MARY BARTOL.

Hallowe'en, that festival of nuts and apples so dear to the heart of youth, was most fittingly observed this year at the Institute by a peanut party. The shells of the nuts, tied with narrow red ribbon, furnished unique envelopes for the invitations, which were placed at each plate in the dining hall. The Gymnasium, quite transformed by artistic touches, afforded a place well adapted to the gayeties of the occasion.

Here and there were warm rugs with inviting chairs and pillows, while in every nook and corner, lamps of various colors shed their soft light.

When our guests appeared, promptly at the appointed hour, they began an active search for the hidden treasures, each eager to secure the greatest number.

The distinction of having won the prize was awarded to Miss Gould.

Apple "bobbing" also formed a pleasing amusement, and the fruit gained at the expense of moistened faces and gowns was doubly precious.

Presently, confections were daintily served, followed by other good things so palatable to the appreciative school girl. Gladness truly reigned "Queen of the hour," and as the merry-makers tripped away, no better expression of their happiness could have been given, than the beaming faces with which they bid one another "Good-night."

ACADEMIC NEWS.

Think of the Library's needs on Thanksgiving.

Anstock is developing into a poet.

Hutchinson is able to attend classes again.

The Academy boys enjoyed the lecture on the 12th.

The Y. M. C. A. is not so well attended as it might be.

McNitt has been confined to his room on account of sickness.

Trainer Young says that Bell makes a promising half back.

Bayard left for home, November 3, and will not return until next term.

The Academy was forced to cancel the game with Bloomsburg on account of the Indians playing here.

Some of the boys are already talking about base ball prospects for next spring.

Why does Koser come from chapel every morning by the way of the laboratory?

It is hoped that the usual game of foot ball with the Freshmen will be played this year at the close of the regular season.

"Fanny" Reish, who is now attending Bloomsburg Normal, came over to Bucknell, November 10, to see the foot ball game.

The officers of the third form are as follows: President, Sherman; Vice President, Cottrell; Secretary, Kulp; Treasurer, Evans.

Barclay, formerly a student at the Academy, but at present a '98 Lafayette man, is said to be one of the best line bucking half backs in the country.

There seems to be a mania among the Captains of the Academy team for resigning, one of the first team and three of the second team having left office in that way.

The Academy foot ball team played Selinsgrove, at Selinsgrove, November 3. The game was characterized by hard playing and considerable kicking over decisions. It is claimed that both of Selinsgrove's touch-downs were made after time should have been called. Score, Selinsgrove 10, Academy 6.

Term examinations have been abolished at Harvard.

Seventeen new members have been added to the faculty of Brown University.

Money donated to Chicago University by John D. Rockefeller amounts to $3,209,000.

Honors at Harvard's Commencement were taken by eleven of her prominent athletes.

Yale has 195 instructors, Harvard 322, Cornell 152, University of Chicago 154, Princeton 77.

Yale has offered two prizes of $100 and $50 for the encouragement of extemporaneous speaking.

The Phœnix of Swarthmore is one of the most attractive College journals with which we exchange.

It cost Yale $45,208.84 last year for athletics of which $16,652.43 was expended for the foot ball association.

Chicago University is the only large educational institution in the United States that has no college colors.

The Indian Helper of the Carlisle Indian School has been added to our list of exchanges. It is a neat paper and reflects much credit upon the Indians.

College papers are scarce in England. This is another illustration of the superior energy of America, where about two hundred colleges publish periodic journals.

DON'T.

Don't read this.
Don't use slang.
Don't laugh during roll call.
Don't neglect the new-comer.
Don't speak ungrammatically.
Don't study during chapel services.
Don't shift your chairs or feet about.
Don't miss the lectures and concerts.
Don't miss your college opportunities.
Don't use tobacco or anything stronger.
Don't say mister to a college professor.

HARE-AND-HOUNDS.

For the past several years no interest, whatever, has been taken by the students in hare-and-hounds. It is to be regretted. This is an excellent sport and greatly benefits those who take part. At least one run every two weeks would be of great advantage to the foot ball players. It would materially increase their power of endurance and improve their wind.

Editorial.

AN apology is due our readers for the appearance of this issue of the MIRROR several days after the regular date. The gentleman who usually supplies these columns with scintillating wit and weighty reflections succumbed to the oppression of Thanksgiving turkey and baked beans. The delay occasioned by his burial accounts for our seeming tardiness.

THE value of a good coach to a foot-ball team has been proved to the satisfaction of all by our success on the gridiron this season. Out of only ordinary material, Mr. Young developed and trained a team second to none in the history of athletics at Bucknell. Every member of the team is unstinted in his praise of our coach and the wish is universal among players and students that his services may be obtained for next fall.

THE interest manifested in the literary societies during the term now closing, although greater than is usually the case, ought to have been still greater. While most of the new students have enrolled themselves as active members, there are others who have failed to attend a single meeting of either society. It is generally the case, also, that those most in need of the discipline and training which the societies afford, care least to embrace their opportunities. To be an unqualified success the societies need the earnest support of every member.

IT is certainly a fact that our Athletic Teams are rather remiss in following out the instructions as laid down in the Constitution of the Athletic Association. It is provided by this constitution that each team shall, at the close of its season, elect a captain for the ensuing year. That this arrangement is a good one is seen at a glance, since it both prevents delays at a critical time and allows the captain-elect due time to consider his duties and make all necessary arrangements. That there is carelessness in regard to this matter is seen in the case of the base-ball team. The time for training is near at hand and no captain elected as yet. But four or five members of last year's team are here this year which fact will necessitate the electing of a captain by the Athletic Association.

IT scarcely can be counted out of place or untimely to frequently harp on a thing needful and yet lacking. True college spirit is not selfish in its motives, as we seem to think from the way in which we deal with the subject. It is the individual selfishness that produces such bad effects and is the great enemy of true college spirit. We look to Yale as our great American model college and admire the oneness that is everywhere cropping out among students and alumni; everything for "Old Yale." And yet we fail to see, or, seeing, fail to remedy the defects that exist in our own ranks. It is a fact that, of late, a greater degree of unity and harmony has made its appearance among us, but we are still far from the true college spirit which will make every one work for the common good, regardless of individuality, and hold up Alma Mater as a type and defend her against all-comers. If this is selfishness, it is nothing more than the people look for and admire in a college, and it will be a good thing when this kind of selfishness is aroused in us four-fold.

IT is fresh in the mind of everyone that our team was defeated at Easton on Thanksgiving. It is equally well known that Bucknell was represented by an excellent team this season and many may think that such a defeat was unwarranted; but a glance will show that we could not hope for victory.

In the first place, the team did not practice after the State game, thinking that the game on Thanksgiving would be easy, as we were scheduled to play Dickinson. The game with Lafayette was scheduled against the wishes of all the students including the players themselves. Without practicing and without inclination to play, no team could hope for victory.

But there were other reasons for defeat. Several of the players admit that they were sick when they went on the field, and those who witnessed the game say the boys played as though they were physically incapacitated to play marbles. At least five of them should have been in a hospital instead of on a foot-ball team. It is to be hoped that this experience will teach them to keep at work until the season closes.

A few evenings ago the ladies of the Senior class at the Seminary took it upon themselves to entertain their gentleman friends. To gratify the vanity of the guests, the ladies placed, in the room for the reception of overcoats, hats and the like, a mirror, comb and brush, so that the gentlemen might rearrange their toilets, if need be, before entering the parlors. The majority of the gentlemen, it is our privilege to say, made a proper use of the articles; but some seemed to think that they were placed there for them to carry off.

The matter is about as unpleasant a one as can well come up in college affairs. This stealing of property is the sort of thing which neither authorities nor students are inclined to treat with melancholy resignation. The affair is too serious; serious because of the degrading influence; because many may be deprived of a pleasant evening since a few are dishonest; and finally, narrow-minded and conventional though it be, most of us prefer not to be so intimately associated with thieves as the recent disclosures seem to suggest we are. One cannot but think that the conscience of a man who steals such things from such a place is sufficiently elastic to admit of his taking possession of anything else that happens to please his eclectic fancy. It is, indeed, a sorry state of affairs if one must be constantly on his guard for pick-pockets at a social gathering of students.

SCHILLER'S "HOFFNUNG."

Full many a time men talk and dream
Of happier future days.
Some joyous golden goal they seem
To think beyond their gaze.
The world may older, younger grow,
Still man hopes brighter days to know.

Hope early in our lives appears,
Nor leaves with parting breath.
Her magic light the youth allures,
Nor buried is in death,
For though the weary course be through
Yet on the grave Hope springs anew.

No idle, flattering dream is this
By foolish brain conceived,
For speaks the heart of future bliss
In tones to be believed;
And when we hear that inner voice
Shall we not in its cheer rejoice?

THE ORANGE AND THE BLUE.

Now raise aloft our colors, boys,
The orange and the blue.
And lift your voices in a shout,
For Bucknell, brave and true.
Let every one join in our song,
And sing it with a zeal.
And let them know we'll have fair play
Or they will hear us squeal.

CHORUS.—Hurrah, hurrah, for Bucknell's team,
They're ready for the fray—
With muscles strong and active brain
They'll bring their foe to bay.

We want no umpire who's unfair
To give the game away,
But honest play and honest men
We hope to meet to-day.
Then raise your voices in a shout
And let our colors fly
Until they flutter all above
And fill the earth and sky.

Bucknell has played the game before
And made a record too,
And honored are her colors bright—
The orange and the blue.
Now let us cheer our loyal boys,
For they deserve it well;
Each one's a man of whom we're proud—
Our boys from old Bucknell.

LITTLE SNOWBIRD.

A Legend of the Chillisquaque Valley.

Near the middle of the last century one of the most important Indian villages in Central Pennsylvania was at Sunbury. The Delaware Indians, who originally occupied the surrounding country, had been conquered by their neighbors on the North, the Huron–Iroquois. To keep them in subjection, it was necessary to have a representative of the Six Nations among them. For the place was chosen Shikellamy, who established his headquarters at Sunbury in 1728. The great warpath of the Iroquois led down the West Branch from Williamsport to Sunbury. The latter place and Muncy marked the junction of many paths to the main trail. As many parties, both for war and hunting, passed through the place, it is not strange that a town grew up below the forks of the Susquehanna. The reputation of the settlement was not very high, judging from the report of Rev. David Brainerd, who visited Shikellamy in 1745. He says that there were about fifty houses with three hundred people, and that these Delawares "were accounted the most drunken, mischievous and ruffian-like fellows of any in theseparts, and Satan seemed to have his seat in this town in an eminent degree."

One November evening, in the year of which I write, a tall, dark Indian might have been seen leaving the settlement at Sunbury. He carried a blanket and a rifle whose finish spoke of its French manufacture. Gliding quickly to the shore of the North Branch, he drew forth a canoe, sprang in and paddled down to where the waters of the North and West Branches mingle. Turning to the right and keeping well in shore, the canoe skimmed up the West Branch. Who is this who rows so hard and keeps so close to the shore that the branches of the overhanging trees brush his face? Listen. It is White Moccasin, one of Shikellamy's subordinates, reputed to be fearless, but treacherous and cruel. Just above the forest-covered Montour Ridge, the Chillisquaque, "the resort of the snow birds," discharges into the West Branch. For a little way the creek flows at the base of the mountain, fretting among the rocks or lying dark and still in shady nooks which the sunlight never penetrates. Soon it leaves the mountain's shadow and flows between meadows, now covered with corn and wheat or waving with golden rod, then untrodden forest, save where the squaw tilled her patch of corn or the hunter pursued his game. Again we find the hills closing down upon the stream and a ridge of limestone appears to the northwest. Just below where the creek comes close to the foot of the ridge is now a village, made up, principally, of farm houses, and called Mexico. Upon the November night when White Moccasin put off from Sunbury, it was the camp of a small band of Delawares, who lived upon the stream during the summer, their winter quarters being where Danville now is. Among those in the summer camp was Little Snowbird, the niece of the old chief. Once he had been powerful, but the snows of many winters had chilled his blood and the great Six Nations had weakened his band, so that he had been forced to submit nominally to their rule.

But the heart of the old man was young and holpeful yet. He believed that the day would come when the Delawares would be restored to their rights, and the Huron–Iroquois forever driven from the shores of the Chillisquaque, where the old chief was born. He had no son to whom he could entrust his hopes and whom he could fill with his own burning hatred of the Six Nations. But when Bounding Deer came to pay court to Little Snowbird, this young, brave fellow, who listened so well to the chief, became as a son to him. "Ah," said the old man, "the hickory must soon go down, but from its root shall come a sapling which shall tower above the Iroquois like the hickory above the moles of the forest."

One day there came to the camp White Moccasin with a message from Shikellamy. He saw Little Snowbird in her uncle's wigwam. After this it seemed necessary for White Moccasin to visit the camp at the mouth of the Mahoning very often. He soon found that not only was the old chief a covert enemy of his tribe, but that Bounding Deer was an apt pupil of the old man and a dangerous rival in the affections of the niece. Presently word came to the camp that a great council was to be held by the Six Nations and men must go from every tribe to learn what would be done. The old Delaware looked about him. He, alas, was too old to make the journey. White Moccasin was at his side. "Send Bounding Deer," said he. Still the old warrior hesitated. The Great Spirit would soon summon him to the Great Council and Bounding Deer must be by him then. Little Snowbird heard all and said nothing. In a few days White Moccasin came to say that Shikellamy especially desired Bounding Deer to go to the Council. That night the old chief told the young brave of the request of the Huron–Iroquois chief. The young man was eager to go. He could even leave Little Snowbird. "Go, my son," said the chief. "Remember, you are a wolf among dogs. Listen well, and bear back the words they utter. When you return Little Snowbird will go to the lodge of Bounding Deer, for before the snow birds twitter again upon the banks of the Chillisquaque I shall be in the Happy Hunting Grounds."

When Bounding Deer was gone White Moccasin came still more frequently to the summer camp upon the Chillisquaque. Little Snowbird feared to complain to her uncle lest she call down the vengeance of the Iroquois upon her uncle as well as her lover. One day when White Moccasin came to the lodge, he found a folded bit of birch bark upon the ground. When he left the camp he opened it and saw some rude pictures, which to white men would mean nothing. Upon the upper left hand corner was a pile of ears of Indian corn. To the right were two crescent-shaped figures, followed by two circles, the first, open; the second, half-blackened. Next were two drawings of the half-blackened circle appearing above a mountain. Below was the drawing of a stream, with an arrow marking the direction of the flow. Up the stream was a number of lodges. Near the center a trail crossed the stream, and to the left was a tree with several maple leaves about it. Toward this a squaw, from the camp up the creek, was coming while a brave was coming from an encampment upon the trail. On the lower right hand corner was the figure of a deer. To White Moccasin it meant that when the second new moon after Indian corn harvest had waned one-half and risen twice, Bounding Deer, at moonrise, would meet Little Snowbird at the maple where the trail from the Mahoning village crossed the Chillisquaque. To-night is the appointed time and that is why the Iroquois rows so silently up the West Branch and turns into the Chillisquaque. Up the stream he paddles until he is within a quarter of a mile of the trysting spot. Here a smaller stream joins the creek. Up this he pushes until he can conceal his canoe in the bushes. He creeps up the creek until the maple is in sight. It is a clear November night. Little disturbs the silence but the ripple of the water. As White Moccasin watches, he sees a faint glow in the east. The stars grow pale. A gleam of silver shows along the mountain top. A shaking of the branches and Bounding Deer descends from the maple. The light in the east grows stronger. Pushing through the bushes, Bounding Deer goes to the water's edge. A canoe grates upon the pebbles. The moon is just above the top of the mountain. The bushes part again. Bounding Deer and Little Snowbird seat themselves by the maple. White Moccasin moves. He is close to a forked sycamore now. He slowly rises. A dry twig snaps under him. Bounding Deer springs to his feet. He cautiously moves into the moonlight and peers about him. A sharp crack rings out. A little wreath of smoke curls up from the forked sycamore. Bounding Deer staggers forward and falls.

When the old chief wakes the next morning he sees Little Snowbird sitting in her canoe, holding the head of her dead lover upon her knee. He hastens to her and when she tells how Bounding Deer was killed, the old chief buries his face in his hands and the old worrior and the young brave journey to the spirit land together. But Bounding Deer was avenged, for before the snow birds left their winter homes upon the Chillisquaque, his younger brother had a new scalp drying in his wigwam and Shikellamy wondered why White Moccasin lingered so long upon the trail of the beaver. It is said that Little Snowbird was adopted by the famous Madame Montour, who gave the name Montour to the mountain and county, and that the Indian girl even intended to marry a son of the "White squaw." But during an epidemic of small pox she sickened, and soon her spirit joined that of Bounding Deer in the Red Man's Paradise. To-day the simple country folk will tell you that when there is a new moon immediately after the Indian corn is cut, then two days after the last quarter of the second new moon following, the canoe of Little Snowbird will be seen gliding up the creek just after moonrise, bearing the Indian maiden and her dying lover. Whether this be true or not, the reader can decide for himself on the night in question. The spot where Bounding Deer was murdered is marked by the maple and sycamore. which still stand below the bridge which crosses the Chillisquaque just east of Pottsgrove.

THE CHARACTER OF EDMUND.

In speaking of the tragedy of King Lear, Hazlitt has said: "Shakespeare's mastery over his subject, if it was not art, was owing to a knowledge of the connecting links of the passions, and their effect upon the mind, still more wonderful than any systematic adherence to rules; and that anticipated and outdid all the efforts of the most refined art not inspired and rendered instinctive by genius." How delicately does he treat this enormous tragedy, carrying along as he does a tragedy within a tragedy, namely, that of Lear and his daughters; and that of Gloster and his son!

What are our feelings when the character of Edmund is first presented to us? Do we pick him out at once as a villain? I believe I can safely say, no.

It seems that from the very first he is somewhat of an enigma. He stands before us in the united strength and beauty of earliest manhood. Our eyes have been questioning him. Gifted as he is with high advantages of person, and endowed by nature with a powerful intellect and strong, energetic will, we instinctively feel that pride will necessarily be the sin that will most easily beset him. But we must remember that Edmund is the known and acknowledged son of the princely Gloster, and therefore would naturally have the pride of the family. And I think it is no more than fair to say, that if circumstances had not developed as they did, he would have remained throughout his life as a personage having nothing more than the not unusual pride of person, talent, and birth, akin to many virtues, and perhaps akin to many honorable impulses. But how easy it is to change the course of a life! How easy it was in this case. In his own presence, his father censures himself because he ever acknowledged that Edmund was his son; he has "blushed so often to acknowledge him that he is now brazed to it." This oft repeated declaration, and the conscious notoriety of it, with pangs of shame personally undeserved and therefore felt as wrongs, could not do otherwise than change any man's life. Whatever may have been Edmund's pretentions to his father's wealth and position before, we now feel that they could not help being aroused and urged forward. It seems to be the only means for him to gain his aim, power and distinction. He could not go to other lands. His shame would still follow and haunt him, and, as has been ably said, "these (the shame and dishonor) would be the ever trickling flow of wormwood and gall into the wound of pride." Quickly we see that Edmund is not slow to take action. It did not take long to mold the flexible passions into those of consummate evil. He was soon possessed of a hard, sceptical intellect, and being uninspired and unfed by any instincts of the heart, he soon reasoned away the consciousness of the most sacred obligations. What obligations should a child feel to the man who had degraded and stained his entire life? That the enormity of Gloster's sin cropped out in his after life. in his sufferings, is fully apparent, when Gloster says: "The Gods are just, and of our pleasant vices make instruments to plague us."

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE BUCKNELL ALUMNI CLUB OF PHILADELPHIA.

The large banquet hall of the Colonnade Hotel, 15th and Chestnut Sts., Philadelphia, was a scene of festive enjoyment on Monday evening, Dec. 3, at the annual meeting of the Philadelphia Club of Bucknell's loving sons. The tables were beautifully decorated with flowers and lights and the colors of the University.

J. K. Weaver, M. D., of Norristown, President of the club, occupied the chair. Seated at his right were Rev. J. H. Harris, D. D., President of Bucknell University; Judge Hanna, Rev. G. M. Spratt, D. D., and Rev. George A. Peltz, D. D., Assistant Pastor of the Grace Baptist Temple. On Dr. Weaver's left were H. S. Hopper. President of the Board of Trustees of Bucknell University; Rev. Harold Kennedy, of Narberth; General Lewis Merrill and Ernest L. Tustin.

After the cloth had been removed the business meeting was called to order by Dr. Weaver, and the Secretary, Rev. R. B. McDanel, read the list of those proposed for membership, all of whom were unanimously elected.

They were Hon. Wm. B. Hanna, D.C.L., Rev. Geo. M. Spratt, D.D., Rev. Harold Kennedy, Rev. J. W. Weddell, Prof. H. L. Atkinson, A M., Class of '59; P. M. Wilson, Class of '73; Arthur Malcom, Class of '62; W. E. Phillips, Class of '77; Geo. R. Callaghan, Class of '66 and W. Kay Lord, Class of '78. Letters of regret were read from J. H. Grater, '72; Prof. G. M. Phillips, '71; Hon. W. S. Shallenberger, '62; and Auditor General D. M. Gregg, '54. All the officers of the Club were re-elected as follows: President, J. K. Weaver, M.D., '61; Vice President, T. A. Gill, D.D., '65; Secretary, Rev. R. B. McDanel, A.M., '88; Treasurer, C. B. Lowe, M.D., '65; Chairman Ex. Com., Rev. B. MacMackin, A.M., '74.

Dr. Weaver said the members of the club and the friends of Bucknell University were gathered together under very favorable circumstances. He was glad, he said, to see so many present, and to give them a hearty welcome to the club. They had reason to congratulate themselves upon the renewed interest awakened in the University. He referred to the formation of similar clubs, composed of the alumni of Bucknell, in Pittsburg, New York and Chicago, and to the efforts being made to organize them in Harrisburg, Williamsport and other places in this State. It was a matter of congratulation, too, he said, that such good news came from the University regarding the augmented number of students. President Harris, Dr. Weaver declared, was to be congratulated upon the success of the University under his administration.

President Harris, upon rising to speak, was greeted with great applause, and made some humorous references to the foot-ball season just closed. He referred to the steady growth of the University and its now almost exhausted accommodations for students. He made especial reference to the courses in history now offered at Bucknell, and paid high compliments to Prin. Edwards of the Academy, and extolled the valuable services of Prof. Martin in the Library. He referred also to the courses of lectures to be given before the University by Drs. H. L. Wayland and Geo. Dana Boardman.

Judge Hanna spoke earnestly in behalf of higher education, and declared his great interest in Bucknell.

The venerable Secretary of the Education Society, Dr. G. M. Spratt, was greeted with applause and responded briefly.

Prof. Robert Townsend, '64, of Reading, made a vigorous and eloquent speech full of loyalty to Alma Mater.

Hon. Ward R. Bliss, '74, urged the importance of College athletics.

Rev. S. B. Meeser, '83, spoke of the personal contact of teacher and student in the smaller Colleges.

Rev. M. G. Evans, D.D., expressed his gratification at the recent advances made in historical studies.

Rev. J. W. Weddell, Denison, '76, made the closing speech and concluded with the singing of an old college song.

This very successful and enthusiastic meeting of the Club was concluded by all present joining hands and singing "Auld Lang Syne," with the college yell as a finale.

Those present were Rev. G. A. Peltz, D.D., '57; Prof. H. L. Atkinson, '59; Gen. Lewis Merrill, '53; Rev. W. H. Conard, '62; Rev. H. B. Garner, '65; Prof. Robt. Townsend, '64; Rev. T. A. Lloyd, '75; Pres. J. H. Harris, '69; Rev. T. A. Gill, D.D., '65;

Sam'l Bolton, M.D., '85; J. K. Weaver, M.D., '61; Rev. John Brooks, '76; Rev. W. J. Coulston, '83; Rev. J. G. Walker, D. D., '62; Rev. R. B. McDanel, '88; Rev. B. MacMackin, '74; C. B. Lowe, M. Athletics.

The game with Lafayette winds up foot-ball for this season, and what a wind up! Surely Lafayette ought to appreciate the Thanksgiving present.

If, after summing up the record, we ask ourselves whether our expectations were realized, we must answer "yes."

For the first time in our history we have had a coacher, and to Mr. Young's coaching we attribute the splendid team work which has characterized Bucknell's playing. He has been steadfastly persevering in his efforts to develop a winning foot-ball team and not only has he succeeded in accomplishing his purpose, but he has made it possible for Bucknell to put a team upon the field next year that ought to win from every team in the state, the University alone excepted. There certainly is not a man in the institution who does not gratefully appreciate his good work, and we trust that we shall have the benefit of his coaching next year.

We have been unfortunate in losing by accident Kauffman and Bunnell; but Bunnell will in all probability be able to play next year, while Kauffman will graduate in June.

Individually the men have played very well and, in justice to such, we feel it right to mention the playing of Firth at quarter, Collins and Wolfe at end, Cober and Hollinshead at guard, Davis at tackle, Wilson at centre and Megargee, Elliott and Bunnell at half. Jennings at full did not do the work he could have done at centre, where he is second to none at Bucknell. The team on the whole was very faithful in practice.

The student body desires to thank Professors Hulley and Rockwood for the satisfactory and efficient services rendered in the capacity of officials in games played.

On November 24, the Scrub team defeated the Bloomsburg Normal team in a very exciting game of foot-ball by the score of 10–6. The game was intensely interesting to the spectators. The Bloomsburg boys always play clean, gentlemanly games. They have some promising men on their team. The Bucknell boys were delighted with the entertainment they received and hope to meet them more frequently.

The first game of the season was played on our campus, September 29, when Bucknell defeated Milton by the score of 54–0. As shown by the score the game was too one-sided to be interesting.

On October 6, Wyoming Seminary was defeated on the home grounds by Bucknell in a prettily played contest. Score, 34–0.

The game with the Wilkesbarre Y. M. C. A. at Wilkesbarre, October 13, was a poor exhibition of commendable foot-ball. Through the indefensible action of one of the officials, Y. M. C. A. won by the close score, 4–0.

The Franklin and Marshall eleven lost to our team on October 20 in a very exciting game. Bucknell's team work was the feature of the game. Score, 42–0.

The following Saturday found Bucknell on neutral ground at Scranton. The strong Colgate eleven were their opponents. Bucknell was victorious, but she had to pay dearly for it, Bunnell and Kauffman being both disabled for the rest of the season. Score, 12–8.

The finest game of the season was played with the Indians of Carlisle, November 10. Both teams played good ball. The defensive work of the Indians was the feature of the game. Score, 10–0.

The annual contest between Bucknell and State College was played at Williamsport, on neutral grounds, November 17. In the judgment of unbiassed spectators the score at the end of the game ought to have been 6–6, a tie. Score, 12–6.

It is not advisable for a team to play another strong team after it has once disbanded for the season. Yet that is what Bucknell did. And the result? A defeat. And what a defeat! If Bucknell's team had not proved itself far superior to Lafayette during the season, we might account for the snowing under of Bucknell, as it is, it is a disgrace. We are told that some of our players really made clear openings for the Lafayette backs as though they were out in full dress, ready for an evening party at the Seminary. It is poor consolation to think that after a season's brilliant work we should wind up with such a defeat. The line-up was as follows:—

LAFAYETTE.	POSITIONS.	BUCKNELL.
Reeder	left end	Wolfe.

Out of eight games played, Bucknell won five and lost three. She scored 158 points against 68; made 27 touch-downs against 13, and kicked 25 goals against 10.

Local.

Saul, '98, preached at Centralia, December 2.

Pease preached at Pittston two Sundays last month.

Douglass spent Thanksgiving with friends in Shamokin.

Hollinshead journeyed to Union Corner after the Lafayette game.

Wilson Geary spent Thanksgiving with his parents at Carbondale, Pa.

A batting machine and a punching bag will be put in the Gymnasium.

Mr. Charles Firth took a flying trip to Chester after the Lafayette game.

Several of the College girls attended the football game at Williamsport.

Professor Hamblin and his wife were visiting friends in Philadelphia lately.

Professor Hulley preached in the Presbyterian Church at Milton on the 25th of November.

H. C. Downing has been compelled to quit school for the present on account of sickness.

W. T. Paullin worked all day, Thursday, November 29. We anxiously look for a reformation.

Quite a few of the students received Thanksgiving boxes filled with delicious eatables and Thanksgiving greetings from parents and friends.

J. C. Stock, P. B. Cregar and J. M. Wilson took in the Yale-Princeton game at New York, December 1.

The boys who attended the reception given by the Senior Class of the Institute reported a very enjoyable evening.

Professor Hulley gave a very instructive address on Bible Study before the Christian Endeavor Convention held in town two weeks ago.

The base-ball cage, damaged by fire, will soon be ready for use. It is expected that about twenty candidates will try for places on the team.

As others see us: "The College girls wear a sort of 'mortar board' cap and tassel that makes them look real sweet and scholastic like."—Lewisburg Chronicle.

Smith, '95, will soon be a professional nurse. He spent about two weeks with Kauffman in the Lackawanna Hospital and on the 28th ult. took Downing home.

Colestock, '96, made a visit home on Thanksgiving, stopping on his way at Newberry and Cedar Run. At the latter place he delivered a Thanksgiving sermon.

Man moves in a peculiar way
His duties to perform;
He hurries where the battles rage
And flees before the storm.

The Bucknell University Club of Philadelphia held its annual banquet and reunion at the Colonnade Hotel, Monday evening, December 3.

President Harris attended the annual meeting of the College Association, held at John Hopkins University, Baltimore, Maryland, two weeks ago.

The preliminary contest in declamation of the Sophomore class occurred in Bucknell Hall, on Tuesday evening, November 27, under the direction of Professor Phillips.

Harlan, being somewhat jealous of the College girls carrying off all the praise and glory with their new mortar caps and tassels, went and bought himself a brand new one.

Powell's ability as a poet is unquestionable. If you doubt it, just consult his latest production. The Battle Song of Bucknell, and remember that he was given only two hours in which to write it.

Miss Rosa L. Hartley is a very clever and accurate reporter. Her graphic account of the C. E. Convention, prepared for the Lewisburg Chronicle, is highly commendable.

Extensive preparations were made by the class in Practical Astronomy to take observations of the transit of Mercury. Owing to the cloudy weather they were unable to get any results.

The interesting account of the Philadelphia Bucknell Alumni Club Banquet, which appears in another column of the MIRROR, was written by Rev. R. B. McDanel, the Secretary of the Club.

We are glad to note the good feeling that exists between the town people and the students. We believe that the citizens of Lewisburg are taking more interest in the University now than ever before.

Agricultural Fertilizers was the subject for discussion at the meeting of the Chemical and Physical Society, November 15. Four papers on various phases of the question were presented. Artificial Fertilizers was treated by H. S. Schuyler; J. C. Carey spoke on Guano; W. E. Hall reported on Bone Meal, and Prof. Fisher explained the Geology and Chemistry of Phosphate Rock.

The "Evangel Trio," composed of Messrs. Fisk, Harper and Flint, spent the Thanksgiving vacation in Philadelphia. They conducted meetings at a mission connected with the 50th Baptist Church.

Stephens, '96, lately received a new supply of first class writing paper which he is distributing among the boys at very reasonable rates. All who wish good paper at low rates should give Mr. Stephens a call.

Some of the boys complain because they were not allowed to take the Seminary girls to the Ariel Concert. Perhaps this is the reason why so few attended the concert, and why the Y. M. C. A. failed to clear expenses.

Professor Rockwood acted as linesman in the Lafayette–Bucknell game on Thanksgiving. The Professor is a great admirer of College Athletics, especially foot-ball, and has done much to keep up the honor of Bucknell on the gridiron field.

The Natural History Society held its regular bi-weekly meeting on Thursday, November 22, in the Chemical Lecture Room of the Laboratory. Prof. C. F. Conser, late of the University of Leipsie, addressed the society on, "Winter Rambles of a Naturalist."

Professor Martin, Librarian of the University, is making strenuous efforts to increase the efficiency of his department. At present he is looking up old libraries and is engaged in raising five thousand dollars among alumni and friends of the University to be used in the purchase of new books.

Theta Alpha and Euepia held a joint meeting, Friday evening, November 23. The feature of the evening was a debate on the question, Should the individual accumulation of property be limited by law? The chief disputants were Messrs. Nelson and Diggs. Both gentlemen acquitted themselves in a highly creditable manner.

The College Alumni are on the third ballot for the election of an Alumnus on the board of trustees of the University, by direct representation. The choice is now confined to George Morris Phillips, Ph.D., Principal of the West Chester Normal School and Hon. H. M. McClure, President judge of the Union–Snyder–Mifflin judicial district.

Macnab read a very interesting and instructive paper before the Natural History Society on Thursday, December 6.

The Bucknell University Club of Pittsburg is arranging to hold a banquet in that city, during the holiday recess. For the first time the members' wives and lady friends will be invited. Undergraduates residing in the western part of the state will also be invited.

A few days ago a number of Freshmen were seen flying across fields, leaping over fences, jumping ditches and acting as if some one was chasing them. When questioned about their strange actions, they said that they were following out Dr. Groff"s hygienic laws.

The Bucknell song, which appears on another page of the MIRROR, was written for the State College game by a well known business man of Lewisburg. Several poems by the same gentleman, lately published in the Philadelphia Press, have attracted considerable attention.

The entertainment given in Bucknell Hall by the Ariel Quartette,assisted by Mr. McCormick,the "Riverside Whistler," was one of the best entertainments of the season. The singing was excellent and Mr. McCormick's imitations were a very acceptable addition to the singing, never failing to call forth merited praise.

Hon. Rudolph Blankenburg, who lectured before the students on Russia, so entertainingly, last year, will lecture in Bucknell Hall, Thursday evening, December 13. Every student should attend since these lectures are arranged for their special benefit. Their instructive character should appeal to every true student.

Professor. "Mr. Junior, what's the difference between a Watt and horse-power?"
Mr. Junior. "Between what and horse-power?"
Professor. "Between a Watt and horse-power."
Mr. Junior. "I don't know what you mean."
Professor. "What's a Watt?"
Mr. Junior. "A what?"
Professor. "A Watt. A W-a-t-t, Watt."
Mr. Junior. "What is a W-a-t-t, Watt?"
Professor. "That is what I want to know."
Mr. Junior. "I don't know what it is."
Professor. "Mr. Junior evidently does not know what's what."

In keeping with the spirit of the age, the various boarding clubs of the college usually have something extra on Thanksgiving day; but never has a boarding club celebrated the occasion in grander style than did the Anderson Club in their Thanksgiving Banquet, this year. Through the kindness of their host we have secured a copy of their menu and toasts, which we are privileged to present to our readers:

(By Permission.)

Here's to the health of the Anderson Club!
So jolly good fellows are we!
We'll have a big dinner on Thanksgiving Day,
If we starve for the rest of the year.

The Junior Debate occurred on Friday evening, December 7, in Theta Alpha Hall. The question was, "Should the rail-roads be owned and managed by the United States Government?" The following have been chosen to speak in the next debate: Wood, Cober, McCay, Rohland, Powell Douglass, Lewis and Colestock.

S. R. Wood preached at Northumberland on the 6th inst.

W. M. Bunnel, '97, has been elected Captain of the foot-ball team for the next year.

The following strain addressed to a fair Institute young lady was found on the campus. It would make an excellent article for '96's L'Agenda:

O darling one! I cannot speak
One half my heart's strong feeling,—
The ecstasy of love, too deep,
Too precious for revealing!

And still, methinks, though words are faint,
I must needs use them, dearest,
Since they in feeble colors paint
What in my heart shines clearest.

O darling one! thine eyes, soft brown,
I seem to see when waking.
In sweetest radiance shine they down,
This earth a heaven making.

O darling one! thy perfect cheek
With flush of early morning,
No sight to me is half so sweet
In all the earth's adorning.

O darling one! O treasure rare!
O flower of flowers! but love me
As thou art loved, then all were fair
Around, within, above me.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

'94. Miss Lizzie Vastine was among the recent guests at the Institute.

'91. Miss Pellman spent a few days in Lewisburg during the C. E. Convention.

On the evening of December 11, the Class of '95 are invited to meet the Alumnae in the Institute parlors.

A number of books have just been added to our library. We are indebted to the present Senior class for this increased aid in our intellectual labors.

'94. Misses Nora and Ida Greene will, after the holidays, enter upon post-graduate courses in Philadelphia; the first in literature and the other in art. Their friends at the Institute wish them the greatest possible success in their work.

The desire among the students to secure "souvenirs" after a reception is becoming a serious matter. There is a limit to all things. It will be necessary to hold such gatherings in comparatively unfurnished rooms if the craze continues.

Dr. G. G. Groff recently gave the Institute students a most interesting account of a pedestrian trip to the White Mountains and Canada, taken some years ago by himself and a number of Bucknell students and Lewisburg friends. We listened with enjoyment to the funny experiences and the droll mishaps incident to camping out, as well as to the historical and scientific descriptions. We always derive pleasure and profit from Dr. Groff's lectures.

November 23, the Senior class of the Institute gave their annual reception in the Institute parlors. The entertainment of the evening was novel and pleasing. Each member of the class impersonated a book, whose title the guests were to discover. One of the best presentations was that of Kipling's "Plain Tales from the Hills." One of the young ladies, with chestnuts hung around her waist, represented "Twice Told Tales." "The Lay of the Last Minstrel" was also ingeniously represented.

The Phantom Party given in the Institute parlors on Friday evening, November 30, was a unique and pleasant variation from the formal reception. The first appearance of the phantoms, as they marched in single file around the parlor, was indeed impressive; but after they began to move about more freely among the guests, the ghostliness gradually gave way to sociability. Many of the gentlemen consulted the oracles as to their future, which was revealed to them in the dim and mysterious light of the gypsies' cave. Refreshments were served in the school-room, which was appropriately decorated with brooms and cedar twigs, while the glowing berries of the bitter-sweet made the parlor brilliant.

ACADEMIC NEWS.

The Y. M. C. A. enjoyed the talk given by Prof. Fisher.

Cottrell has been confined to his room on account of sickness.

A number of the Academy boys attend mission Sunday Schools.

Oliver J. Decker spent Thanksgiving with his parents at Duboistown, Pa.

A. Judson Hanna visited his parents at Pottsville, Pa., during the Thanksgiving holidays.

It is gratifying to note the interest which is taken in the literary societies of the Academy.

Several of the boys accompanied the second team to Bloomsburg to witness the game of November 24.

It is a matter of common regret among the "Cads" that the early snow prevented the usual game of foot-ball with the Freshies.

We learn with regret that Hobbins will not be with us again next term. He will enter Hall Institute, however, if his health permits.

The Academy team had a game scheduled with Williamsport High School for Thanksgiving. It was cancelled by Williamsport on the ground that they could not give our team their expenses.

With the advent of winter and work in the Gymnasium no pains should be spared by Academy students to show the College students that they are their equals at in-door as well as field athletics. An effort should also be made to secure a change in the conditions of competition for the prize cup, so that we may be able to compete on the same basis as College classes.

Personals.

'64. Robert Townsend, whose speech. at the annual banquet of the Bucknell Alumni Club of Philadelphia, delighted all who heard it, is Vice Principal of the High School at Reading, Pa.

By a recent vote of the trustees of Brown University, young women who satisfactorily complete the required work are granted the same degrees as are given to men. At the last commencement, for the first time in the history of the college, five young women were thus honored.

The Wittenberger in an editorial gives the following "four factors that advertise a college: Victorious athletic teams; winning orators; fine glee clubs; and progressive journals." While there may be other good factors, certainly no one can doubt the power of these four.

It's easy to kick. A mule can kick, but it takes a man to lay hold of things and carry them to a successful issue. Great men are not great kickers, simply because they are great enough to comprehend the magnitude of the efforts of those about them and wise enough to be helpful.—Ex.

Editorial.

A cut of last season's foot-ball team will appear in the MIRROR of January 25.

THE holiday season has come and gone. Its good cheer is only a memory. The MIRROR hopes that all have enjoyed their vacation and extends best wishes for a pleasant and profitable term.

THE lectures during this term by Dr. H. L. Wayland, on Sociology, and by Dr. George Dana Boardman, on Ethics of the Body, promise to be exceedingly interesting and valuable. They will be open to all students of the University. The rare treat which is in store for us ought to be highly appreciated by every student. It is not often that the smaller colleges can obtain lecturers with the scholarship and reputation which these gentlemen possess.

THE attention of our readers is called to the interesting sketch, which appears on another page, of the late Honorable Alfred Taylor of New York. The story of his life will afford a profitable study to the ambitious student. Although naturally well endowed, mentally and physically, for his chosen work, he early recognized the fact that the capacity for hard work was the greatest genius a man could possess. As a student, he was eager, faithful and painstaking; as an alumnus, his time and money were ever at the command of his alma mater, and to the MIRROR, he was unswerving in his support. In the practice of his profession, fidelity was his watchword; however simple the task, it was done with scrupulous faithfulness; however small the trust, there was no default. We mourn his loss and to the bereaved family extend our sincere sympathy.

BEFORE this MIRROR reaches its readers, a captain will undoubtedly have been chosen by the base-ball team. Our record at base-ball for several years has been such an inglorious one, that the less said about it the better. It has sometimes happened that, with the material at hand out of which to make a good team, party spirit has prevented placing upon the diamond a representative team. It is to be hoped that the lessons of the past will be a sufficient warning for future captains. We ought to have the best team during the coming season that Bucknell has ever seen. We have an extra amount of splendid material this year, but it will require good judgment and regular practice to obtain a team that will play as a unit. There should be no figureheads on the team. Each man should hold his position by merit. It is argued that there is little interest in base-ball compared with foot-ball. Let us have a first-class team and interest and enthusiasm will not be lacking.

IT is a parody upon fin de siecle culture and civilization that class fights and hazing are tolerated by college authorities. Institutions of learning which should be in the very forefront of movements for the amelioration of mankind wink at mediaeval lawlessness and outrages in their midst. In a republic, where every man's house is his castle, thirty or forty students break into a fellow-student's room, subject him to untold insults and permanent physical injuries, and then defy him to seek redress from faculty or civil authority. Class-fights are no less barbarous than hazing. The moral support which the lower classes receive from the higher in these savage encounters indicates a diseased condition of mind. It is high time that there was a change. If one class desires to have a banquet, another class has neither a moral nor a legal right to interfere. If a student does happen to be a little "fresh" the wider experience and broader culture of his fellow-students should make them charitable toward his faults.

THERE is one part of the University, the library, that many students either fail to use intelligently or neglect entirely. To the former class, it need scarcely be said that a library is no place for gossiping about lessons, beaux or fashions. It is also scarcely possible that it was intended as a place for giggling or, for hee-heeing over Life, Puck and Judge. The other class looks upon time spent in the library as so many moments wasted. They appear to think that the primary aim of a college course is to develop parrot reciters of the text-book. Such work may be all right in its place, but there is a wider acquaintance with men and things than text-books afford, which can be most easily obtained in a library. Thackeray somewhere makes the remark that there is nothing more wholesome and more profitable for a person than to acknowledge and to associate with his superiors. Where can this be done better than in a good working library and the reading room associated with it? There the learning of the past, poetry, philosophy, science and history—the master works of the master minds of all ages—is ranged on shelves for our delectation and for our instruction. Combined with all this, the metropolitan magazines furnish the best thought of the present. Too close application to text-books makes a man narrow, bigoted and selfish; the culture of the library tends to make him cosmopolitan in his tastes, charitable in his likes and dislikes, and catholic in his views.

IT is said that a certain English critic, after making a tour of the United States, remarked to a friend, "It is singular that the Americans who consider it almost a disgrace to be ignorant of Shakespeare and Milton or Wordsworth and Tennyson cannot talk intelligently for five minutes about Hawthorne, Longfellow, Emerson or Lowell." While doubting the entire truth of the statement we believe there is more truth than poetry in it. As a nation we seem inclined to worship what comes from abroad. We ape English snobbishness; we obtain our fashions from London and Paris, and we get our policemen and politicians from Germany and Ireland. In matters of art and industry there is a very large class among us who prefer that which is strictly European. "This is English cloth," says the tailor; "These are French patterns," says the merchant; "This is German cutlery," says the hardware-man; "Here are some English and French novels," says the bookseller, and we buy, because "the article is English, or French, or German, you know." If the question were asked us, Do American institutions of learning cultivate this foreign sentiment, especially in literature? we would have to reply in the affirmative. Not only do they devote two or three years to the study of English literature, but in many cases, a single term suffices for American literature. Is there not something radically wrong so long as this is the case? Should there be this disproportion in the time given to the two literatures? After making ample allowance for the greater importance of English literature due to quantity, quality and age, is not the conclusion fair that our own authors do not receive the recognition they deserve?

THE SWEET VIOLET.

Modest violet, thy beauty
  Ever appeals to me;
Fondling thy delicate petals,
  Most perfect thou seemest to be.

Lovely violet, thy fragrance
  Lavishingly thou dost give,

Teaching the one that beholds thee,
How unselfishly he should live.

Pure sweet violet, thy fashion
By God's own hand was wrought,
To praise the one whom thou servest,
And show to us His thought.

OUR LITTLE MAN.

There is a lively little man who lives at our house.
He's dressed in knickerbockers and a cunning little blouse.
And from the early morning till it's time to go to bed,
There's nothing in the mischief line that escapes his little head.
He's scarcely five years old as yet, and doesn't go to school,
But he has heaps of knowledge of a kind not taught by rule.
He knows that over all the house he has despotic sway,
And when he wants a thing or two there's none dare say him nay.

He knows just where the pantry is, and where the cakes are hid.
And has been known to taste the tarts and lift the jelly's lid.
He's very fond of picture books, the Brownies and all that,
But best of all he loves to scan, when quiet as a rat,
Papa's big dictionary and his ma's new magazine,
And then he's never satisfied till every page he's seen.
And if by chance he tears a leaf he calls it naughty book,
But goes right on indifferent and innocent of look.

He likes to write a letter, too, with "really, righty ink;"
A drop of ink in hands like his will make somebody t-h-i-n-k.
The pen, too, is a weapon which is mighty as a sword,
The way he cuts and tears with it would mutilate a board.
He is a clever fellow, too, with chairs, pillows and hats,
With these he'll make a railroad train and cushion it with mats.
And then he'll ring his engine bell and toot his whistling horn—
Although your head spins like a top this rumpus must be born.

He likes to play a soldier man, and carries a big gun
With such a martial air I'm sure the enemy would run.
He has a trumpet and a drum, and he can make more noise
Than a big regiment of men or half a hundred boys.
He's very busy all day long, and never seems to tire—
His muscles are elastic, and are strung on springs of wire.
But when at last the night comes on, you hug him to your breast,
Mamma's own darling, sweetest boy, in all the world the best.

ADDITIONS TO THE CURRICULUM.

There will be several important additions to the curriculum in 1895–96. The course in English Oratory will be open as an elective to the Sophomores of all courses. Instead of the lectures on English Prose, lectures will be given to the Seniors in the fall term, first half, in American Literature, second half, in Biblical Literature. The lectures on English Versification will be given to the Sophomores, third term, and those on Greek Literature to the Seniors, third term. Lectures on Sanitary Science will be given to the Sophomores, second term, and on Dynamical Geology to the Juniors, third term. Geology, Senior, first term, will be elective. Lectures on Social Ethics will be delivered before all the schools by Dr. Boardman, and on Sociology by Dr. Wayland.

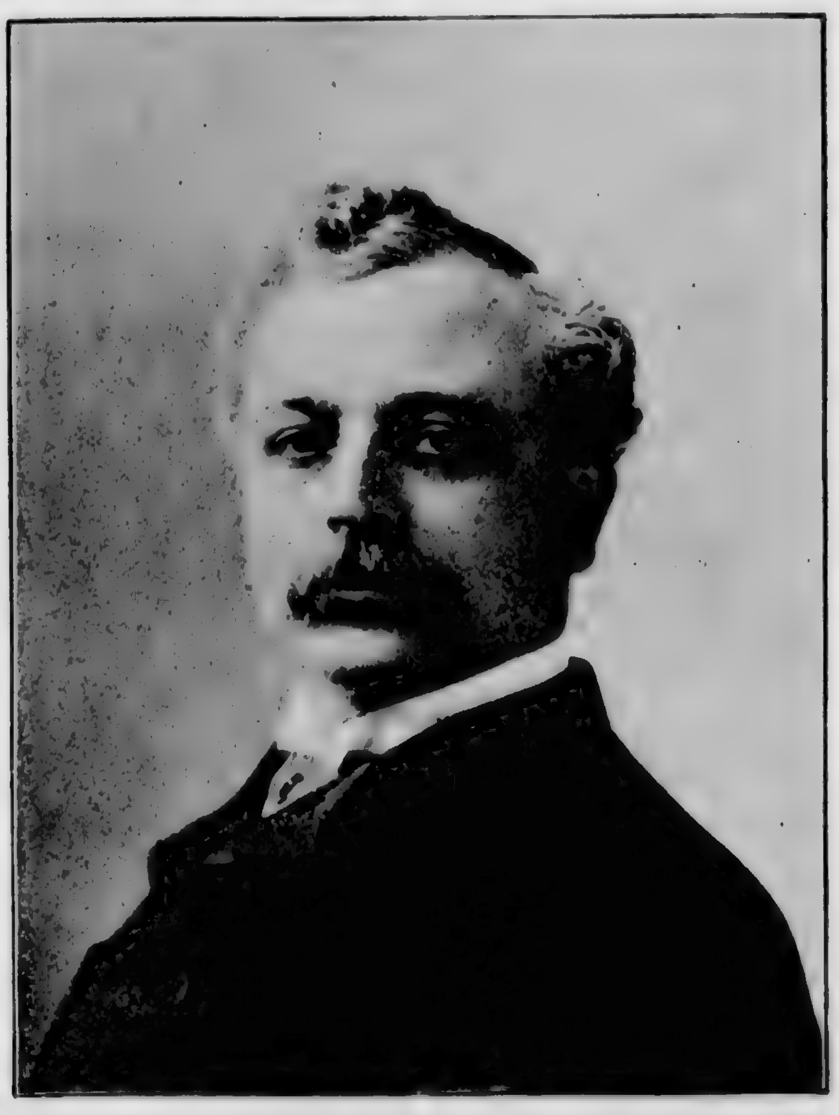
Prof. Hulley will offer a course, open to the Seniors and Juniors, in Parliamentary Law and Extemporaneous Speaking. The aim of this course will be to familiarize the class with parliamentary usage, to develop ability in Extemporaneous Speaking, and to pursue a definite course of Historical Study as a basis for the work. A course in Colonial History will also be given, alternating annually with the course in American Constitutional History; and a course in the History of England since George II.

Additional honor courses will be offered. Dr. Wayland offers an honor course, viz: Sociology. This will consist (1) in a report of the lectures of Dr. Wayland; (2) in reading some work on Sociology with a synopsis of its contents; (3) in a thesis of not less than one thousand words based upon field-work by the student. This field-work may consist, for example, in a visit and study of the county jail; or the county poor house; or a penitentiary, or reformatory; or in the study of some mining town, &c. This honor will be open to all students in the College, upon the usual condition for "vacation honors."

The President will offer an honor to the Seniors in the second term in Physiological Psychology; and Prof. Martin will offer honors in Logic and in Anthropology.

ALFRED TAYLOR.

Bucknell University mourns the loss of one of its most distinguished alumni in the recent death of Alfred Taylor, LL. B., of New York City. Mr. Taylor, since his graduation, has been a close adherent to the interests of his alma mater and to the cause of education in general. As a member of the Board of Trustees, he ever displayed judgment and foresight, qualities which, in combination with a high moral character, have made him a lawyer of note and a man of marked power in securing and retaining friends. To the student body for many successive years, probably no alumnus has been better known than Alfred Taylor. To as many as have had the honor of making his acquaintance, he showed himself a man, in the broad sense of the term, and one in sympathy with the college man and with the organizations beneficial to the college man. While to those who knew him by his actions alone, he none the less showed himself as one who, during his college course, was observant of the difficulties that beset the student, and who, in after life remembering these difficulties, did his share and more than his share toward removing them. And every student who is in position to know will say that, in every undertaking of interest to students and University, the difficulties naturally attending such have been greatly diminished by the hearty coöperation of Mr. Taylor.



ALFRED TAYLOR.

His biography, no doubt, is known to a majority of our readers. But the fact that he, a man in the prime of life, has reached eminence as a forensic orator and distinction as an alumnus of Bucknell University makes his life one of interest for study and his example one worthy of imitation.

Alfred Taylor was born in Marlton, New Jersey, September 11, 1848. His parents, Samuel and Anna S. Taylor, were well known to the early residents of New Jersey, his father having been a distinguished citizen and a member of the State Legislature for three terms. At an early age, after careful training in private schools, he entered Bucknell University and was graduated in 1866 at the age of eighteen. His first step in active life was made at his home where, as principal of the public schools, he gave entire satisfaction and promise of reaching distinction as a pedagogue. But, bent on the study of law, he resigned this position and entered the Law School of Columbia College, New York, completing his course with honor in 1871 and with the degree of Bachelor of Laws. Immediately after his graduation, he began the practice of his profession in New York, in which city he continued to make his office and home to the time of his death. His rise in the profession was rapid as shown by his appointment, in 1878, as counsel to the State Bank Examiner, and by the fact that in 1883 he was admitted to practice before the United States Supreme Court. And the law firm, of which he was the senior member, numbered among its clients many banks, corporations and noted private individuals.

In 1880, Mr. Taylor was married to Josephine Abraham, daughter of Benjamine E. and Jane E. Abraham, of Merion, Pennsylvania. Their mar-

BUCKNELL MIRROR
SUPPLEMENT.
January 10, 1895.

SIGMA CHI FRATERNITY, and especially
KAPPA CHAPTER,

Has suffered a heavy dispensation of Providence in the death of that eminent and devoted promoter and lover of the order, Brother Alfred Taylor, Esq., of the Class of 1866.

He was a most lovable man; to enumerate his friends was to call the roll of the University. He had high mental capacity and was a zealous student. Such work as he did in his University course could not fail to open wide the door to success in his profession, so that his triumph in the calling he chose was anticipated in the judgment of all who knew him.

His demise is a positive, indeed an irreparable loss to his Chapter and Fraternity. Those who heard his kindly voice in the annual festal hall will never cease to feel the inspiration he gave to the assembled brotherhood. He was dear to every man. Words can never tell the loss we feel. Sorrow pervades our ranks and gloom will ever cast its shadow over us by reason of his absence.

We owe him much and we shall ever feel that in him we were highly blest.

ried life was a happy one, but prematurely brought to an end by the death of his wife in company with her only child in 1886. This was a severe blow to him, a man of great pride in his home life, and was sufficient to have broken many a one; but he, unwilling to succumb under the weight of misfortune, after spending a few months abroad, again returned to his profession, determined to drown his grief in work. In 1891 he was again married. Mrs. Taylor is a daughter of Daniel D. and Deborah L. Mangam, of Sing Sing, New York. She is a graduate of Packer Institute, Brooklyn, and brings to her home culture and refinement. He leaves two children, a girl and a boy, Alfred Taylor, Jr.

Alfred Taylor was a member of Rev. Dr. MacArthur's church of New York, and one of the General Committee of the Baptist Congress. He was also a member of the Union League Club, the Lotus Club and of the Sigma Chi Fraternity. Fond of travel, he has been in nearly every State of the Union and has sojourned in Europe, British America and Alaska.

As a lawyer, Mr. Taylor ranked high in the profession. His record of cases before the jury has been one of remarkable success. In argument he was logical and acute, and a careful analyzer and quick at repartee. In the court room, he was a formidable adversary, combining a courteous and persuasive manner with a graceful and forcible delivery.

As a man, he was esteemed by all who knew him, and was loved and trusted by his many friends. Affable and courteous, his disposition was true to what he seemed to be. Having chosen law as his profession, he continued to make it his profession and did not wander into the mazes of politics, which fact may partly account for his continued success. In his business relations, he was never rude nor ungentlemanly, but always remembered that while he was a man, he was but one among many, and that the duty and pride of manhood was to be upright and humane in action. His connections with the University have been very close and his concern in its welfare manifested by his presence, his rejoicings at its successes and his constant efforts to advance its interests. During his college career he was active in literary work and, it is said, attributed his success as a forensic debater largely to the training received in the Literary Society. The traits of character which made him, during his active life, many friends and a successful business man, were developed during his college days and won for him then the esteem of his fellow-students and the honors which were in their power to give.

His death, which occurred December 9, 1894, was unexpected and the news which reached the students on the morning of December 10, filled them with a sense of the loss they sustained in the death of Alfred Taylor. In the remarks which President Harris, his old and trusted friend, made to the students at the announcement of his death, it was plainly to be seen that their friendship, begun in early years, had grown stronger with age, a eulogy in itself, and this thought, in particular, was brought out, that he was a man true to his friends and to his convictions. The Faculty of the University, appreciating his services during life and mourning the loss in his death drew up and had read the following resolutions:

The faculty of Bucknell University having heard with deep sorrow of the death of ALFRED TAYLOR, LL. B., an Alumnus and a Trustee of the Institution, place upon record their gratitude for the helpfulness to the University involved in his life, and their sense of the loss it sustains in his death.

Several of his teachers in the University, though no longer active in its instruction, survive their pupil to witness to the rare promise of his youth,—the early development of the persuasive eloquence that marked him as an advocate; the high sense of honor and the gentlemanly deportment, pledges of his wide social influence, and his large place in the confidence of his fellows.

To one of our number, his classmate, the loss is especially severe, in that Death sunders an intimate friendship, begun in school-days and maintained in increasing depth through the passing years.

Mr. Taylor gave a life-long devotion to the institution that nourished his youth. Always in touch with its history and rejoicing in its progress, he contributed liberally to its needs, his time, his means, his influence. As a Trustee he was conspicuous by his sympathy with the aims and aspirations of the faculty for the growth of the work entrusted to their hands.

The University has lost a son of whose achievements she was justly proud, of whose yet greater promise she was constantly expectant; an officer who cherished high estimates of the value of education to the national and social welfare, and who illustrated in his character and career the ripened fruits of collegiate culture.

REVEREND GEORGE FREAR, D.D.

The Reverend George Frear, D.D., ceased from his earthly labors on Thursday, December 27, having nearly completed his sixty-fourth year. He was born in Wyoming County, Pennsylvania, in 1831, a son of Rev. William Frear, pastor for fifty years of the Eaton Baptist church. Entering the Freshman Class at Lewisburg in 1852, he was graduated in 1856, classmate of such men as Prof. F. W. Tustin, Ph.D., Rev. Miller Jones, Hon. F. W. Jacobs, Senator of Massachussetts, and Hon. John A. Gundy of Lewisburg. Graduating in Theology in 1858, he became that year pastor of the First church, Reading, where he remained for thirteen years. After a short pastorate at Norristown, during which the fine edifice of that church was erected, he became pastor of the Lewisburg church, in 1875. In 1879 he became pastor of the church in Wilkes-Barre. Doctor Frear leaves a widow, neè Malvina Rowland, Institute class of 1856; a son, Prof. William Frear, Ph.D., class of 1881; and two daughters, Elizabeth and Mary, respectively of the classes of 1880 and 1881, Bucknell Institute.

Dr. Frear was marked by breadth of mind and wide sympathy. At his funeral, Protestant and Catholic, and Hebrew were present. At the same time he was firm in his convictions. He was no reed shaken by the winds. He was conciliatory in his manner and while frank was tactful in dealing with men. His mental grasp was strong, his perceptions clear, his expression perspicuous and concise. As Doctor Hodge said at the funeral, whenever he spoke we listened, because we knew that whatever he said was the result of careful and conscientious thought, and that his conclusions would be wise. Doctor Frear had great social power. His presence was everywhere felt to be a benediction. While sympathetic and gentle, he was tenacious in his purpose and persistent in his work. What he undertook, he accomplished; every stone he laid, was laid to stay. More than anything else he was a Christian, a Christ man. He was a believer in Christ, a follower of Christ, and Christ was in him as much as in any man, manifested to the world.

At the funeral services on Monday the thirty-first of December, the University was represented by President Harris and Professor Phillips; the Lewisburg Baptist church by Pastor Judd and Professor Martin. Rev. B. F. McGee spoke in behalf of the Wilkes-Barre church; Rev. Miller Jones in behalf of the Alumni of Bucknell; Rev. F. B. Hodge, D.D., of the Memorial Presbyterian church, in behalf of the clergy of Wilkes-Barre; Rev. J. H. Britain in behalf of the Wyoming Association.

Local.

Santa Claus presented a fair co-ed. with a sugar pony.

A. T. Williams spent his vacation with friends in Philadelphia.

Berger claims that cows in Philadelphia shed their horns annually.

The number of Junior and Senior electives has been largely increased.

Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Gretzinger visited Philadelphia during the holidays.

Dutton and Anderson held revival meetings in Montandon during the holidays.

Kunkle held revival services during the vacation in the Lycoming Baptist church.

The annual meeting of the Board of Trustees will be held Monday, January 10, at Philadelphia.

Professor Owens made a very unique Santa Claus at the Xmas exercises in the Baptist church.

Professor Hulley was present at the Lycoming County Teachers' Institute, held at Williamsport two weeks ago, and delivered a lecture on Constitutional History.

Crawford preached at Milton, in the Baptist church, on the 23rd and 30th of December.

The Registrar's new office has been completed and presents a very bright and cheery appearance.

Macnab was busy during the holidays fitting up the Registrar's office. Mac is hard to beat in his line.

The University catalogue for 1895 has gone to press and it is expected will be ready for distribution after February 1.

Mr. C. W. Spettigue, of Wilcox, Elk County, has presented a handsome specimen of wildcat to the natural history department.

Arrangements are being made by the Alumni of Central Pennsylvania for the organization of a Bucknell University Club in Altoona.

Many of the students attended court during its last session in Lewisburg. Some of the cases that were tried created quite a sensation among the boys.

The annual banquet of the Bucknell Club of Pittsburg has been postponed to Monday evening, February 11, and will take place at some leading Pittsburg hotel.

Professor Martin has been busy during the vacation making extensive alterations. He made good use of some of the students in helping him remove numerous books which are no longer in demand.

Last term's Constitutional History Class set a good example for the rest of the college, in equipping our library. It contributed enough money to buy the eleven copies of the Political Science Quarterly, which were needed to complete the set.

Mr. H. T. Colestock was presented with a handsome lily, while visiting his parishioners in Winfield during the Christmas holidays. He hopes to see it bloom at Easter, and will then invite all his friends to call at his room to see how beautiful it is.

Mr. Walter Liddell Hill, son of President David J. Hill of the University of Rochester, entered the Freshman Class at beginning of this term. The alma mater of the father bids a cordial welcome to the son. Mr. Hill was prepared for college at Lawrenceville, N. J., and completed the first term of the Freshman year at Rochester.

The Sophomore Contest in Declamation was held in Bucknell Hall, on the evening of December 15. A very pleasing feature of the contest was the excellent music. The contestants were Miss Goddard, Miss Rosa Hartley, Miss Sprague, Miss Taylor, E. C. Kunkle, F. F. Nelson, R. Rivenburgh, H. T. Sprague and S. G. Palmer.

The annual election of the Athletic Association was held in Theta Alpha's hall, December 15, 1894. It resulted as follows: President, J. W. Davis; Vice President, L. C. Walkinshaw; Secretary, A. O. Miller; Treasurer, E. C. Kunkle; Member of advisory board, J. W. Davis; Manager of foot-ball team, Charles Firth; Manager of base-ball team, M. R. Collins; Committee on general athletics, H. S. Schuyler, J. B. Suiter and John Cutler.

The last meeting of the Physical and Chemical Society was held in the Laboratory, on December 13. Professor Fisher discussed Plaster of Paris Mouldings. Professor Owens gave an interesting talk on the "Huntington Mastodon." His graphic account of his interview with the farmer, on whose property the monster was found, kept the students in a continual fit of laughter. From the Professor's remarks, it is not at all likely that our Museum will be honored by the remains of the mastodon.

Quite a number of the students spent the Christmas vacation in Lewisburg. Thinking it might interest the rest of the students to know how they passed the time, we, as briefly as possible furnish the information: Macnab, joking; Josephs, smoking. Jennings, sporting; Grim, courting. Fisk, scribbling; Hazen, nibbling. Elliott, dreaming; Nelson, scheming. Diggs, laughing; Sinton, chaffing; Harlan, talking; Purdy, walking. Sinnette, sparking; Rodgers, larking. Davis, hypnotizing; Crawford, memorizing. Laudenslager, sleeping; Dillon, sweeping. Douglas, sermonizing; Lindemann, moralizing.

Professor Martin and his wife gave a very warm reception to the students who remained here during the vaction, on the evening of December 28. The Professor appeared in his best and happiest form. All day long he had been selecting, with judicious care, an intellectual menu that was designed to please the most fastidious taste. Beginning with some light, humorous selections from Whitcomb Riley, he gradually drew the boys on until he had them lost and entangled in the labyrinths of Browning. While the Professor was thus delighting his audience with a rich, intellectual feast, Mrs. Martin was catering to the physical appetite with those dainties and delicacies that delight the youth and please old age. It was a most enjoyable evening, and not until the hands of the clock pointed towards eleven did the boys take their departure, after having extended a hearty vote of thanks to Professor Martin and his wife for their kind entertainment and good cheer.

F. W. Dillon was made happy during vacation by the receipt of a large box of good things from home. Wishing to make his less favored companions happy also, he prepared a banquet for them on Wednesday evening, December 26. A very happy and enjoyable evening was spent by all. The speeches were good, the toasts sparkled with wit and humor, the songs were excellent, and drove away dull care and longing thoughts of home. The program was as follows:

Nine o'clock, - - - - Fun commenced, on signal by the clock.
Address of Welcome, - - - Mine Host Dillon,

Pierce School, 917 Chestnut St., Phila., has, with its great success, won an eminent position, to hold which no effort is spared. The principal's unstinted endeavors to advance the best interests of the students are met by the large faculty in the same spirit of devotion and enterprise. The deepest needs of the young are here supplied. The annual graduation exercises which took place in the Academy of Music, December 21, thoroughly demonstrated the high character of the School. No less a distinguished person than ex-Speaker Thomas B. Reed delivered the annual oration; the famous Max O'Rell addressed the graduates, and Hon. Charles Emory Smith, ex-Minister to Russia, presided.

The Tustin Gymnasum, which was damaged to the extent of over seven hundred dollars by last term's fire, has been opened for use. After the careful repairing and remodelling which it received, it presents a very neat appearance and does credit to Mr. Gretzinger who had charge of the work.

The fire was confined to the rear part of the building, damaging about one forth of the main floor, the bath room, the base-ball cage and the lockers.

The bath room has been entirely remodelled. Its walls and partitions are constructed of faced brick, lined with cement; the ceiling is of metal which makes the bath room strictly fire proof. The room is much better illuminated than previously. Besides the addition of folding doors, there is a door leading from the bath room into another apartment with all modern conveniences.

The heater will be one of an increased capacity though of the same pattern as the one used before. The apartment containing the boiler and heater is also fire proof.

The base-ball cage has been refitted and painted with a view to illuminating the room. The janitor's room has been remodelled and is much more comfortable than it was heretofore.

The heaters, flues and registers have all been covered and surrounded with asbestos. The registers are without regulators so as to avoid the collection of overheated air.

The entire basement has been painted and oiled.

All the plumbing is exposed and the heaviest hardware has been employed in repairing. Besides a freshly oiled floor and a painted border, the main room presents its former appearance.

The expense of repairing and remodelling slightly exceeded the insurance, but the finance committee generously appropriated the difference.

As it now stands, the Tustin Gymnasium is a model of its kind and an incentive to healthy exercise.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Hon. Rudolph Blankenburg and wife were guests at the Institute in December.

The harshly clanging instrument which formerly served as a door-bell at the Institute has been replaced by an electric bell, which answers the purpose much better and with less noise.

A large number of Institute students enjoyed the Chalk Talk given by Prof. Little. Those who had heard his talk before the Sunday School anticipated something entertaining and they were by no means disappointed.

The officers of the Fourth Year Class are as follows: Miss Bessie Noyes, President; Miss Gertrude Case, Secretary; Miss Emma Kunkle, Treasurer. Class of '96, we shall expect great things of you, after the present Seniors have passed on up.

The Y. W. C. A. held its regular public meeting December 9. The interesting program was as follows:

Hymn - - - - - - No. 150.
Scripture.
Prayer.
Solo.
Miss Jennie Davis.

Talk on "Christmas,"
Miss Anna Rodgers.

Selection, "Oh, Little Town of Bethlehem," Miss Mabel Batten.

Duet,
Misses Sarah Merriman and Jennie Davis.

Selection, Scene of the Shepherds, - - Ben Hur,
Miss Elizabeth Brubaker.

Selection, A Feel in the Air, - - J. W. Riley, Miss Mabel Wells.

Solo,
Miss Esther Green.

Selection, The Three Kings, - - - Longfellow,
Miss Kate Goddard.

Seletion, The Bethlehemites waiting for the consolation of Israel, - - - Trans. from German.
Miss Laura Fague.

Hymn - - - - - - - No. 144.

The Lewisburg Alumnae Club held an "Open Meeting" on December 11. The Senior Class of the Institute were among the invited guests. We were all pleasantly entertained and instructed by the delightful papers which were read. The music, too, afforded no little share of the evening's pleasure. The program was as follows:

Music, - - - - Mandolin and Guitar,
Messrs. Martin and Moyer.

Current Events,
Political, Mrs. Vanvalzah,
Literary, Miss E. Lawshe.

Music, - - - - - Piano Duet,
Miss Visick and Miss Smith.

Holmes as a Novelist and Essayist,
Miss Annie Evans.

Holmes as a Poet,
Mrs. Wm. Martin.

Holmes as a Physician,
Mrs. Weber Gerhart.

Holmes as a Humorist,
Mrs. Wm. Owens.

Holmes' place in American Literature,
Mrs. Larison.

Selection from Holmes,
Miss Armitage.

Music, - - - - Mandolin and Guitar,
Messrs. Martin and Moyer.

At the close of the program, dainty refreshments were served in the school-room, atter which was a season of social conversation and music. A delightful evening was enjoyed both by the members of the Club and the guests.

The Senior Class look forward with more pleasure then ever to the time when they will be Alumnae. It is their present intention to identify themselves with some one of the various Alumnae Clubs now formed in the State.

ACADEMIC NEWS.

The Academy foot-ball team has had its picture taken.

Miles, Cottrell and Hazen remained at school during vacation.

The preliminary contest in Declamation of the Third Form will be held February 23.

We are glad to welcome back Mr. Bayard who was compelled to leave school last term on account of sickness.

The new students enrolled this term are Raymond G. Pierson, Henry Darre, Arthur DeVore, Slifer Walls and Mr. Wager.

Last term the Fourth Form read Shakespeare's Hamlet in the Elocution Class. It is not yet decided what they will read this term.

Mr. A. J. Hanna contemplates making a trip south and hence will not be back this term. He expects to return for the spring term, however.

The following officers of the Adelphia Literary Society have been elected for this term: President, Hall; Vice President, Nesbit; First Critic, Hazen; Second Critic, Cober; Secretary Earle; Treasurer, Shuhart; Chaplain, Rowe; Sergeant-at-Arms, Miles.

The following officers of the Hermenia Literary Society have been elected for this term: President, Hutchinson; Vice President, Decker; Secretary, Kulp; First Critic, Anstock; Second Critic, Harvey; Treasurer, Davis; Librarian, Butler: Censor, Perrin; Sergeant-at-Arms, Sherman.

Student (in Greek class). "Professor, were the Greeks compelled to retain the entire Iliad in memory until it was committed to writing? Professor. Yes; but you must bear in mind that the Greeks had better memories than we, since the art of writing not yet having been introduced, they were compelled to memorize everything and thus their memories became stronger. For example, if a man should lose his sight, he would hear better; should he lose his hearing, he would see better; and should he lose both his sight and his hearing, he would feel better.

Editorial.

THE regular MIRROR election will be held on February ninth, when many of us will be released from the necessity of filling these columns. Instead of grinding out such words as these, at the sacrifice of our lessons and the reader's patience, we will be free to write for MIRROR "as the spirit moves" and as studies permit. Others must sit in the sanctum to fill out the pages and silence the hungry compositor. To say that we wish success to the coming editorial board, is only to suggest our fond hopes. We expect the new editors to take up and improve upon the work we have attempted to do, and if they wish our mantle to fall upon them, we are glad to let them have it, although it never was of much service to us either as an ornament or as a protection against the assaults of criticism.

ONE of the editorials in the last issue touching upon class fights has caused much comment. It is true we view such affairs differently at the beginning and at the end of our college course. After we have passed as classmen through the belligerent stage of educational evolution, after we have broken a few worthless heads in a rival class, after we have stained a spotless flag and a beautiful campus and everything else, except perhaps the reputation of our class, then we look back and say "what fools these mortals be" and what a pity to see tired men working so hard to no good purpose. At the same time, we are compelled to acknowledge a lack of proper class spirit among our upper class men. Some there are who care no more to what class they belong than they care for what else is of no hard, practical value in their self-contained existence.

IT is high time for our base-ball players to get down to more earnest work. It was this tardiness to begin training and practice that brought us on the field last year without a pitcher. We have this year several men who might make good pitchers after long hard training, but not one who can by careless practice expect to represent fairly Bucknell's base-ball nine. Every one knows the importance of the pitcher's position, an importance that has been increasing every year; and until we practically realize this in our own nine our attempts at base-ball will be laughable. Now that we have a cage in the gymnasium, there is no reason why the remainder of the winter should not be spent in faithful practice by all the players, but especially by the would-be pitchers. Bucknell will yet be proud of her base-ball nine and may even excel the wonderful nines here in college days of old.

THE gymnasium is now in excellent condition for the term's work. The damage by fire has been covered, to say the least, and we have lost nothing by the accident except through the temporary incapacity of the building. Thorough repairs have been made and the diligent work and personal supervision of Mr. Gretzinger have assured the best results. The physical exercise is under the direction of Mr. Harper and Mr. Bunnell, and, as formerly, the students are required to attend the classes during the winter term. The hours on Monday, Wednesday and Friday are devoted to the regular class drills, including the free movements and the use of the apparatus. Saturday forenoon is given to special instruction in wrestling, boxing and fencing. This department of the work deserves special comment. The instruction is competent and the work is practical. The exercises are taken moderately and beginners are carefully warned against injudicious methods. Practice has started late, but an effort will be made to push on the work so that our exhibition at the end of the term may be even better than usual.

THE question of term examinations has been under discussion in one of our literary societies. It appears that among the larger Colleges in this country and to some extent in our preparatory schools, the tendency is to abolish examinations and to judge the ability of the pupil by his daily work. If, in a large class, the daily recitation is a sufficient test, it is surely so in a class in which each student daily undergoes that test. If, as is frequently the case, the examination differs from a daily recitation only in length and scope, not in method, it is of no use whatever except as a memory test, the very last use to which any examination should be put. If it is intended to supplement imperfect work during the term, it is of value, but in that case should certainly be applied individually. But when the examination covers the term's work in a very general way, requiring what we call original work by the student, and testing his real grasp of the subject, then it serves a purpose beyond that of the daily recitation. It fills a place that nothing else can fill. To abolish such an examination is to encourage mechanical text-book work. What most of our Colleges need is better, not fewer examinations. A mere review or repetition is a burden to any one, but especially to the conscientious student who depends for his examination upon his own work during the term. An examination requiring simply a good general understanding of the subject, is a pleasure to one who has done his work with reasonable care, and will surely expose deficient term work.

FISHERBOY'S SONG.

(From Wilhelm Tell.)

The smooth, smiling sea the bather allures—
A child lieth slumbering on the green shores;
He hears faint vibrations
Of melody sweet
Like voices of angels
Which echoes repeat.
And when in glad yearning he wakens at last
Above him the waters are rippling fast,
While a voice from the depths
Calleth, "Dear boy, be mine!
I charm thee, I draw thee
Into the brine."

POPE AS A WRITER.

In attempting to write upon the characteristics of an author, or in passing an opinion as well, it is necessary to bear in mind certain facts. There is a tendency at all times to jump at conclusions, which fact may do good but is more likely to do harm. And while no sphere, perhaps, is entirely free from its effects, certainly if any one sphere is affected more than another it is that of Literature. People of to-day, in reading the productions of authors of almost any other age than the present, will find peculiar forms of expressions, and words used that have lost their original meaning. With their attention fixed on these peculiarities, they may fail to catch the spirit of the author and thus find it an easy matter to criticise and censure. Now, however,

> "A perfect judge will read each work of wit
> With the same spirit that its author writ."

A perfect judge will, moreover, take into consideration the age in which the author lived, his personal environments. Furthermore, men do not, or, at least, should not judge productions from separate parts any more than buildings from their several materials, which, though in themselves they have no form of beauty, yet when combined, make a structure beautiful and symmetrical. For truly—

> " 'Tis not a lip, or eye, we beauty call,
> But the joint force and full result of all."

Now Pope lived in an age of criticism; an age of precision and exactness rather than one of poetic sentiment and imagination. He was himself city-bred; knew nothing of the beauties of country life; was of low stature and a life-long cripple. In short, Pope was a helpless baby in body, but a mighty giant in mind. Taking these facts into consideration, we may venture to pass an opinion; but to omit these and then judge, is to do injustice to the man and to make ourselves, in the eyes of Pope, at least, characters fit only for his Dunciad.

Looking first at his rhythm and diction, we are led to exclaim—what perfection! If rank, as a poet, depends on form, we must place Pope, whose aim was mechanical perfection and who scarcely fell short of his aim,at the head of the list. But there is more in poetry than meter, more in music than time. True poetry is not written for meter alone, but for a higher and nobler end, that of arousing the soul to a sense of the beauty in nature and art.

We find in Pope's writings many figures that strike us as peculiar. At first they seem very forcible; and yet, after closer examination, they are found to express no new thought or even add much to the old. What, then, is there use? They seem to call more particular attention to the passages with which they are used, and, from the fact they seem at first sight forcible, impress the thought more firmly on one's mind. We may say that they are peculiar, witty and cute, but in so doing we have said about all. To class them as highly poetic is to class them out of place.

But what is true of his figures is far from being true of his mode of expression. We find that his thoughts are expressed in very few words, and in such a way that every word has an important part to play. We find, too, that his thoughts stand out and are made prominent and clear, a fact that is somewhat wonderful, since the briefest way of expression is not always the clearest. Further than this, his writings are so exact, in fact, that they become mechanical. They are also critical, running almost or entirely into sarcasm. Yet, but little, if any blame can be attached to him for this, after considering the age in which he lived and his own disposition.

Is his mode of expression poetic? is the question that then suggests itself. And in view of the statements above we can not say that it is, as a general truth; for these are characteristics of prose rather than of poetry. And yet there are passages that are truly poetic, passages where he leaves his mechanism and allows his imagination to soar, and we wonder why this is or rather why not all like this. In reply, it may be said that it was partly due to the age in which he lived, which did not demand or appreciate that style, and partly to Pope himself who, while plainly possessing this power, did not use it often because it failed to serve his purpose. It must be borne in mind that this was the age of criticism, that Pope was the prince of critics and that this style, terse, open, concise, best served the purpose of criticism.

Wherein, therefore, does Pope's great power and great reputation lie? It is not in the meter, for meter does not make poetry; not in the figures, for figures are but addenda; not in the expression, for his expression is prosaic rather than poetic. Where then? In the thoughts. They have been expressed so to the point that long ago many of them became proverbial. They are the hidden ideas of men's minds expressed plainly, briefly and forcibly. And while his writings are not those of a poet inspired by the muses, and while they do not appeal to the imagination so much as to the intellect, nor play upon the feelings as they do upon the ear, yet they live and are destined to live; for they contain—

> "What oft was thought, but ne'er so well expressed;
> Something whose truth convinced at sight we find,
> That gives us back the image of our mind."

His works are not to be read but studied. And when this has been done we can not help but say as the world has had but one Shakespear, one Milton, one Wordsworth, so, also, the world has had but one Pope.

LIBRARY NOTES.

With the completion of the walnut shelving in the main room, the library will be arranged according to the Dewey Decimal Classification. All reviews, magazines and periodical literature will be alphabetically arranged upon the new shelving, adjacent to the Poole Indexes. The ten remaining alcoves will then be devoted to the ten Dewey divisions as follows: 000 General works, Cyclopedias, Dictionaries and reference works, 100 Philosophy, 200 Religion, 300 Sociology, 400 Philology, 500 Science, 600 Useful Arts, 700 Fine Arts, 800 Literature, 900 History. By the removal of the Cresswell collection to the new room, and the erection of the new shelving in the main room, shelf room for 3000 additional volumes is provided.

The work of completing files goes slowly forword, almost without money and without price. Our kind friends are contributing their attic treasures, our students are giving their mites, our duplicates are being exchanged for needed back-numbers. The example of the class of 1896 is sure to commend itself to other classes. The completed "Political Science Quarterly" will be a lasting reminder of how we can help ourselves by helping others. The completed Andover, Edinburgh, Educational, Forum, Popular Science Monthly, with the rapidly growing Atlantic, Century, Harpers, Philology, Princeton, Science, Scribner suggest the early possibility of complete sets of many other valuable journals greatly needed by both student and teacher. Friends can learn of our wants by a postal inquiry.

The first 100 volumes of Quarterlies sent to the bindery are expeced to return soon, clad in substantial half leather covers. The next 100 ought to be sent at once, and will be shipped immediately upon the order of some generous Alumnus or friend who knows a good investment when he sees it.

The journals upon the Library tables for 1895 are: Agricultural Science, Amercan Anthropologist, American Journal of Philology, American Journal of Psychology, American Naturalist, Annals of Hygiene, Arena, Astronomy and Astro-Physics, Atlanta Weekly Constitution, Atlantic Monthly, Baptist Expositor, Baptist Inquirer, Baptist Teacher, Baptist Union, Biblical World, Bibliotheca Sacra, Boston Weekly Traveler, Century, Chicago Weekly Inter-Ocean, Classical Review, Contemporary, Cosmopolitan, Critic, Dial, Edinburgh, Educational, Examiner, Fortnightly, Forum, Francaise, Germania, Harpers' Monthly, Harpers' Weekly, Independent, International Journal of Ethics, Journal of Geology, Knights of Labor, Lewisburg Chronicle, Lewisburg Journal, Living Age, Library Journal, London Weekly Times, Louisville Weekly Courier-Journal, Mind, Missionary Review of the World, Modern LanguageNotes, Nation, Nature, New World, New York Daily Tribune, New York Weekly Sun, Nineteenth Century, North American Review, Outing, Outlook, Pennsylvania School Journal, Philadelphia Daily Press, Philadelphia Weekly Ledger, Philosophical Review, Pittsburg Weekly Commercial-Gazette, Poet-Lore, Political Science Quarterly, Popular Science Monthly, Public Opinion, Review of Reviews, San Francisco Weekly Call, School Journal, School Review, Science, Scientific American, Scribner's, Standard, S. S. Times, Temple Magazine, University Magazine, Westminister Review, Williamsport Daily Times, Yale Review, and Youths' Companion.

ANIMUS SUM.

I stand alone. The moon sheds her still rays about me and reflects them into my soul from the glistening snow. Through the bare trees, boldly outlined and brought nearer by their deep shadows, I see the river at the foot of the hill. Above and below there is one band across its bosom, the waters are dark, and bear me no message save of stillness and of solitude; and of eternity, for the onward, unceasing flow is there though unseen. The one bright band which the light falls on is a long and broad kaleidoscope, ever changing,—"The long light (that) shakes across the lake." It is a pathway for the hosts of thoughts that come from its myriad of gleams to pass over dry shod, and they change almost as often as the wavelets give new surface for the moonbeams.

To analyze them is not possible. Such thoughts as them are awakened at these times seem born of the soul and not of the mind. The impression can be only dimly likened to physical feelings. The rainbowed wavelets are felt as when on an idle August day one sits by a brook and lets the cool water bubble and gurgle over bare feet, so soothing is their contemplation. But the feelings induced are less tangible. Not the same full, satisfied pleasure comes with the flow of these brilliant, reflecting water-lights over the soul. A nameless longing to express, to describe the influences which scarcely approach suggestions, comes over me: the longing is ever unsatisfied.

So as a child I stood in a forest. Just freed from the blackberry briars growing at the edge of the hemlocks, how cool and attractive the mossy carpet seemed to my weary body! The great trees towered high before branching, and then spread a canopy of thick boughs which would admit but scanty light. The perfect stillness, the mighty order contrasted with the tangle of the berry bushes, the complete restfulness of all brought peace and a nameless sense of delightful awe. I loved the spot without knowing why. But soon fear crept in and I returned to the blackberries. Oftentimes since, the same indescribable effect has been produced in the woods, but the fear has all fled; a thought of sadness now comes instead—or, perhaps it is the old awe lacking the fear. It is not a gloomy sadness, as to make me melancholy; it is a sadness which lifts me out of myself into my self.

A sunset is an ever new delight; yet why, I cannot say. The flowers of the wood charm with more than pleasure because of their perfection and beauty of coloring, or delicacy of tint or mould. Some have peculiar associations; yet a something besides tells me that

> "The meanest flower that grows can give > Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears," or for expression of other sort. The moonlight scenes, too, are full of a strange power that I can never analyze. All Nature in her silent scenes brings me into

> "That sweet mood when pleasant thoughts
> Bring sad thoughts to the mind."

From boyhood this has been my experience. Not that I can say with this same poet,

> "For Nature then
> To me was all in all;"

but I can say with him:

> "I cannot paint
> What then I was. The sounding cataract
> Haunted me like a passion; the tall rock,
> The mountain, and the deep and gloomy wood,
> Their colors and their forms, were then to me
> An appetite—a feeling and a love."

And still they are, but the soft glamour has somewhat worn off. The lessons that they teach I am learning now, and

> "Therefore am I still
> A lover of the woods, the meadows and the mountains," because they reveal to me the open secrets of our God.

MINUTE ON DEATH OF ALFRED TAYLOR, ESQ., ADOPTED BY BOARD OF TRUSTEES, JANUARY 10, 1895.

It having pleased Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, to remove from earth, since the last meeting of this Board, one of our number, Alfred Taylor, Esq., of N. Y., we hereby record our sorrow in thus having been called to part with him, and our sincere sympathy with his stricken family. By his active and successful life Mr. Taylor reflected honor upon our University of which he was an Alumnus. As a member of this Board he was faithful to his trust and always ready to promote its interests. We will greatly miss his cheerful presence and gratefully cherish his memory.

Local.

Professor Hamblin has moved to Third Street.

S. W. Gilpin has been elected President of the Freshman class.

We are pleased to welcome Mr. Carl Summerbell to a place on the "Hill."

Jackson to young lady: "You are Pharisee and that makes me Sadducee."

Mr. H. L. Guss of the Academy class of '93 has entered the Sophmore class.

Jennings has been confined to his room for sometime on account of sickness.

P. B. Cregar, '95, will captain Bucknell's baseball team during the coming season.

J. E. Saul was called home on the ninth inst. on account of the serious illness of his father.

J. T. Anderson, who had gone to Washington to assist his brother in his pastoral work, has returned home.

A new chapter of the Pi Beta Phi is the latest addition to the College societies of Bucknell. Its charter members are Misses Mary Bartol, Mary Wolfe, Kate McLaughlin, Cora Perry, Ruth Sprague, and Mary Eddelman.

The College Glee Club has been organized with Mr. Bunnell as leader, and Mr. Harper as business manager.

By the time this issue comes before its readers the new college and athletic caps will have been donned by the boys.

The Phi Kappa Psi boys entertained their lady friends of the Seminary by a sleighing party to Mifflinburg on the 12th inst.

The banquet of the Bucknell Alumni of Pittsburg will be held at the Hotel Duquesne, of Pittsburg, February 11, 1895.

S. R. Wood and Charles Firth were among the victims of the recent robbery of the Pennsylvania Railroad station in Lewisburg.

Some of the practical demonstrations by various members of the class in Physics are highly appreciated by the other members.

The regular Mirror Association election will be held on February 9, when a business manager for the ensuing year and six editors will be elected.

A number of the students rendered valuable assistance to Pastor Judd, during the week of prayer, by the active part they took in the meetings.

Clothing emporiums at rooms six and seven West Wing. Lowest prices. Great variety. Perfect fit guaranteed or money refunded. Call early and avoid the rush.

B. K. Brick, '95, has returned to College. His eyesight has greatly improved, and he expects to be able to complete the course along with his class. We all extend to him a cordial welcome.

How very pleasant and comfortable it is to sleep in our warm and cheery college dormitories these bitter cold nights! Pity those who are compelled to sleep in cold rooms. How very thankful we ought to feel!

On February 22 the Prohibition Club of the University will hold a preliminary contest in oratory in Bucknell Hall. This contest is to decide who shall represent the University at the state contest which will be held at Harrisburg, sometime in June, in connection with the State Convention of the Prohibition Party.

The members of Professor Edward's Sunday School class, who fail to attend, do not fully realize how much they miss. His lesson on John the Baptist was presented in a very powerful, dramatic way, and made a deep and lasting impression on all who heard it.

Bible-study is again under good headway by the various classes, in their respective lines of study. Indications at this writing seem to point to larger classes and a deeper interest. The classes meet every Monday evening at 9 o'clock in the various recitation rooms and "Halls."

The members of the L'Agenda Board are making rapid progress with their work. They are adding many new features this year which will make the book unique and attractive. They expect to have it in press about the end of this term, and hope to have it out early in May.

The Chemical and Physical Society met in the chemical lecture room on Thursday, January 10, at 4 o'clock. The subject for discussion, Chemistry of Petroleum, was quite ably handled by Mr. F. W. Brown. At this meeting there was also an election of an executive committee for the term. Professor Fisher and Mr. A. W. Stephens were elected.

The first regular gymnastic drill of the term was conducted on Friday, January 11, at 4 o'clock, by Physical Directors Harper and Bunnell. An unusually large number of Academy and College students entered the drills. The attendance was very encouraging to all concerned, and betokens a lively interest in gymnastics during the coming term. Before the close of the term a public exhibition will be given in the gymnasium.

The Athletic Association held a special meeting in Theta Alpha Hall on Saturday morning, January 12. The report of the Foot-ball manager for the past season was submitted to the Association, and also other reports. A number of amendments to the constitution were finally adopted. The resignation of Mr. J. B. Suiter as member from the Junior class of the General Athletic committee was accepted and Mr. Frank B. Miller was elected in his stead.

At this meeting a petition to the effect that the annual foot-ball game next year between Bucknell and State College be played in Williamsport, was presented to the Association by the Ex-Manager, Mr. P. B. Cregar. This petition was signed by about three-hundred citizens of Williamsport, headed and gotten up by Dr. Koser. It goes to prove that the exhibition given by our team last season was highly commendable in the eyes of the people of Williamsport. Without doubt Williamsport will have her desire fulfilled next fall.

On Saturday evening, January 19, a number of college boys in company with ladies from the Institute enjoyed a sleigh ride to the Marsh.

The class of '98 has elected C. A. Lindemann Historian in place of Edward Flint, who resigned on account of being absent from school at the present time.

A very interesting and impressive lecture on Missionary Extension was delivered before a crowded house on Thursday evening, January 17, by Mr. Mershon of Chicago. There are other lectures to follow on the same subject. Every student should attend these highly instructive lectures.

The Phi Gamma Delta fraternity and their lady friends took advantage of the fine sleighing on the evening of the 19th inst. They were entertained at the Deckard Hotel, Mifflinburg, and report a very pleasant evening and excellent accommodations. The features of the evening, apart from the spread, were music, games and social chitchat. At a reasonable evening hour they returned, none the worse for the cold and full of pleasant remembrances.

It may not be known to many that there is a thriving organization in our midst whose members meet weekly for exchange of congratulations. This society, The Spellbinders' Club, is composed of those young Spurgeons who are wont, as occasion offers, to charm rural congratulations with a few remarks on the "Immortality of the Soul," "Predestination," and kindred subjects. The name of the society owes its origin to the fact that its members invariably hold their audiences spell-bound. The officers are as follows: President, T. L. Josephs; First Vice President, E. C. Kunkle; Second Vice President, H. T. Colestock; Third Vice President, W. A. Crawford; Secretary, S. R. Wood; Treasurer, H. M. Pease; Honorary members, J. Y. Sinton, J. W. Davis, B. B. Ware, A. S. Barner, W. T. Harris and F. D. Finn.

The first meeting of the Natural History Society for the winter term was held on Thursday, January 17. Messrs. Stevens and Grim were elected serve as an executive committee. The rest of the hour was occupied by Doctor Groff, who gave an interesting and instructive talk on "The Preservation of Natural History Specimens." The Doctor gave a number of useful hints for obtaining and making a valuable collection of minerals, remarking that the specimens ought to be of a similar size and form in order to be attractive and valuable. His method of preserving and arranging insects, reptiles and plants is very practical. To the majority present his method of skinning a bird was simple and we hope to see him prepare one for mounting, in the presence of the society, in the near future.

The literary societies of the University are in a very flourishing condition at present. The work performed is of a high order. The attendance on the whole is quite gratifying. The following officers have been elected for the winter term: Euepia: President, H. F. Harris; Vice President, E. R. Powell; Secretary, A. A. Smith; Treasurer, W. H. Carey; Critic, H. M. Pease; Librarian, F. W. Jackson.

Theta Alpha: President, D. Phillips; Vice President, A. W. Johnson; Secretary, J. Cutler; Treasurer, S. R. Wood; Critic, J. W. Davis; Censor, G. A. Jennings; Hall Curator, F. W. Dillon.

Thursday evening, January 17, 1895, marks an important event in the history of the Class of '98.

The occasion was a class sleigh-ride in which nearly the whole class was represented. The arrangements were so successfully completed that no one in College, not even the ever suspicious Sophomores, mistrusted anything unusual.

Promptly at eight o'clock three crowded sleigh-loads of jolly Freshmen were found on the corner of 7th and Market Streets, ready to start on the eventful ride. After riding for several miles in different directions, passing various small towns, the company halted at the residence of Mrs. C. V. Slifer at Pine Grove, where a grand reception awaited them. When sufficient time had been spent by the fireside. They were then invited into the dining room to partake of a hearty as well as a deliciou srepast. When justice had been done to the ample viands, the class president, Mr. S. W. Gilpin,arose and in a few wellchosen words announced that several toasts would be in order; and that notwithstanding their extemporaneous character, he was confident that the talent of '98 was "equal to the occasion." He introduced as the first speaker Mr. H. M. Roth who, in a manner pleasing to all, expanded upon the subject, "To NIGHT." A few enticing words from the toastmaster now persuaded Mr. E. H. Dutton to cease eating long enough to toast the "Class of '97." This subject being rather more disagreeable than difficult, Mr. Dutton handled it with ease, and occasionally mentioned some interesting, although discreditable anecdotes, which mark the characteristic features of the class. The next in order was a solo by Mr. A. W. Geary. The applause had scarcely subsided when Mr. C. A. Lindemann very ably toasted "Our Class Sisters," and made the complimentary remark that another sister, in the personage of the hostess, had been added to their number.

This toast was adequately responded to with "Our Class Brothers" by Miss Anna Rodgers. Last but not least, in the literary feast was the toast entitled, "Our Success," by Mr. F. B. Hunt. Although Mr. Hunt was "too full for utterance" his wit and humor occasioned repeated applause, giving evidence of complete "success" to the entire satisfaction of all.

A sociable time was then spent in the parlor, after which the class returned to old Bucknell only to find their genial friends (?), the Sophomores, enwrapped in peaceful slumber.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

A Mandolin, Guitar, and Banjo Club has been started among the young ladies of the Institute.

The fifteen-minutes prayer meetings held at nine o'clock each evening during the week of prayer were well attended.

The work of the Y. M. C. A. is earnest, constant, progressive, and its value to the school cannot be over-estimated.

Prof. Aviragnet is making preparations to give an entertainment for the benefit of our Y. W. C. A. He hopes to give it in March. It promises to be unique and interesting.

The Literature class is delighted with Wordsworth, and would like to make a tour of the "Lake Country" with Mrs. Larison, who contemplates going during the summer vacation in company with Miss Bronson, formerly a teacher at the Institute.

More than one of the jaunty caps of Bucknell College girls was seen in Philadelphia during the holidays. Two of them were found even in foreign parts, having by some means strayed over to Jersey. We are glad to see, however, that none of them are missing this term.

The Institute students report a very pleasant holiday season. Nearly all of the young ladies have returned, and we cordially welcome the new students. The efficiency of the Music department is increased by the addition of another instrumental teacher, Miss Ione Morgan.

The Students Loan Association held a business meeting at the opening of the term, and report the addition of the following members: Mrs. A. A. Leiser, Mrs. Lincoln Hulley, Mrs. H. E. Deats. This Association deserves the helpful attention of all who are interested in the education of young women. The annual payment of five dollars entitles one to active membership.

At the January meeting of the Alumnae Club, the following program was most successfully rendered:

Music, - - - - -	Miss Swengel.
Barnard College, - - - -	Miss H. Walters.
Elmira College, - - - -	Miss Armitage.
Bryn Mawr College, - - -	Miss Thomas.
Music, - - - - -	A Bryn Mawr Song.
Mt. Holyoke College, - - -	Miss Lewis.
Smith College, - - - -	Miss Bates.
Wellesley College, - - - -	Miss Eddelman.
Music, - - - - -	A Wellesley Song.
Woman's College at Baltimore, -	Miss Bartol.
Radcliffe, - - - - -	Miss Sprague.
Music, - - - - -	A Harvard Annex Song.

A paper on Vassar College was omitted on account of the absence of the writer.

An attractive part of the evening's entertainment was the giving of the College Cries which were as musical as lyrics from Tennyson. Excellent views of the various schools added to the interest.

Notwithstanding the acknowledged merit of these educational centers, we all with one accord declared our loyalty to Bucknell.

ACADEMIC NEWS.

The Gymnasium drills are well attended by the Academy students.

LeRoy Hall, who was confined to his bed on account of illness, is able to attend classes again.

Two electric bells have been placed in the Academy, one in East Hall and one in Main Hall.

The Fourth Form will read the "Merchant of Venice" this term in the Elocution Class and the Third Form, Longfellow's "Evangeline."

The Academy is represented in the University Glee Club by Cleeland and Meeker, and in the Mandolin and Guitar Club, by Koser and Pierce.

The following officers of the Fourth Form have been elected for this term: President, Hazen; Vice President, Cober; Secretary, Nesbit; Treasurer, Harvey; Historian, Cleeland.

The following books the Fourth Formers are required to read this year for admission to College: Milton's Comus, L'Allegro, Il Penseroso, and Lycidas, Macaulay's Essays on Milton and Addison, Shakespeare's Twelfth Night, Webster's Bunker Hill Oration, Longfellow's Evangeline, Sir Roger de Coverley Papers, Irving's Sketch Book, and Scott's Abbot.

It is rumored that Mr. E. W. Cober has received a very flattering offer from University of Pennsylvania to play foot-ball there next year and has about decided to accept it. We trust that an effort will be made to retain him at Bucknell, for we can ill afford to lose him from our team.

Personals.

'54. Rev. C. M. Deitz has settled as pastor of the Baptist church of Point Pleasant, Pa.

Ex-'62. Arthur Malcom is Vice President of the Philadelphia Baptist City Mission Society.

'62. Rev. A. J. Rowland, D. D., now of Baltimore, but formerly pastor of the Tenth church, Philadelphia, has been chosen secretary of the American Baptist Publication Society. Dr. Rowland is a real Pennsylvanian, having been born in Valley Forge, but he is national in every fibre of his being. He was graduated from Lewisburg, now Bucknell University, in '62, and from Rochester Theological Seminary in '66, and is in the very maturity of his powers. The important pastorates he has held prove his acceptability in the pulpit, and those who know him are confident that, with firm religious principles, he has the qualities for a thorough business like administration of the Society's work. The wisdom manifest in the appointment is recognized by all who know Dr. Rowland.

'67. Hon. T. J. Philips has entered upon his first term as a member of the Penna. State Legislature.

'71. Rev. Henry Colclesser has become pastor at Conshohocken, Pa.

'71. Dr. G. M. Philips, of the West Chester State Normal School, was recently nominated by direct vote of the Alumni as a Trustee of the University. At the semi-annual meeting of the Board of Trustees, held in Philadelphia, January 10, the nomination was confirmed and Dr. Philips was elected.

'77. Rev. C. A. Hare of McKeesport will leave on February 6 for a trip through Egypt and the Holy Land.

'77. A gracious revival has been in progress at the Baptist church in Vincentown, New Jersey, Rev. E. D. Shull, pastor.

'80. Rev. J. M. Plannett has located at Cambridgeboro.

'82. Rev. R. M. Hunsicker has accepted a call from the Baptist church at Chestnut Hill and began his work the first of the year.

'84. F. W. Overheiser has resigned at Cold Spring, N. Y.

'85. Rev. J. M. Hare of Burlington, N. J., was presented on Christmas with a handsome gold watch.

'85. Mr. William P. Beaver, formerly of this place, but now a Pittsburg manufacturer, and Miss Ellen Brook were married January 8, at the home ot the bride in East Orange, N. Y.

'87. H. L. Calder, Esq., is a special reporter in the State Assembly for a syndicate of newspapers.

'87. Prof. J. L. VanGundy is teaching in the Norristown High School besides preparing a class of young men for college.

Ex-'89. Rev. John Skym is now located at Lansford, this state.

'92. Prof. W. L. Kauffman is teaching in the Harrisburg High School.

'92. Mr. George W. Wagenseller has become the sole proprietor of the Middleburg Post.

Ex-'93. Rev. S. A Field has accepted a call from the Westfield Baptist church.

'94. F. O. Schub is pursuing a theological course at the Rochester Seminary.

'94. Rev. A. F. Anderson, of Washington, D. C., will take a trip next summer through Egypt and the Holy Land.

—. H. C. Overholt died during December from an attack of pneumonia.

—. Mr. W. L. Showers is editor of the Williamsport Saturday Evening Review.

—. Walter Vorse, a former college student, died recently in Williamsport and was buried in Lewisburg.

—. Dr. F. S. Derr, now located at Watsontown, Pa., has been appointed one of the Pennsylvania Railroad surgeons.

—. A former student of the Academy, Rev. R. M. Roderick, has been called to the pastorate of the Baptist church at Honesdale, Pa.

Rev. F. L. Bardens, who was recently elected chaplain of the Pennsylvania Senate, defeating twenty-seven other candidates for the position, was a former Bucknell student.

Exchange.

The feet of truth are slow, but they never slip. —Ram's Horn.

We desire to acknowledge the receipt of The William and Mary College Monthly.

A cup worth $200 is awarded by the class of '93 of Cornell to the best preparatory school football team in New York State.

Princeton awards a scholarship of $1,500 for excellence in Latin and Greek. This is the largest scholarship given by any American college.

The Villanova Monthly is an attractive journal, but we think it would be improved if the pages devoted to mathematics contained literary matter. Such matter may be found in text-books on Geometry and Trigonometry, and is hardly relevant in a college journal.

OUT OF PLACE.

Are women angels? Yes, we say,
  They are undoubtedly, but that's
No reason in the world why they Should wear their wings upon their hats.

By means of the new "cut system" at Union a student is allowed as many absences during the term as there are recitations a week in that subject.

The subject for the Cornell-Pennsylvania debate is, "Resolved, That the most effective means of restricting the liquor traffic is to eliminate the element of private profits."

The January number of The Institute Journal contains a very creditable article on "Higher Medical Education," and also one on "College Life," which every college student can read with profit.

Mr. F. preached a sermon some time ago on "the world, the flesh, and the devil." In his introductory remarks he said: "I will say a few words on the world, touch on the flesh, and hurry on to the devil."

We noticed in the last issue of the Denison Collegian the card of Mr. C. B. Reno as an instructor of Stenography. He is awaiting the arrival of "Shorty" to assist in organizing a class in music. Success, Reno.

Editorial.

THE contest in Prohibition oratory will be held on Washington's Birthday. This is the annual contest under the auspices of the Prohibition Club, the object being to select a representative to the state intercollegiate contest at Harrisburg next June. The plan is to select two speakers from each class and to appoint judges to decide upon the best speaker to bear Bucknell's colors to the state meeting. The successful speaker at the state gathering will represent Pennsylvania at the national intercollegiate contest. Bucknell has been honored by the election of Mr. Colestock as State President of College Prohibition Clubs, and on the whole, the cause of prohibition is taking firm hold upon many of our students.

IN his sermon, January 31, Rev. Dr. Putnam said, among other good things, "A student must recommend Christ to his chum by his own life if he wishes to have any influence over him." It may not be our part to preach, yet we heartily indorse such doctrine. Young Men's Christian Associations are prone to bewail the fact that their work does not seem to be effective. While it is not possible to make an exact measurement of the extent of their influence, the fact nevertheless remains, that their range of moral power is contracted. The reason, perhaps, is not for to seek. Men fail to do what Dr. Putnam so forcibly said they must do, if they wish to do the most efficient work as members of christian organizations.

IT has sometimes happened that college professors and college graduates have sneeringly criticised the work of Normal Schools. Possibly some of the criticism was merited, for a budding normal graduate may think she "knows it all." Normal Schools do not pretend to supplant the work of Colleges and when college men criticise them from that point of view they are in error. The proper sphere of Normal Schools is to prepare teachers for the public schools. With that their work ceases, unless their students wish to attend college, when most of theNormals offer a preparatory course. On the whole, the attitude of college men is to estrange the Normal School from the College. It is a mistake to do this, for the Normal Schools of the state ought to furnish the best source for Colleges to draw students from.

BUCKNELL has been known for so long a time as a purely literary institution that she has attracted but little attention in the scientific world. The improvements, however, which have been made in the scientific department during recent years lead us to believe that the day is not far distant when she will be known also as a centre for original scientific experiment and investigation. The popularity of this department plainly shows that the efforts of the faculty to improve it are being appreciated. Every year brings an increasing number of students. Of the character of the work done, it is sufficient to state that students who have gone from Bucknell to various medical schools, say that our advantages in chemical and organic science, as far as the subjects are pursued here, are superior to those of the institutions they attended.

This is the time of year in which Literary Societies languish. Sleighing, skating, entertainments of all kinds occupy the students' extra hours. Beside this there is some laxity on the part of the program committees—not always in writing out the posters, but in enforcing their decisions. Too often the members will gather at the appointed time only to find that the program, well-selected and beautifully written, has failed altogether to materialize. The requisite is something attractive for the meetings and it will soon be clear that excuses of previous engagements have been more convenient than sincere, while those professedly not interested may become engaged in the work. The proposition by one of the societies to hold a mock trial, is commendable. Euepia held one last year that filled its hall with spectators, who were willing to wait far into the night for the verdict of the jury. A second should prove more successful still.

We heartily endorse the resolution of the Freshman class to avoid on their part giving cause for the annual Sophomore–Freshman fight on Washington's Birthday. We may feel gratified that Bucknell's civilizing influence has so soon been felt and that the Freshmen are in this, as in other less important matters, imitating the conduct of upper class men. They have already tested their powers in the most practical way and may therefore retire without provoking the charge of cowardice. This action we hope will serve as a precedent to future Freshman classes and in time, perhaps even the preliminary struggle may be dispensed with, without injury to character or reputation. In many other colleges these antiquated methods of class amusement have been replaced by contests between the two rival classes, in athletic sports or by some other struggle which, beside requiring nerve and muscle, as the class-fight does, exhibits in addition a little common sense.

This is positively the last appearance of the present editorial board and managing board. The regular election will have been held before this issue has been made public. Therefore we urge upon all readers consideration of the fact that the management is now, as ever, in need of funds with which to carry on its good work. To the stranger; remember that the Mirror, like other journals, needs a large subscription list; therefore do not be surprised that we take this last opportunity to recall to you your privilege. Constant Reader, remember that "money makes the Mirror go" and that your chum's subscription does not purchase for you the right to criticise this means of assisting the management of the journal. Subscriber, remember that you do not take as many copies of Mirror as you are able, and therefore it would be quite out of place for you to take exception to this request for more subscriptions. Tiresome customer, remember that Mirror has done all it promised to do, but that it cannot long flourish on bad debts; therefore do not feel offended when we remind you that your honest debt may be paid by the price of one sleigh-ride and one poor side-show.

ONE MORNING.

The early light came stealing in ;
  The fairies lightly, gently, fastened
Their beauteous mist veils, gauzy-thin
  As only fairy hands can weave,
About the trees, and left them.

The world awaked from dreamy sleep,
  To find the trees pure white, all chastened
From stealthy dusts that day times creep
  Upon their arms and cause them grief.
And so the fairies came to cheer them.

Thus Jesus loves to come to men
  And softly, Christly, o'er our lives,
That are so dusty time again,
  Enwrap his pure white veil of love,
Thus clothed we truly know the Father.

Sunday, Jan. 20, '95. E. A.

THE SCIENTIST AS A LITERARY MAN.

Just outside the window to-night the snow lies white and cold. The river has gone from sight. A mighty force has caught and stilled its ripples, but underneath the crystal surface the stream still moves on. Early last autumn an icy chill crept into the genial, warm heart of a dear New England friend and seemed to stop the current of life forever; and to-night the snow lies upon a mound in Cambridge, where rests the body of Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes. Half a dozen reviews have already endeavored to settle his place in American Literature, forgetting that the author-physician is not dead. As the ice apparently stops the river's current, so the laying of the body in that grave last October seemed to say that the life was ended. But just as the river moves on beneath the snow-crystalled surface, so Dr. Holmes still lives to touch, to hold, to influence more than ever as the years go by. The next generation will care for the genial Boston doctor only as the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table;" and it is well that they should do so. As Beecher says, "Let us remember our friends at their best." But if Americans of the next century look upon Dr. Holmes only as the author of "Old Ironsides," and not as a man of scientific attainment as well, they will never really know him. "It is a good thing for us," says Dr. Hale, "that Dr. Holmes had his own life to live, his own students to meet, his own lectures to deliver. and to keep in the very front of the science of his time in his studies in anatomy." This suggests—and answers—the question some men are continually arguing. Can a scientist be a literary man?

Narrow-minded absorbers of facts vehemently declare that literature must give way to the greater modern rival, and other narrow minded retailers of other men's arguments and phrases rule scientists out of the temple of literature as being too material in their ideas to look upon the sacred fire. And the rest of the world goes serenely on, dismissing both classes to the region where they belong, the limb of fools. Is there indeed such antagonism between the scientific spirit and the literary spirit that a man forfeits all power in literature when he makes scientific study his vocation?

Once upon a time a German naturalist determined to study glaciers. Out upon the ice-field he built his hut and presently gave the world the history of the ice-river. "A pure scientist," you say. And yet the other day John Burroughs wrote of Humboldt's Views of Nature and Scientific Travels that we read them not "so much for the pure science which they hold as the good literature they embody." Again someone mentions that other geologist, Hugh Miller, and we recall the literary style of My Schools and Schoolmasters. It has been much the fashion to point to this work as only scientific; and yet a fellow-worker has said of him, "His imagination and poesy are the living fire in his books." No one, perhaps, has been more often contemptuously dismissed because he knew how to use a microscope than Professor Huxley. It is well for many would-be literary men that they can so easily avoid the finely ordered arguments and elegantly chosen expressions of this "scientific man." Until they have mastered Professor Huxley's armament as well as he has theirs, the only safe course for them is to avoid him.

Nor need we go outside our own time and nation for men who are scientists and yet literary men. Every American lover of nature knows the man who is the intimate of the robins and the squirrels. To deny John Burroughs a place in our modern literature "is to argue yourself unknown." Within the bounds of our own state are Doctors Henry McCook and S. Weir Mitchell. The first, a busy city pastor while being the greatest living authority on ants and spiders; the other, a student of nervous diseases, an expert chemist on reptile poisons, a scholarly novelist and a most gentle, pervasive poet. And yet some narrow-souled critics would have us believe that scientific students are opposed in spirit to literary attainments.

We have seen how the facts disprove this theory of superficial generalizers. It remains to see why scientific studies aid literary power. Hosts of books and articles are still-born because they lack what Lewes calls the Principle of Vision. That is, the writers have not yet learned to see the world about them. Walk out with Thoreau as he studies and classifies the shrubs of the Maine woods, or sail with him down the Merrimac and mark how much he can see in the animal world about him. Does this scientific study unfit him for describing the beauty of the nature about him? Rather it is a powerful element in enabling him to make us see the insects quivering in sunshine, or the pearly light of the minnow's scales.

Notice again that other royal function of the mind, the Imagination, and see how it is broadened, uplifted and enriched by every avenue of scientific study! To be sure there is a set of men who never understand how the imagination can play any part in the higher intellectual life. No disciple of Lewes ever makes this mistake. In the construction of scientific hypotheses, in the mental correlation of images and in the process of attaining results, the imagination receives the very training which fits it to be the stage of the literary pageant and drama.

Then there is a unanimity of aim in both scientific and literary life. No man succeeds in either who shrinks from the truth. There must be intense faithfulness to convictions. He who is not so is a hypocrite and a cheat, whether he be scientist or author. Not a little of our modern writing is the product of moral cowards and half-fledged theorists. When these weak imitators of other weak imitators have learned to look with the eyes and understand with the hearts of the few great past masters in both science and literature, the world will be the gainer. These last are the models for the picture drawn by one who unites in himself both poet and naturalist. This is the picture. "The true poet and true scientist are not estranged. They go forth into nature like two friends. Behold them strolling through the summer fields and woods. The younger of the two is much the more active and inquiring, he is ever and anon stepping aside to examine some object more minutely, plucking a flower, treasuring a shell, pursuing a bird, watching a butterfly; now he turns over a stone, peers into the marshes, chips off a fragment of a rock, and everywhere seems intent on some special and particular knowledge of the things about him. The elder man has more an air of leisurely contemplation and enjoyment—is less curious about special objects and features, and more desirous of putting himself in harmony with the spirit of the whole. But when his companion has any fresh and characteristic bit of information to impart to him, how attentively he listens, how sure and discriminating is his appreciation. The interests of the two in the universe are widely different, yet in no sense are they hostile or mutually destructive."

WINOLA.

In the northeastern part of the Keystone State, among the grand hills of the Appalachian system, there are the most charming lakes to be found in all the eastern part of the United States. Hemmed in on all sides by beautiful groves and green fields, they offer many attractions to the student of Nature. They are grand now; but how much more so in the earlier days before the white man had used his axe upon the mighty pines of the primitive forest.

In a valley of pre-glacial erosion, bounded by hills which converge in the form of the letter "V," lies a beautiful sheet of crystal water. When the great northern ice sheet retreated, it left immense deposits of debris in the valley, causing the lake to be formed.

Some time after the Indians came. His was the first face to be mirrored in the placid surface of this grand sheet of water, and for a long time he alone chased the red deer over the hills which were covered with great pines and dense with ferns.

The Wyomings were in possession of the territory and their chief, Onteka, a lover of peace, found no trouble in holding his lands; for the neighboring tribes were friendly with one exception: the Keiutas were ever encroaching upon his claims. In the camp of the Wyomings was a beautiful maiden. Her dark flashing eyes sparkled with merry mischief, charming all; yet in that glance one could not mistake an element of determination which said plainly that she had a will of her own. Her hair, black and shiny, was brushed back from her forehead and hung as a loose mantle to her waist. Her actions were very graceful and she could push her little birch canoe through the water in a manner that made many a brave long to have Winola for his bride.

Among the Keiutas there was a very promising youth who was the pride of the whole tribe. Many times he had watched the fair Winola with eager eyes, but could never muster courage to speak with her. But one beautiful day in early spring when the greater part of the tribe had gone on a chase, Winola took her little canoe and paddled out into the lake to fish. She had drifted about for some time when suddenly the sound of a paddle came faintly to her ear. Glancing up she saw a youth, fair of face and form, moving rapidly down the lake. As he approached Winola, he slackened his speed and seemed much interested in her success; but he soon passed on. Winola cared not for fishing now, but took her paddle and returned to her wigwam to dream of the fair face she had seen.

The following day she was out with her little boat and again her brave came down the lake; but this time he stopped beside her canoe and the fair Winola was happy; for she had given her love to Kishkemintas.

On the return of the band from their chase. Winola's meetings with the brave from the hostile camp were discovered, and the old chieftain would not allow her to see her lover. But in the quiet of the evening she would often wander out and in the balmy moonlight, dream of the many happy hours she had spent in her little canoe with Kishkemintas near her.

One night as she was sitting under a great oak near the shore of the lake, a canoe emerged from the shadow some distance from where she was seated and came swiftly toward her. Soon she could distinguish the athletic form of Kishkemintas and with a bound she was at the waters edge to greet him. With joyful hearts they roamed through the forest and many happy hours were spent under the protecting pines.

These clandestine meetings were soon discovered by the chief and in a rage, he banished Winola from the camp. Fleeing to her lover, she related her sad tale and together they planned a home for themselves. There was a cave on the border of the lake near the camp of the Wyomings; to this they wandered and decided that, with what few possessions they had, a comfortable lodging could be fashioned.

Kishkemintas, leaving Winola at the cave, returned for his canoe. Just as he was pushing off from the shore, the twang of a bow-string was heard and he fell forward on his face, pierced through the heart by an arrow from the bow of old Onteka.

The death of Kishkemintas was a sad blow to the fair Winola and she would not be comforted. Her father implored her to return to his lodge, but she would not leave the little cave and the happy memories of Kishkemintas. She prefered to live alone in the cave; for she could support herself by her unerring arrow or her skilful fishing.

It was a sad life for the fair princess. The waves seemed to mock her with every splash as they broke against her little boat. She could not endure the quietness of the woods now, and when the wind whistled through the mighty pines, it was with a wail of a lost love—a funeral dirge, where before it had been a merry laughing-song.

But soon the whites came and drove her kinsmen from the shores. They learned her sad story and took her to their hearts and homes. When she died they buried her near the spot she loved so well. The grave of Winola is marked to this day and the quiet lake on whose bosom she coursed with all the spirit of a daring Indian Princess, has taken her name. In that peaceful valley, the story is often told, and the love for the bright Indian is in every heart. A Longfellow alone is lacking to make her as well beloved as Evangeline.

CARELESS SPEAKING.

There is no safer criterion of character than every-day speech. It is a significant fact that no man ever feels acquainted with another until the two have engaged in conversation, and though this conversation be ever so light and shallow, yet each man better understands his friend in this way than he could by his face, his dress, his bearing or his actions. A detective addresses an ordinary remark to the person under his suspicion and from the simplest reply, he forms his conclusions—from the words, the tone, the pronunciation, the accent. Speech surely betrays character. And yet there are probably no faults so common among people of the better class as faults in every-day speech; faults in articulation and in the use of words, but especially grammatical faults.

In some cases we must believe that the person was better instructed and the error was because of carelessness, but carelessness can not account for so common a disregard of the simplest rules of English grammar. It is hard to see how a man who is careful to keep his necktie straight, careful to eat like a gentleman, and careful to respect the rights of his neighbor, can be so careless in his speech that it seems actually but little more correct than the prattle of the street-arab or gutter-grub.

We must in charity, attribute most of the error to real ignorance. The same person who would ridicule the use of "I is" for "I am" will say "you was" instead of "you were." He would scarcely say "I haven't none" for "I have none" yet he will say "I haven't hardly any" for "I have hardly any." Perhaps he would not say "there was two" for "there were two" yet may say "there are none" instead of "there is none." We acknowledge here that there is some difference of opinion among even the best speakers and writers as to the use of "none" with the verb in the singular.

The most common errors seem to be the use of the verb in the singular with a subject in the plural. Other mistakes are made through the confusion of the adjective and adverb—"I write bad" for "I write badly."

Further, the personal pronoun "them" is used for the attributive pronoun "those"—"them words" for "those words," and the plural "those" for the singular "that"—"those kind of words" for "that kind of words."

Another error, and one which may be noticed occasionally in literature otherwise correct, is the use of the simple adverb "like" for the conjunctive adverb "as"—"I write like he does" for "I write as he does." In standard English "like" may be an adjective or an adverb, but never a conjunctive, to unite two complete clauses. The only excuse, and a poor one it is, is that the sentence given is an abbreviation for "I write like (to) the way that he does."

An error more or less peculiar to Pennsylvania is the use of the verb let without an infinitive object—"let it there" for "leave it there." The reverse mistake (the use of the infinitive after leave) is more widespread—"leave it be" for "let it be."

Of course it must be remembered that many of these forms have some etymological warrant, but none from the best modern usage.

The gender of the intensive pronoun with the adjectives each and every, applied to subjects of different genders, sometimes causes difficulty; one person says, "every one by themselves;" another says, "every one by him-or-herself;" another even says, "everyone by themself." The correct form is "everyone by himself" as "himself" may be either common or masculine.

It would be an almost endless undertaking to mention even the common errors in the formation of verbs. "I seen" for "I saw" and "he has went" for "he has gone" are the most shocking, but "I have got" for "I have gotten" is just as wrong. The verb get is applied much too broadly, by the way. "Ain't" is certainly an objectionable expression in any construction, but with a singular subject it is absolutely incorrect even as an abbreviation.

The errors named are, sad to say, only a few of those we hear and perhaps make everyday. The real intention of this writing is to urge constant watch-care and thought in the use of our words.

Local.

The Local "Ed." with aching head
Sat musing with his pen,
Reflecting how, without a row,
The col'mns be filled again!

"I've nothing new to write," thought he,
"Nor story strange to pen,"
And my last jokes have so provoked
A score or so of men

"That I am threatened with my life,
If ere I joke again."
A bright idea struck his mind,
It flashed upon him then.

"A poet bright! I'll be," cried he,
"And tell of heroes bold
Who in the fight for truth and right
Fought in the days of old.

"How brave Horatius held the bridge!
How in Thermopylae's pass,
The gallant band of Spartan youth
Died with Leonidas."

Just then the Editor-in-Chief,
With fierce and angry mein,
Stepped in and said, "The Locals, quick!"
And spoiled the poet's dream.

Rev. W. P. Chase, D.D., of Philadelphia, has been chosen as the University preacher for the month of February.

Professor Hulley and wife tendered a reception to the class in Hebrew on the first evening in February. The boys report having had a royal good time.

Mr. P. B. Cregar, Captain of the base-ball team, is busily engaged in selecting material available for the team, and will soon have the men at work in earnest.

One of the water pipes in the Laboratory froze last week and caused considerable annoyance. The plumbers from town were called in and soon had it fixed.

The first edition of Professor Bartol's Solid Geometry, numbering one thousand copies, and published by Leach, Shewell and Sanborn, sixteen months ago, has already been entirely sold.

A. O. Miller has been doing some missionary work lately. He has been trying to get the High School in town hereafter to observe the day of prayer for colleges. We are doubtful of his success.

Frank Tilley, although one of the youngest members of the Freshman class is one of the brightest. When not engaged at study, he practices telegraphy and story-telling at No. 9 West Wing.

On Wednesday evening, January 30, a party of the students took a drive to Northumberland where they were heartily received into the home of the Misses Lesher who had invited, according to prior arrangement a number of the ladies of the town to be present to assist in entertaining the boys. All enjoyed the trip.

The Philadelphia Alumnae Club of Bucknell Institute held the annual reunion on Monday, January 28, at the Century Club Drawing Rooms. Miss Mary L. Bartol represented the Lewisburg Club.

While Professor Owens was performing some wonderful experiments in Electricity at a Monday morning lecture, one member of the class was so tickled that he forgot himself, and ejaculated, "Gad, that's funny."

The banquet of the Bucknell University Club of Pittsburg will be held at the Hotel DuQuesne, Monday evening, February 11. The MIRROR extends cordial greetings and best wishes for many happy returns of the day.

It is not a joke, but it comes quite near to being one. A member of the Sophomore class in speaking of the attentiveness of his class-mates to the instructor's remarks said, "Not one fellow in the class has gone to sleep yet this term during a recitation."

The University Band under the direction of Dr. Aviragnet now consists of twenty-five members, five of whom came into the band at the opening of this term. Additions to the equipment in the way of several reed instruments and a trombone have been made.

The College Athletic Association held its last meeting on the 2d inst. Reports of committees were received. Various suggestions were made for the lifting of the heavy debt of the Association. A number of schemes will be tried. It is sincerely hoped that every loyal son and daughter of Bucknell will lend their aid and assistance to the Association in meeting its obligations.

There is a movement on foot among those of the college students who go to the Library for the purpose of reading to address a petition to the Trustees of the University, praying them to provide a separate room for the lady students. They find that the presence of some of the ladies is very distracting to a person who has not been brought up in a planing-mill or a boiler-shop.

A very enjoyable evening on Friday, January 25, was spent by quite a number of the boys at the home of the Misses Walters. The social event was in honor of E. R. Powell's birth-day.

A sled-load of young ladies from Northumberland were present to do honor to the occasion.

The entertainment consisted of singing, instrumental music, declamations by various members of the company and other interesting and amusing pastimes. All expressed themselves as highly delighted with the event.

The Y. M. C. A. of the College has secured the services of the Schuman Quartette, for the 12th of February, in Bucknell Hall. The company has undergone considerable change since it appeared last in Lewisburg, and an entirely new program will be given. This company has always been well received in town, and has given great satisfaction to all who have had the pleasure of listening to it. We expect to see every seat filled on the evening of the 12th, and a good round sum placed in the empty treasury of the Y. M. C. A.

Seldom does it happen that so many of the students of the University turn out to attend the meetings of the Natural History and Chemical and Physical Societies as happened on Thursday, January 24, when there was a joint meeting arranged by Secretaries Carey and Davis. The lecture room was almost filled with expectant boys and girls from all departments of the University. The object of attraction was the address on Life in Mexico by Hon. Howard Miller, who is the Commissioner of Land Surveying in the Republic of Mexico. Mr. Miller spoke of the ordinary things of Mexican life and told of some very odd customs in vogue there. At the close of his remarks, he expressed his pleasure in addressing the students, whom he complimented for their close attention and intelligent bearing, and offered at any convenient time in the future to appear again before the Societies. We trust we shall have the privilege of soon hearing him again.

The Day of Prayer for Colleges this year was one of unusual interest. In the morning Rev. Dr. Putnam of New York City preached a very practical and sensible sermon in the Baptist church. In the afternoon a song and testimony meeting was conducted in Bucknell Hall. In the evening Mr. Putnam again preached to a large audience in Bucknell Hall. After the preaching services he conducted an after-meeting at which seven of the young men of the University became disciples of Christ. Owing to the deep interest manifested in the meeting, and being importuned by many of the boys to remain one day longer, Mr. Putnam, on the day following, gave addresses to the students in the Academy, College, and Seminary, and in the evening again delivered a very forcible sermon before the students of the University in Bucknell Hall.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Rev. James Putnam conducted a meeting at 6:30 on Friday evening, February 1, in the Institute Parlor. He spoke to us from Paul's words, "None of us liveth to himself." A lasting impression was made upon many hearts, as we listened to the solemn and helpful thoughts he presented.

It may not be generally known that a systematic study of the Bible forms a part of the Institute Curriculum, there being an hour given to it each week. Last year the Life of Christ, as given in the Blakeslee Series, was studied with great profit. The "progressive grade" of the quarterlies is used in the Senior and fourth years, and the "intermediate grade" in the other classes. The Apostolic Church is the subject for the current year. This regular study of early church history is found both interesting and profitable.

On the afternoon of January 26, a long hay-wagon on runners drew up with a flourish before the Institute, and stopping long enough to take in a jolly crowd of College girls, was off again to gather the rest of its fair passengers. A large flag of orange and blue floated loyally over the company, but on account of its frequent fits of attachment to the head of one girl or another it was laid aside.

The entire journey of eight miles to Watsontown was enlivened by songs, cheers, and the vigorous waving of colors. At last the merry crowd was welcomed by Mrs. Sigel to warm, bright rooms and a table groaning with good things. In happy interchange of wit and humor the evening passed far too quickly.

The four prancing steeds were again at the door, so, bidding their gracious hostess a regret-ful good night, the party was soon tucked snugly in the ample sleigh, and drove off amidst hearty cheers.

They had not gone far, however, before they felt the sleigh gently lurching over. All waited in perfect silence a moment, uncertain what to do; then the whole party leaped simultaneously to the ground. A scene of confusion immediately ensued. All chattered together. However, no injury being reported, the sleigh was soon righted and all clambered in again. A song was started immediately and the company moved on, reaching Lewisburg without further mishap.

The girls feel very grateful to the two students who so kindly acted as charioteers upon this occasion.

The following interesting account of the banquet of the Bucknell Alumnae Club of Philadelphia is from the pen of Miss Nellie W. Conard, '93:

The Annual Lunch was given by the Bucknell Alumnae Club of Philadelphia at the "Woman's Exchange," on Monday, January twenty-eighth. Twenty-two of the members were present, and, while we wish there had been a larger number, we are glad so many are still interested in Bucknell.

After lunch had been served, the President, Mrs. Spratt, gave us some gracious words of welcome, and delighted us all with a message of greeting from Miss Carrie W. Reese of the Pittsburg Gazette. It is one of our desires to have Miss Reese with us some day, and the desire grows stronger with each remembrance from her.

It was a pleasure to have at this meeting a representative from our Mother Club at Lewisburg. All were delighted with the bright, interesting talk Miss Bartol gave us, and felt that the Lewisburg Alumnae have not forgotten us. There was no one who did not listen with pride to the records of what has been accomplished at Bucknell, and none who did not wish for her a bright and prosperous future.

The guest of the club on this occasion was Mrs J. P. Mumford, Vice President of the Nation Federation of Women's Clubs. In presenting our guest, Mrs. Spratt spoke of the step that has been taken by our club in the direction of uniting ourselves with the organization represented by Mrs. Mumford. It has been felt for sometime that we are not accomplishing the object for which our club was formed, and, furthermore, that object does not seem to have assumed a very definite shape. We had, therefore, looked forward to this meeting with unusual eagerness, for, not only were we anxious to hear Mrs. Mumford for herself, but also for the inspiration she would give us.

Mrs. Mumford is a particularly easy and pleasing speaker, and told us in a clear and suggestive way of the work and methods of the Federation of Clubs. Its object is to bring together the women of our land, that they may in this union prove their strength. It was flattering to realize the deep interest Mrs. Mumford manifested for Bucknell, and the plans suggested for increasing the influence of our club as well as of our alma mater will not soon be forgotten.

The Academy boys enjoyed the meetings held by Rev. Putnam. They have aroused a deeper interest in Y. M. C. A. work.

It is to be regretted that more of the Academy students are not subscribers to the MIRROR.

They should have as much interest in it as the College or the Institute. It represents the Academy as a part of the University. It appeals to them for support. There is no valid reason, except that of absolute poverty, which can be offered for not becoming a subscriber to it.

The annual open meeting of the Hermenia Literary Society took place Friday evening, February 1. The Society met at the Seminary at four o'clock and embarking in two large sleighs proceeded to the Great Western Hotel at Vicksburg. There a fine program was rendered. It consisted of—

Editorial.

THE semi-annual election has passed and many new names are on the editorial staff. New men means new thoughts and new methods; but we are placed in a very difficult position. It is no meanly task to take the reins from the able hands of our predecessors, for they have reached so high a standard in the work, that to advance seems almost an impossibility. But we accept the task cheerfully and trust that our ideas may be of such a character as will be of interest and that our methods will meet with no unjust censure.

IT is our ambition to make the MIRROR a representative paper of Bucknell; to do this we must have the hearty support of all; and this includes voluntary contributions to the columns. Do not be so backward about submitting your literary productions to the editor; he will not criticise you unjustly and if you have anything of merit, be sure that it will be given space. We do not know who are deserving of a place in our columns and have no means for finding out; but if you will put aside this false modesty and let us become acquainted with your ability, you will be the gainer.

A glance at the history of any country will convince one that no man of eminence has ever lived in that country whose life is not an example of what industry can do for one.

In spite of this, we find in every community a certain class who are of the opinion that the success of "the other fellow" is nothing but the result of an accident. Members of this class are as numerous in college as in any community of equal size; and it is a lamentable fact that this should be.

These men, at no distant day, will be explaining their failures on the ground that "circumstances" were against them. We are the victims and also the architects of circumstances, but chance is not a factor in existence. Success is the reward of indefatigable, persevering labor, and every opportunity offered should be seized and utilized that our foundation may be stable and our life a credit to ourself and to our friends.

WE have one organization at least of which we are justly proud, and that is the MIRROR Association. The recent report of the MIRROR Management is gratifying in the extreme, and gives good proof of man's superiority over circumstances. In spite of the "hard times" and the fact that the expenses have been doubled in the last year, the management has met all obligations and leaves a surplus to fall back on until new collections may be made. Where to place the direct credit is hardly a question, for it is plainly the result of hard work and efficient management. In comparison with this it is to be regretted that the same cannot be said of certain other organizations, for example the Athletic Association. Without doubt the affairs of this association are in a muddle, and, with no surplus to draw from, the new managers are completely handicapped. Add to this the unwillingness of the students to help a cause that will not help itself and it will be plainly seen how necessary some action is and how necessary, also, for some very close and carefull steering in the future.

"The Scientist as a Literary Man" published in a recent edition of the Mirror, has excited comment. As a literary production it has merit, combining smoothness, sequence and forcibleness so as to make the reading of it a pleasure. At the same time the ideas are of real value and applicable to the student even more than to the outside man. "Can a scientist be a literary man" certainly implies the question can a man advantageously follow more than one line of work. And the students who follow one line of work to the marked neglect of all others may well consider the risk they run of becoming warped and abnormally developed intellectually. That a "jack of all trades" can be master of none is no proof that a man, by careful discrimination. may not follow two or more lines of work advantageously and with more chances of reaching distinction than if he should follow but one. The examples of men who have done this are not limited to Holmes, Humboldt, Huxley and the others mentioned in the article, but are appearing before the public every year.

The move on the part of colleges to make scholarship a requisite for admission to Athletic teams has a two-fold meaning. It tends first of all to raise the standard of college athletics by recognizing intellect as of equal importance with strength and agility. In the second place it presupposes a tendency in the past, of college men to devote their time to the physical side of college life at the expense of the others and aims to remedy this defect. Bucknell has experienced little, if any, of the effects of this tendency on the part of students and for this reason largely, has paid but little attention to the matter. However facts point to a time in the near future when there will be a general standard of excellence in athletics as in other things, not only to protect this branch of the college training in itself but to prevent it from becoming, instead of "College athletic" simply "Athletics" without any distinction whatever and the sooner we recognize this, the easier it will be to make the change and the less likelihood there will be of our meeting with the same results which other colleges have had to meet with before this truth was recognized.

HERDSMAN'S SONG.

(From Wilhelm Tell.)

Ye meadows, farewell!
Ye pastures, sun-lighted!
The herdsman must leave you,—
The summer is gone.

We return to the mountain, nor come back again
Till, at cuckoo's clear call, songs awake in the glen,
Till fresh-blooming flowerets carpet the earth
When in beautiful May the brooks ripple forth.

Ye meadows, farewell!
Ye pastures, sun-lighted!
The herdsman must leave you,
The summer is gone.

O. M. W.

WORDSWORTH AS A ROMANTICIST.

The statement might be made without fear of contradiction that no writer of the first-class belongs exclusively to one school of authorship. Pope—severely classical at most times—is an ardent Romanticist at others. Even classical old Dr. Johnson sometimes so far forgets himself as to drop unconsciously into Romanticism. The same is true of Dryden and Gray. But what of Wordsworth? Few writers possess a purer, clearer style. Seldom is an author so uniform in his choice of subjects. Rarely do we find a poet of so quiet, contemplative temperament. Yet, scattered throughout his works are strong Romantic traits—not that the qualities just mentioned are the antithesis of Romanticism, but they are unusual in a poet of strong Romantic tendency. Scott and Byron are called Romanticists, but how different from Wordsworth! In mood and method, how far apart!

To define Romanticism is difficult. No two critics agree, though there are elements in each definition common to all, such as subjectivity, love of the picturesque and a reactionary spirit. In Wordsworth are found the first and the last. Subjectivity connotes the vague aspiration and longing of the writer in his literary production. A reactionary spirit rebels against and ignores the rules of the preceding literary movement.

Wordsworth betrayed his Romantic feeling by his appreciation of Romantic writings. Pope's Windsor Forest was highly commended by him, and Lady Winchelsea attained some prominence and is rescued from oblivion only by his timely praise of her Nocturnai Reverie. To him Percy's Reliques was a fountain of inspiration and the debt was always gladly acknowledged. He long admired Goldsmith's Deserted Village and Thomson's Seasons, and, in the early part of his career, imitated them. John Dyer is to-day almost forgotten, but his Grongar Hill was extravagantly praised by Wordsworth. In sentiment, then, he was a Romanticist.

When he began to write, the heroic couplet, though for a long time on the wane, had not entirely lost its prestige. Wordsworth cut loose from all rules, chose freer forms of expression and adapted measure to sense. He went back to the octosyllabics of Milton and found in them an exquisite vehicle of expression for The White Doe of Rylstone.

"White she is as lily of June
And beauteous as the silver moon,
When out of sight the clouds are driven
And she is left alone in heaven."

In this, how perfect the rhythm and how attuned the melody to meaning and sentiment! The Intimations of Immortality, breathing the same spirit, still more emphatically shows the poet's independence of critics' rules.

That Wordsworth was a Romanticist is further shown by his use of the sonnet. Prof. Phelps says the sonnet is as naturally a form for Romantic poetry, as the couplet was for classic. Now Wordsworth wrote a number of sonnets, many of them very beautiful. Perhaps the best of them is the one beginning.

"The world is too much with us; late and soon, Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers."

The Romanticists of England, Germany and France went back to the middle ages for inspiration and material. Wordsworth, too, had a strong sense of the antique, a lively interest in the traditional, the legendary and the historical. Among the poems that exemplify this characteristic are The Borderers, Heartleap Well and The White Doe of Rylestone.

A Romanticist must be imaginative, occasionally he may be mystical. Such was Wordsworth when he wrote in The Excursion,

"Some tall crag
That is the eagle's birthplace, or some peak
Familiar with forgotten years, that shows
Inscribed upon its visionary sides
The history of many a winter storm,
Or obscure record of the path of fire."

Or in Peter Bell,

"And he had trudged through Yorkshire dales,
Among the rocks and winding scars;
Where deep and low the hamlets lie
Beneath their little patch of sky,
And little lot of stars."

Or, better still, from Intimations of Immortality,

"Our soul is but a sleep and a forgetting
The soul that rises with us, our life's star,
Hath had elsewhere its setting,
And cometh from afar.

* * * * * * *

Heaven lies about us in our infancy,
Shades of the prison house begin to close
Upon the growing boy."

Still the dominating characteristic of Wordsworth is his extreme sensibility and accurate acquaintance with the changing phenomena of nature. The Classicists thought nature a bore. They studied forest and stream from London windows. Addison disliked the sight of a mountain. Thomson and Gray were pioneers in the appreciation of nature, yet Wordsworth far surpassed either of them in this respect. To him every brook was a sermon and every stone a poem, and

"In the mountains did he feel his faith."

From childhood to old age he lived

"Close to nature and nature's heart."

In The Prelude, he thus describes his sympathy with nature in childhood,

"In the frosty season, when the sun
Was set, and visible for many a mile,
The cottage windows through the twilight blazed;

> I heeded not the summons, happy time
> It was indeed for all of us; for me
> It was a time of rapture."

Wordsworth is excelled by none in the capacity to feel and appreciate the benignant influence of scenes long celebrated for their loveliness.

Thus both in method and mood he was a Romanticist. Appreciating Romantic writings he sought inspiration from them. Ignoring the rules of the Classicists, he cultivated variety in the form of expression. Living away from the world of society, he dwelt in close communion with the world of nature. Cut off from the cares of life, he roamed through woods and by the brooks of the lake country. Even the rich endless unfolding of nature and being are themselves testimonies to the largeness of a life whose voice, despite all our hewers of wood and drawers of water, must ever be

> "Like sighings of illimitable forests,
> And waves of an unfathomable sea."

THE CHARACTER OF IAGO.

Some one has said, "Censure is the tax a man pays the public for being eminent." As is the case with other kinds of tax, a man is sometimes obliged to pay more than his share, for the public is an unmerciful tax collector. For an illustration of this fact, let us examine the ledger of The Public in account with Shakespeare's Iago.

Iago is usually regarded as a crafty, clever villain who, ignoring the rights of others, and desiring only the success of his own miserable schemes, seeks to accomplish his end by daring trickery, base deception, and deliberate lying. He is looked upon as a sort of diabolical personage, who, like Satan in the garden of Eden, can not bear to see happiness in others, and therefore takes fiendish delight in causing the disgraceful downfall of Cassio; and with malice toward all and charity for none, cruelly torments Othello with the unspeakable torture of jeolousy, and finally causes the destruction of a number of innocent lives. In short, he is regarded as the arch fiend of literature.

But this well-nigh universal opinion in regard to Iago is, in a measure, unjust, because he is judged almost entirely by his faults. People search out the evil that is in him, and judge him accordingly, while the good points of his character, if there be any, are forgotten or ignored. Popular opinion is prejudiced so that he is denied the credit due him for his many acts of kindness and deeds of valor. Moreover, when Othello appointed the inexperienced foreigner, Cassio, to the office that the faithful and tried warrior Iago had justly hoped to obtain,—being reccomended by the influential men of his city,—the latter person certainly had good reason to be angry at this insultingly low value thus placed on his services. The disappointment was a bitter one, and his proud spirit could not resist the temptation for revenge. Iago, however, should not be regarded as the sole cause of the tragedy which was the result of this revenge; the marriage of the uncultured Othello, who was of a roving disposition, and somewhat advanced in age, to the young, highly cultured, and home-loving society girl Desdemona was in itself very unsuitable, and it is not strange that misunderstanding and domestic discord resulted therefrom.

Looking at Iago's character from an unprejudiced point of view, we find that he was characterized by kindness of heart,—kindness alike to the powerful and the lowly, to his superior, Othello, and to the weak, silly Roderigo. Again, considering the fact that he is very often referred to as "Honest Iago," we conclude that his former life must have been in conformity with the term applied to him; else how would he enjoy the reputation of a man "of honesty and trust," which term Othello himself applies to him? And when the ignorant foreigner, Cassio,—

> "That never set a squadron in the field, > Nor the division of a battle knew,"

is given the office of lieutenant, the offended Iago displays a patriotic pride that we can not fail to admire. He possessed a profound knowledge of human nature, was an easy, fluent talker, and was gifted with a frank, persuasive manner that won friends everywhere. His ability as a warrior was so well known that three of the influential men of the city recommended him to Othello for the position of lieutenant.

Iago's kind heart would not allow him to do needless harm. We may safely say that he would scarcely tread on a worm in his path if he could avoid doing so. But the stinging insult lying in the fact that the limited knowledge of the inexperienced foreigner had been preferred to his own skillful generalship roused all the fury in his soul. He, like the rest of us, was only human, and he resolved to have revenge. He determined to allow nothing to stand in his way, but, come what might, he would have revenge. Thus we see, in the accomplishing of his purpose, he has no choice as to the means employed whether they be fair or fowl. He is simply indifferent to right and wrong. In this respect he is like many a man of to-day, who accomplishes his purpose in the manner that is most convenient, be that manner good or bad. The modern politician, for example, would perhaps prefer to attain his ends by honorable methods; but facts continually prove that shamefully dishonest methods are very often used, for the reason that the desired result is apparently more easily accomplished thereby. The saloon keeper, whose ill-gotten riches are the price not only of many promising lives, but of immortal souls, is in our humble opinion, far more fiend-like than was Iago, who reluctantly accomplished his purpose at the expense of the earthly lives of a very few.

In view of all these things, then, we conclude that Iago was only an ordinary scoundrel. The general estimate of his character is unjust, because based on his faults, for who of us would be anything but scoundrels if judged only by our short-comings? Again, a closer examination reveals many desirable characteristics of his nature. And if we should judge some of our nineteenth century fiends by their faults and the amount of harm they have done—as Iago is usually judged,—the latter would be but a beginning in wickedness when compared with the hardened wretch who deliberately destroys the body and damns the soul of his brother in order to further (?) his own interests.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE BUCKNELL ALUMNI CLUB OF PITTSBURG.

The grand banquet hall of the Duquense Hotel, Pittsburg, was the scene of festive enjoyment on Monday evening, Feb. 11, at the third annual banquet of the Pittsburg Alumni Club of Bucknell. Although many were unable to be present because of the uncertain railroad transportation, a very pleasant evening was spent. It was especially regretted that Pres. Harris was unable to attend. Before the banquet a meeting was held, a constitution adopted and officers for the year elected. The club is now a permanent organization, and in the hands of energetic men cannot help being a success.

Mr. James B. Stevenson was chosen as presiding officer, and Rev. Leroy Stephens, Hon. W. S. Shellenberger, Rev. J. S. Hutson, Rev. G. T. Streat, Mr. Chas. Hunter, and Rev. John W. Moody responded to the call of the toast-master.

A pleasant feature was the singing of college songs. Messrs. Hargrave, Law and Woodward led and the company joined them in the chorus. The ladies shared this happy event with the gentlemen and all seemed to enjoy the occasion very much.

Notwithstanding the fact that many could not attend, the meeting was successful and enthusiastic, and many were the expressions of love for education and Bucknell.

Local.

Let me tell you in a rhyme,
That Josephs expected a valentine
From a girl whom he calls "mine";
And to whom he devotes his time;
But to make it the more sublime,
Alas, she sent him—sent him "nein."

Skating is the order of the day.

Who said Hollinshead was Mamma's Li'l Boy?

F. W. Wagner was sick for several days with La Grippe.

We are glad to see that Prof. Loomis is able to be about again.

The blizzard detained Kauffman at his home for several days.

H. L. Freas spent several days in Berwick among old school-friends.

E. H. Dutton has been out of school for the last month, on account of severe illness.

In behalf of the band we wish to welcome Stanton into its ranks, as chief "base" drummer.

"Prof." Brown wishes to state that he alone has the correct drawing of the Sun-dogs.

Prof. Owens—(to his Monday morning class) "Well what were the points considered last Sunday morning?"

Allen was professionally engaged at Milton on the eleventh. He is getting very popular as a court stenographer.

One of our brilliant "young" students from Northumberland can always be heard saying—"Let's have a two-step."

The Prohibition oratorical contest which was to be held on February 22, has been postponed until the opening of next term.

We are sorry to hear that Mr. R. O. Koons was the first occupant of the new infirmary. We wish him a speedy recovery.

The "Heavenly Twins" have come to stay. They can be found in Room 30 East Wing. Please don't mistake one for t'other.

The effect of the blizzard could be seen all over the world; but, perhaps, nowhere so much as when Chapel assembled on Saturday morning, February 9.

The position of chaperon is not always tempting; but to a certain Senior in college it seems especially fascinating. We refer to skating parties in particular.

Rob't. B. McCay, whose mind we believe is slightly deranged from singing his renowned song "Georgie," had an explosion in the "Lab" about a week ago. He's still breathing.

At the Schumann Concert, several young ladies of the Institute set an example worthy of being followed by Society in our larger cities;—they removed their hats.

The University has once more demonstrated its progressive tendency, by establishing an infirmary. It is very pleasantly located on the first floor; and is tastefully furnished.

On Thursday evening February 14, quite a number of the boys from the hill spent a pleasant evening at the home of Mr. Armstrong helping to entertain a number of young ladies from Lewisburg.

Prof;—"Why do you express yourself in this manner?"

Douglas.—"Because."

The Summers' Club, long known as a non-fraternity club, has lost that distinction, four of its members, J. W. Davis, Charles Firth, G. A. Jennings and A. W. Johnson, having cast their lot with the Phi Epsilon boys.

By the way, has "Walky" been around to your room to tell you that "neat and sweet" story of his yet? If not, prepare to receive him. It's his avowed intention that no one shall miss it.

Manager Collins succeeded in getting some base-ball supplies which will materially help in getting the boys into shape for the coming season. We hope that all available material will settle down to good earnest work during the remainder of the term.

If you are interested in magic, you can certainly be entertained at the Laboratory. "Doc" Brown, after many hours of indefatigable labor, has succeeded in perfecting the "wine and water" trick. Without a doubt he will be glad to exhibit his dexterity in slight-of-hand to all who may apply.

Professor Rockwood has just added another laurel to the many already won. The American Book Company issued last week an edition of Cicero's De Senectute by him and it is within the bounds of truth to say that in all its parts the book displays the accurate scholarship for which the Professor of Latin is noted. It will no doubt have a large sale since it fully sustains the reputation he made in his edition of Paterculus issued recently.

The Phi Epsilon local fraternity crowd, which was originally composed of F. W. Brown, W. T. Paullin, M. R. Collins and P. B. Cregar, members of the Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity, has been increased numerically by the addition of John W. Davis, Charles Firth, G. A. Jennings, A. W. Johnson, A. O. Miller and S. W. Gilpin. At present the organization is in an embryonic condition, but an effort will be made to develop it into a full-fledged fraternity.

The College girls have applied for a study room. It is only just that this request be granted, for they have no room in the University and have been annoyed by the loss of umbrellas, etc., which they have been compelled to leave in the halls.

The current report that the impoliteness of the boys compelled them to leave the library, is quite unfounded, for the College girls are invariably treated with respect and courtesy by the young men, who never enter the room immediately after smoking and never lounge with their feet on the study tables.

B. B. Ware, '96, spent Sunday the 17th, at the home of Irwin, '97.

Arthur D. Hilton, of Coudersport, Pa., was the guest of Ezra Allen on the 18th.

Miss Stiffler, '98, was initiated into the Pi Beta Phi fraternity, Tuesday evening, February 19.

Quite a number of the students spent the evening of February 14, very pleasantly at the home of Miss Wilson on 4th street.

N. F. Davis went to Sunbury recently in the interest of the class in Embryology. He succeeded in securing a fine collection of slides.

Hollinshead journeyed to Philadelphia to vote for Warwick. There is no doubt that he is a staunch Republican, for his vote was certainly not needed.

An open question with the members of the Junior Class:—"Is marriage a failure?" Douglas says it is. We suspect that it is a case of "sour-grapes" on his part.

Davis, '95, is making quite an enviable reputation as a professor of Physiology. Although the class in the general chemistry room makes considerable noise, he smiles serenely and continues with the lesson.

L. G. C. Riemer, '95, has been teaching the Freshman German class during the illness of Professor Loomis. The boys seem much pleased with his methods and they say his command of the language is too much for them.

The recent fire at the "hill" caused quite a disturbance. It is to be regretted that the fire bell was rung, for sometime we will need the fire company and they may not respond. A joke is all right when it is not carried too far.

Sir Walter Scott, Professor Hulley's collie pup, wandered away from his home last Monday morning and was not found until late in the afternoon. The members of the Hebrew class are very glad that the little dagesh was found.

A movement is on foot to arrange the Gymnasium for the introduction of basket-ball. The introduction of this popular game will be heralded with delight by the students, but it should not interfere with the regular work of the classes. Systematic training is better than any game.

When Baldwin started to sweep out his room a week or so ago, his chum immediately began to cover up the books. But Baldwin managed to say,—"Never mind 'chum' I'll not make a dust." What's the trouble "Lea" is "compo" too hard for you?

As we go to press we learn that the Freshmen and Sophomores could not agree upon events for a contest on Washington's Birthday. It is to be regretted that such is the case, for a friendly meeting in athletics will prove a benefit to both classes. Each will know its strength and thus will be able to judge of the amount of extra effort which it will be necessary to put forth in order that a good showing be made at the annual inter-class contest.

Hall's Schumann Lady Quartette rendered one of their characteristic programs, to a small but appreciative audience, on Tuesday evening February 12, at Bucknell Hall. From begining to end the entertainment was excellent, each selection being encored, and heartily responded to. We believe the company to be as strong, if not stronger than last year. It seems to be the opinion of all present, that Miss Waller was especially pleasing in the rendering of her solos. Miss Patton's Scotch dialect is pronounced by our Scotch students as the best imitation they ever heard; all enjoyed her naturalness and artful concealment of all art. Her laughter was as contageous as that of a child.

We look forward with pleasure, to the time when they shall visit us again.

Euepia once again "bobbed up serenely" by holding a Democratic Convention in Bucknell Hall, on Friday evening, February 15. Delegations were present from the North, South, East and West. Tammany was there in all her glory of Rum, Romanism and Rebellion. After much needless "racket" the convention settled down and adopted their platform, the strongest features of which were clauses favoring Free Trade, Woman's Suffrage and Free Whiskey, the effects of the latter being seen on all sides. At the end of the fifteenth ballot, a dark-sorrel horse, Hunt was run through with a rush. Barner was nominated for Vice President, without any serious opposition. Speeches by the nominees followed. The meeting then adjourned amid wild disorder. At intervals the band from the "wooly west" screeched out their infernal music. Taking all things into consideration the convention was a howling success.

The chemical and physical society held its regular bi-weekly meeting on February 7, and the large lecture room was filled with eager listeners. The attraction was Hon. Howard Miller, who continued the interesting talk that he began two weeks previous.

In so far that Mr. Miller went more into details, his last talk was even more interesting than the one of two weeks previous. It was a treat the student could ill afford to miss.

His description of the Old and New Mexico, as well as the remarks concerning the extinct Aztecs and Toltecs, their cities, civilization and public buildings, was both pleasing and highly instructive. That the Aztecs had a place for worship which was far more stupendous in its structure and size than any of the known works of man, the pyramids not excepted, is perhaps a fact not generally known; yet he claimed that such was the case. He also mentioned the irreparable loss to anthropology occasioned by the burning of all the ancient public archives by John Zumarata, a catholic priest.

We would all be glad if Mr. Miller would continue the subject.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

It was an act of kindness for several of the young ladies in the front part of the audience to remove their hats during the recent concert in Bucknell Hall.

It was indeed a suprise when a gentle tap at Miss Marguerite O'Donnell's door was followed by the entrance of her mother who had journeyed all the way from Texas to visit her daugeter.

Class in English Literature,—Teacher—"Mr. L. What was the object of King Arthur's Order of the Round Table?" Mr L.— "So that no one would be slighted because he was not at the head of the table."

Saturday afternoon, February 2nd, Mr. John A. Gundy took a number of students and teachers from the Institute for a sleigh ride. The day was perfect, the sleighing excellent, and all enjoyed themselves, and greatly appreciated Mr. Gundy's kindness.

Despite the inclemency of the weather on Friday afternoon, February 8, a goodly number of College girls gladly availed themselves of the privilege of an "At Home" with Mrs. Hulley.

Quite unconscious of the storm without, the time was delightfully spent by the guests in conversing with Prof. and Mrs. Hulley together with Mrs. Bartol, Mrs. Andrew Leiser and Miss Eddleman, who assisted Mrs. Hulley in receiving. Added to this the cosy aspect of the parlors and the dainty china with its appetizing contents, afforded an afternoon of great pleasure to all present, whose only regret was that some of their number were debarred the enjoyment of an "At Home" given by so charming a hostess.

The program of the Alumnae Meeting February 12, was as follows:—

Music, - - - - - - - Duet, Miss Aikin and Miss Morgan.
Literary Events, - - - - - - - - - - Miss VanDyke.
Political Events, - - - - - - - - - - - - Mrs. Shorkley.

An evening with three recent eminent Scotch Writers.

J. M. Barre. - - - - - - Mrs. Martin and Mrs. Larison.
S. R. Crocket, - - - - - - - - - - - Mrs. A. T. Loomis.
Ian M. Laren, - - - - - - - - - - - - Mrs. Martha Wolfe.
Music, - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - Solo, Miss Gould.

As the evening was spent with the cannie Scots, bannocks and kebbeck would have been appropriate refreshments, but these not being available, the company were regaled with butter-scotch provided by Mrs. Loomis, Mrs. Martin and Mrs. Judd.

ACADEMIC NEWS.

Jordan is practicing pitching regularly in the base-ball cage in the Gymnasium.

Several Freshmen are pursuing honor work in Cicero's Orations in the Academy.

Messrs. Stabler, Miles, Comfort, and Cooper represent the Academy in the University Band.

Meeker is taking regular exercise in the Gymnasium in running. We hope he will represent the Academy in the races on Field Day.

The L'Agenda Board has honored the Fourth Form by giving it space for its history in their annual. The class appreciates their kindness.

Perrin, O! Perrin, what have you done,
That you are the target of the students' fun?
Why did you let that razor slip
And cut the hair from your upper lip?

The following officers of the Athletic Association have been elected. President, John Sherman; Vice President, Cooper; Secretary, Pierson; Treasurer, Wittenmyer; Manager of base-ball team, Anstock.

AN APPEAL.

O soul that longs for pleasure,
  Why linger in the pathway of sin;
Why wander from Jesus and the right,
  Grieving God and your earthly kin;

Why turn from the mother, ever
  Pleading with God day and night:
That her child may turn from sin,
  And early seek Good and right.

O sinner list to the still small voice,
  As in accents of mercy and love,
He is tenderly calling to you
  To turn from sin to Jesus above.

Angels, white robed, beckon thee,
  Pointing, with unsullied hand,
Above to Jesus your Savior;
  Pointing to the heavenly land.

Then will you not come, dear brother,
  And let pleading Jesus reign within:
Lighting up your sin-darkened soul,
  Cleansing your heart from its stain of sin?

Then you will have hopes
  From the dear Savior given:
Of earth's richest treasures,
  And a happy home in heaven.

The other day two Academy students engaged in a good-natured "tongue scrap" which finally ended in a quarrel. They indulged in the free use of decorative embellishments and invedious epithets were exchanged in rapid succession until a personal encounter seemed imminent. They were separated, however, before the floor of Main Hall was drenched in human gore. The boys in question now sing

"We do not speak as we pass by."

The cause of the quarrel can be best explained by that familiar phrase, "a woman was at the bottom of the case."

On February 13th, all the students of Main Hall were summoned into the Principal's office to answer the charge of creating a "racket." They marched into the office at the appointed time. We are unable to enlarge upon the proceedings of the "criminal court" on account of the refusal to admit reporters. We learn, however, that several passages of Blackstone were read to them concerning the rules of the Academy and that they were not punished on promising that they would not repeat the offense.

At the meeting of the New York State Inter-Collegiate Athletic Association held at Syracuse, January 25, Union College was expelled from the association. The charges were: an attempt to join the Triangular League, the employment of men to play on base-ball and foot-ball teams at Union for sums ranging from $200.00 to $300.00 per year and attempts to steal men from other colleges on account of their athletic ability. These charges were substantiated principally by Colgate men, but were denied by Mr. Allen of Union.

A religously inclined student was found pouring over a Bible one day and industriously making notes. After several hours he laid down the book with a sigh of relief. "Well, have you found much consolation?" asked his chum. "Yes, much," he responded. "You know I failed to pass last term. Well, look here," and he shoved the paper across the table. It contained the following: "Thou shall not pass—Numbers xx, 18. Suffer not a man to pass—Judges iii, 28. The wicked shall no more pass—Nahum i, 15. Neither doth any son of man pass—Jeremiah i, 43. Editorial.

WE desire to call attention to the lecture of March 14, which will be delivered in Bucknell Hall by Robert J. Burdette. This well known lecturer and humorist needs no introduction to Lewisburg people, and out of consideration for the liberality of the University in securing such a noted man, the students should turn out en masse. Our town friends should take advantage of such an opportunity also and help to make up an audience worthy of the occasion.

IT has been the just complaint of the Alumni that the most important news of the year, the news of Commencement, never reaches them through the paper which they support. In consideration of this, it has been decided to omit an issue in the middle of the year and add one in June. To do this will require considerable extra work for the editors at Commencement. But to accommodate the Alumni and, in fact, all subscribers and patrons with the news of the closing week of the year, will sufficiently repay the editors for whatever extra work may be occasioned by the change. Just what issue will be dropped has not yet been decided, but, in all probability, it will be the one of March 25, since the break at that time will be the least noticeable.

THE twenty-second of February is past and gone and no one is any the worse in mind or body. The events of the day were of such a character as to deserve recording on the archives and are worthy of imitation by future generations. Just why the under-classmen laid aside their hostile feelings, unless in honor of the great hero whose name and fame the day perpetuates, may remain an unsolved mystery. But the spirit which prompted them and led them to make a great stride toward higher civilization is worthy of admiration. The ever recurring question, who is master, has been left unsettled and may in the future be a source of trouble unless the same spirit remains predominant; in this case there is little doubt that the settlement of the question, whenever it may come up for settlement, will not be effected in a way different from the "good old one."

THE recent action of the Harvard Faculty on foot-ball, while seeming to affect us indirectly, is of significant importance and demands our attention. As one of the smaller colleges, we are bound to look to the larger ones not alone for the rules that govern sports but, largely, for the sports themselves. That is to say, whatever effect the move at Harvard may have on similar colleges will be about the effect upon those of our class. If it results in a radical change of the rules, the whole force of the change will be felt at once; if in the abolishment of intercollegiate contests, which means practically the abolishment of the game, the effect may not be so complete yet for, this reason, no less serious. The great point of attack lies in the matter of training, which, in large colleges, is carried so far as to virtually crowd out other more important features. With the smaller colleges it is not the case to any such extent and thus the game might still be consistent between them when it is no longer so between the larger ones. Nevertheless when some new game takes the place of foot-ball at Harvard, Yale and the others, the matter of consistency will not come into the question and we may look out for a new game also.

There is found in a great many schools a class of students who would never think of using an "interlinear translation" of some one's else make, but are ready enough to use one of their own. This class is said to be limited to Academies, yet it happens that the so-called limit is passed quite frequently, and men carry into college life traits of those boyish days in the preparatory department. Without presuming that there is such a class with us, it might be well for any who are so inclined to consider, apart from the injustice done to others, that after all they are doing themselves more harm than good. And that, like every other unnatural method, each succeeding application leaves the victim more dependent than before, and with only a temporary gain. If some attempt to justify themselves on the plea of poor memories, they must meet with the same success a man would meet with who tries to justify his neglect of exercise on the plea of a weak body. Memory, like the muscles or the senses, is developed by exercise, and the man who seeks to develop it otherwise belongs to the class of people who are always looking for the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow.

THERE has been a great deal of unnecessary and discouraging talk concerning the prospects for base-ball in the coming season. Without doubt the management, and therefore the team itself, is laboring under considerable difficulty, this fact affords no sufficient reason for giving up hopes of measurable success. With proper practice the team will come up to the standard of former years. This is not saying a great deal; at the same time it is no cause for any particular discouragement. There is need of faithful practice and, we are sorry to say, a lack of it. To rectify this is the work and the duty of the team. There is also a corresponding lack of interest on the part of students in general, which, if supplied, would greatly enhance the possibilities of success, and in fact, until this is supplied, we can expect no marked progress in this line of athletics. We have seen the effect of "enthusiasm" in the case of foot-ball; we have yet to see it in the case of base-ball. The objection may be raised that the team in the past has not warranted the placing of any great amount of confidence in it and, therefore, but little interest can be aroused. To this it may be replied that the first thing needed is a manifestation of interest and confidence and the second a continuation of these. As a result, the players will not only feel that they are playing for a purpose but will feel enough confidence in themselves to play at their best.

LIFE.

Life is a mystic river,
Washing two eternal shores;
Launch thy bark and be courageous—
Brave its plunges and its roars.

We may make mistakes in sailing—
Each thing better might have been;
But if we be conscientious,
Error is not always sin.

In the lone and silent watches,
When the hours are passing by,
Then the past comes back before me,
And evokes a tear, a sigh.

Then my thoughts soar off in ether,
Sweeping onward far away,
Like a calm and restless spirit
Floating to eternal day.

But the past is gone forever—
All its joys and sorrows o'er;
Moments lost in chasing phantoms
Will return to us no more.

Onward boldly toward the future!
Fill the measure of the past,
And that wisest Hand will guide you
Safely into port at last.

THE CHARACTERS OF THE TWO BROTHERS IN MILTON'S COMUS.

When a work of art in literature is written to represent ideal standards of human character, it is not always easy, without taking the work from its true realm, to deduce practical lessons from it. Yet in order to be a work of art in the highest sense, the character must approach near enough to humanity so that an evident relation may be established in the mind of the reader. There is a humanity in some characters whose very tenderness is divine; and in some other characters there is a vein of exalted reasoning, which, though it be exalted, is so cold and unsympathetic that no response is awakened in those who hear it.

In Milton's Comus the two brothers represent opposite poles of character, which are in striking contrast at many points. The first brother is shown forth as a logical man:—reasoning every inch of his ground carefully and deliberately; a man who had so much faith in his sister's virtue, that he was willing it should be put to the severest tests unaided by his manly presence. Apparently, out of the realm of sympathetic thought or brotherly affection, he seems to have been little annoyed or anxious that his sister should be left alone in a dark forest at night. He could reason her safe anywhere, at any time and in any circumstances. With apparent plausibility he abandoned himself into entirely trusting the power of virtue though in human mould. Though it be true that an unwilling and chaste mind could not be ravished, even though the body that contained it were, yet the body once polluted must at some time taint the mind. His lofty reasoning by itself, thus fails of a practical conclusion. While a thousand dangers threaten his weary, lost sister, and even while the heated breath of Comus, burning with passion, pours foul speeches into her virgin ears, her brother, calm and wise in argument, delays to look for her. Andrew Jackson once said—"Take time to deliberate, but when the time for action arrives, stop thinking and go in."

The younger brother was far different in character. Amply avowing his faith in the unsullied purity of his sister, and in her strong and chaste character, he yet doubts the power of these, in her delicate body, to resist brute force. He fears "Lest some illgreeting touch attempt the person of" his "unowned sister." His nature is sympathetic, and it reaches out in tender solicitude for her. His affection seems brotherly; he is unwilling to trust his sister to the possible dangers of night and solitude in a forest. He does not believe less in her virtue, but he is too kind to brook the thought of her frail body being overcome, and her chaste heart offended if not mortally wounded. His practical reasoning does not sound quite so lofty,—it does not fit the mouth quite so well, nor linger so pleasingly in the ear as that of his elder brother; but it has the ring of a true heart and the judgment of a sensible man.

We may say of the reasoning of the elder brother—

"How charming is divine philosophy,
Not harsh, and crabbed, as dull fools suppose,
But musical as is Apollo's lute
And a perpetual feast of nectar's sweets,
Where no crude surfeit reigns."

Yes, but the divinest philosophy is only applied to human affairs successfully, when its possessor couples it with practical philosophy and ready action. In the Comus, the Spirit is far more solicitous than the elder brother, for the Lady; and the younger brother is like the Spirit, sympathetic, reasonable, sagacious and ready for action.

Great wisdom is sometimes so ponderous that its possessor cannot utilize it. It was so with the elder brother in the Comus; it is so with many men in the world to-day. That man is best equipped for every contingency in life who has wisdom and knows how to use it. As the preacher expresses it: "Get wisdom: and with all thy getting, get understanding."

THE VERSE OF BUNYAN.

The writings of Bunyan have won for him a world-wide fame:—a fame to perish only with that of our greatest authors. But it was the prose of Bunyan that attained this result and, in fact, but a small part of this prose even. But his verse, through an almost utter lack of any intrinsic merit, is scarcely known to exist. And yet, there are certain points of interest about it, in the relations it bears to its author, that may make it worth while to consider it briefly.

It has been said, that Bunyan's verse was the outgrowth of his religion and his ignorance. Not stopping to consider the statement in its individual parts—as a whole it is true. His verse is the outgrowth of Bunyan. And Bunyan was both religious and ignorant. He was quaint and unassuming, too, in his life. These characteristics are shared by all his works. He suffered much, and in his verse there is often a strain arising from this suffering. He lived among simple men and for them. His verse seems to be such as would most powerfully affect such men. Such, I think, are the more general characteristics of Bunyan's verse.

Furthermore, the verse of Bunyan discloses to us somewhat more fully what he himself was, than does his prose. In the latter, he is shown almost altogether as a religious enthusiast. That is, the subjects deal only with religious matters, and thus reveal but one side of the author's character. His verse, on the other hand, opens to the readers' observance the more varied and personal qualities. Bunyan is there seen in moods resulting from happier circumstances, as well as from the greatest adversity and even from the suffering of a long prison life. His kindly submissive nature is seen at one time. Then, we find a livelier strain, becoming even merry in a few instances.

Let us note by a few illustrations the setting forth of these various phases of his character. First, then, his verse abounds in evidence of the simple childlike faith, so characteristic of Bunyan. We may see this in the following:

"The prison very sweet to me
Hath been, since I came here;
And so would also hanging be,
If God will there appear."

Then his submissive nature is well shown in this—

"And can with very much content
For my profession die."

Bunyan was in a happy mood and happier circumstances when he composed his "Apology" for the "Pilgrim's Progress." And here we see the side of his character not brought out in his prose. It was a merry nature that wrote—

"For having now my method by the end, Still as I pulled, it came."

Marks of strong common sense, too, are far from lacking—in fact, all of Bunyan's writings are full of such. Not infrequently this results in expressions of well nigh Pope-like terseness, and in much the style of that writer. However, it is difficult to illustrate this by scattered quotations, so essentially are they parts of a whole.

Yet observe the following:

"Solidity, indeed, becomes the pen
Of him that writeth things divine to men."

"Some love the meat, some love to pick the bones."

"My dark and cloudy words, they do but hold
The truth, as cabinets enclose the gold."

I think that this will be enough to show that Bunyan's verse is not utterly valueless, however amusing may be its jingle. For it is instructive as to its author, and further than that, the introduction to the "Pilgrim's Progress," at least, can be read quite profitably, for the matter which it itself contains.

THE HISTORICAL ELEMENT IN GEORGE EBERS' WRITINGS.

Germany has produced during the past century many eminent men. In poetry, she has reason to be proud of Goethe and Schiller; in philosophy, of Hegel and Kant; in other lines, of Müller, Lessing, Van Moltke, and Bismark. But it has been of late that she has developed and revealed to the world a novelist.

In our own country the historical works of George Ebers, the German historical novelist, are having a rapidly increasing sale. The reading public seems to appreciate the efforts of the author to instruct as well as entertain.

Especially attractive is the historical element in his writings. Of the early poriods of Egyptian history, we find brilliant pictures. Ebers' description of Thebes, with its "hundred gates," has been read from the pulpit by some of our best ministers. Thebes the living, and Thebes the dead, separated by the Nile, are so contrasted that the soul warms and glows while reading of the beauties of the one, and shrinks upon itself when it beholds the other. The living Thebes of Homer and the Bible, capital of Egypt, city of mighty warriors, filled with magnificent palaces and luxurious gardens, lies on one side of the muddy Nile; while on the other bank, to the West, dark and gloomy, inhabited by priests and embalmers, skirted by rocky cliffs, honey-combed with graves, lies the "City of the Dead."

On the eastern bank of the Nile, Rameses, the king, had his palace and held his court. But he was seldom at home. Wars with nations in Ethiopia and Asia occupied him and his myriads for many years during his reign. The author skillfully weaves into "Uarda" the results of his long study of inscriptions and papyrus rolls. He himself translated a great Egyptian epic poem in which Rameses is represented battling at Kadesh with the hosts of the Assyrians. His tall, commanding person is seen among the foremost of the warriors. Skillfully he shoots his arrows and wields his sword, until, surrounded by the enemy, he is swallowed up by their hosts. But the author of the future epic rushes down a mountain side with a few followers, and, after performing miracles of valor, rescues his king.

The author then, with great tact, changes the scene to the court of Thebes. The mighty warrior frames laws, judges, rewards and punishes, transacts the peaceful duties of his office, and goes among his people, shedding mercy, that "attribute to awe and majesty."

But there was a power stronger than the king. Ebers tells the tale of the people's fear, of the king's secret dread, and of the haughty self-assertion of the priest caste. Apart from the multitude, versed in all the knowledge of the day, whether in science or medicine, and keeping it for themselves, awing the people with their mystic rites, the priests were inviolable. For themselves they had a religion that recognized God; but for the people, a debasing paganism. Originally the people were told to look up to God through the image and the animal; but it was not long before the objects themselves were worshipped.

Then, leaping over centuries, the novelist brings us face to face with dying paganism and persecuted Christianity. In "Homo Sum," one of his best productions, Mt. Sinai is brought to the reader's notice. On this lonely mountain dwelt men who were tired of the world, driven from their homes by the intolerant priest-hood, and at variance with their spiritual leaders. Hermit life is depicted as it was in the second century of the Christian era. The ascetics struggle with the flesh, lashing themselves and fasting; often they fall when they feel strongest.

In Alexandria the growing power of the church, and its intolerance of other creeds as well as paganism, receives due attention from the learned author. Roman military power seems to have been used, mainly, to keep the various religious factions in a semblance of peace. Much persecution fell upon these early Christians, yet they persevered, and finally converted their conquerors.

While reading of the conflicts between idolatry and God's religion, of the curious beginnings of monastic life one cannot help comparing that day and this. As we peruse Ebers' works, before us comes an ancient world, full of moving figures—kings, nobles, priests, and people. Egyptian history is so presented that even the dullest reader begins to take an interest in this "Gift of the Nile;" while the theologian and the Egyptologist are filled with admiration at the learning and deep research shown by George Ebers.

WILLIAM FARROW, JR.

In the death of William Farrow, Jr., a graduate of Bucknell University in the class of 1890, Delta Chapter of Phi Gamma Delta Fraternity loses an honored and beloved member.

Mr. Farrow was an earnest Christian and loved to take part in the religious work of the college and vicinity. His amiable and happy disposition brought him the respect and admiration not only of the members of his fraternity, but of all his fellow students.

As a student Bro. Farrow stood high in his classes. He was diligent and painstaking in all his work, knowing that upon his college course depended much of his future success. In all his work, however, he was hampered by ill-health. It was for this reason that he sought a change of climate and surroundings in the far west. In spite of the best medical advice, however, on February 6, Bro. Farrow died in a small town of Arizona, rendering up his soul to the God whom he had trusted and followed from his youth.

Athletics.

FIRST ANNUAL INDOOR MEET IN TUSTIN GYMNASIUM.

One of the most interesting and most hotly contested athletic meets that has been held at Bucknell was given on the afternoon of Washington's Birthday in Tustin Gymnasium. That the meet was a success from the spectacular point of view as well as from the financial, was largely due to the efforts of Athletic Director, Bromley Smith. He was ably assisted in the management by the members of the General Athletic Committee, H. S. Schuyler, F. Miller and J. Cutler. The officials were as follows: Judges, Prof. Hulley and Prof. Hamblin. Timer, Prof. Bartol. Starter, B. Reynolds. Announcer of events, F. I. Sigmund. Judge of boxing, E. K. Reitmeyer. Clerk of Course, J. B. Suiter. Among the records broken were the mile run and the high kick. Records were established for the high dive, the 20 yards dash and the standing broad jump. The program and records are as follows:

HIGH DIVE:

1st.	Lindemann, '98,	5 feet, 5 inches.
2nd.	Mulkie, '98,
3rd.	Elliott, '98,

ONE-FOURTH MILE DASH:

1st.	Jackson, '95,	1 minute 13 seconds.
2nd.	Dillon, '97,
3rd.	Fithian, '98,

RUNNING HIGH JUMP:

1st.	Williams, '96,	4 feet 11 inches.
2nd.	Lindemann, '98, Koch, '98,	tied.

ONE-HALF MILE RUN:

1st.	Slifer, '98,	2 minutes 33 2-5 seconds.
2nd.	Grim, '97,
3rd.	Koch, '98,

BOXING:

Harper, '96,	Points, 15-17; 22-26; 22-16.
D. Baker, '97,

Contest adjudged to Harper on account of back-heeling.

TWENTY YARD DASH:

1st.	Thomas, '98,	3 seconds.
2nd.	A. Smith, '98,

BAR VAULT:

1st.	W. H. Carey, '95,	Heights, Left, 5 ft. 5 in. Right, 5 ft. 8 in. Through Hands, 4 ft. 11 in.

1st.	Elliott, '98,	8 ft. 10½ in.
2nd.	Mulkie, '98,
3rd.	Jackson. '95,

HIGH KICK.

1st.	Amos Williams, '96,	8 ft. 6 in.
2nd.	Lindemann, '98,

BOXING:

Jordan,	Points, 15-18; 15-17; 18-21;
Diefenderfer,

Diefenderfer won the decision.

FENCING EXHIBITION:

B. Smith, '95, and Ezra Allen, '95.

MILE RUN:

1st.	Slifer, '98,	5 minutes 38 seconds.
2nd.	Dillon, '97,
3rd.	Miller, '97,

POLE VAULT:

1st.	Mulkie, '98,	Height, 7 feet 11 inches.
2nd.	Grim, '97,

WRESTLING, (catch-as-catch-can):

Davis, '95,
Harper, '96,

Time called without a fall.

It is expected that the annual meet in May will be of exceptional interest on account of the fine showing of the class of '98. The class of '95 holds the MIRROR cup for class championship, and as such will be challenger in the coming contests.

Local.

We hear—

That "Walky" got his hair cut.

That Colestock is in love.

That Powell saw "her" last Sunday.

That Harper and Fisk are bold firemen.

That there will be plenty of trout this year.

That the local editors have taken out a life insurance policy.

That Baker of the postage stamp cap is a brilliant financier.

That trailing arbutus parties are being formed at the Seminary.

That L'Agenda of '95, will surpass all of its predecessors, both in originality and finish. But we doubt it.

Dr. Avirагnet has re-organized his orchestra.

Chas. W. Firth spent Washington's Birthday at Chester.

J. A. Guie spent Washington's Birthday at his home in Catawissa.

We notice bicycle "adds" on the bulletin board. Surely Spring is coming.

A number of very fine pictures were on exhibition in the library several days.

George Tilden Ritter has been initiated a member of the Phi Epsilon Fraternity.

"Pop" Yoder and his chum insist on there being such a thing as "dark-light."

Overheard at the "Gym" on the 22nd. "What makes him wabble so, when he walks."

For a sure method of recovering a stolen dog, apply to Prof. Hulley. Consultation free.

We are glad to notice that there was no flag raised on the College building on the 22nd.

J. Y. Sinton, '97, occupied the pulpit at Chillisquaque on Sunday evening, March 3.

A. G. Loomis, '95, is seriously ill at his home on 3rd street. We wish him a speedy recovery.

R. O. Koons has gone home for the remainder of the term, to recuperate from his severe illness.

Ask "Doc" Brown the cause for the blueness of the atmosphere and the sulphurous fumes at the Lab. not long ago.

Prof. Hulley's little daughter is at this writing, quite sick. The Professor and Mrs. Hulley have the sympathy of the entire school.

The Cole-stock is very low, so they will have to Diggs'ome Moyer. At the same time the Wood and Koch Stock are in like condition.

One of the students while advising another to keep quiet, said—"You'd better keep your mouth shut, if you don't, you'll put your foot in it."

Isn't it too bad those mean Soph's wouldn't let "Willie" show us how many times he could raise that big dumb-bell by the means of his mighty arm.

On Tuesday evening, March 5, the annual election of officers for the Y. M. C. A. was held. The following are the officers for the coming year: President, B. B. Ware; Vice President, A. S. Barner; Treasurer, E. C. Kunkle; Corresponding Secretary, H. Fithian; Recording Secretary, Carol Summerbell.

How is it H. L. Purdy takes so much care with his hair just before the 9:15 period? Can it be, because he goes down to the "Sem" at that hour? However he has not yet fallen into Bowman's habit of going down 15 or 20 minutes ahead of time.

WANTED! A good studious young man as a chum for the coming school year; one who will do all the sweeping. Inquire at Room 6, East Wing. Come early and avoid the rush.

The following members of the Class of '98 have been selected for the Prize Contest in declamation. Davis, Hill, Geary, Hazen, Lindemann, Stober, Thomas, Miss Chambers and Miss Rodgers.

A large number of the "boys" went to Milton on Sunday evening, February 17, to hear R. J. Ryan's lecture on the question, "Is the Catholic church Hostile to the Political Institutions of the United States."

J. B. Suiter, the retiring manager of the MIRROR, recently gave a reception to the members of the new and old boards. The evening was very profitably spent in discussing how the MIRROR might be further improved and its usefulness extended.

Hon. Howard Miller delivered one of his usual entertaining lectures at the Laboratory before the Physical and Chemical Societies. He showed us vividly how Coffee was planted, raised and prepared for the market. At the end of the lecture a rising vote of thanks was tendered to the speaker.

In the last issue of the MIRROR was an account of the organization of the Bucknell Alumni Club of Pittsburg. At that time the names of the officers could not be learned, but since they have been secured and are as follows: president, Rev. C. A. Hare; vice president, Rev. H. F. King; secretary, W. M. Woodward, M.D., and treasurer, C. C. Law.

Prof. in German.—"You cannot have been among the Germans very much or you would have heard that expression."

Mr. H—. "Professor, I am not a Pennsylvania Dutchman!

Prof. "I did not mean to honor you with that title."

From all appearances Haddock has some one who thinks of him. He now "sports" a velvet, rat-colored, satin-lined, ruffled-back and front smoking jacket. He is so much in love with it, that he even wears it to class. All inquiring persons may call at any of the class rooms and see the novelty. I assure you it's quite harmless.

Some of the striking remarks of the debaters:—

Colestock, (as the gavel sounded)—"But to hasten on—."

Douglas:—"Some say woman has been looked down by the other sex; but t'isn't so, I assure you it t'isn't."

Rohland:—"They were shot dead, and I saw them myself laid out in the stable."

Harris, (at the end of the debate)—"the—meeting—is—now—closed."

The Union City Club of Bucknell University was organized on February 19. Frank W. Dillon was elected president, LeRoy Hall, vice president and Miss Gertrude E. Church, secretary. The object of the club is the extension of the influence of Bucknell in north-western Pennsylvania. The organization of such clubs among the students is an excellent plan, and much excellent work for the University can be accomplished in the way of influencing young men and women interested in education, to come to our school.

"SQUIBS" FROM THE "LAB."

Stephens and Williams, after laboring for some hours trying to inject the femoral artery of one of the feline race, found that the artery was none other than the sciatic nerve.

Macnab has a cat which has very peculiar digestive organs. One of the most peculiar things about it is the position of the kidneys. They being placed in the lower part of the stomach.

Miss R. says the dear little cat was tender and gentle—a perfect little pet around the house; but Davis says the kitten was a perfect tiger.

Fair Junior:—"Mr. Williams please loan me your 'scapula' to clean out this mortar."

Friday evening, March 1, was very Profitably spent in Bucknell Hall by all concerned. For an hour and a half the orators of the Junior class successively held the attention of an appreciative audience. It was the second debate in the series of the Junior Prize Contest. The subject—"Resolved that Labor Organizations Promote the Welfare of Society in the United States," was ably upheld by Messrs. Lewis, Douglas and McCay, while Messrs. Colestock, Wood, Rohland and Powell, very forcibly presented the contrary. Colestock, Douglas, Lewis and Wood were the men chosen by the judges to do further battle for the honors of the Class as debaters. The meeting was very ably presided over by H. F. Harris of the class of '96.

Mr. Forrest Russell, who attended Bucknell during '79 and '80, will manage the production of Pauline Hall's famous opera "Amorita," to be given March 21, at the Lewisburg Opera House. He will be assisted by local talent, Miss Derr taking the leading lady part. The following is the cast:

FRA BOMBARDA	F. F. RUSSELL.
Angelo Melanatti	W. M. Funnell.
Castrucci	G. S. Megargee.
Sparicani	Chas. Clarke.
Fortibraccio	A. T. Williams.
Geronimo	Lawrence Slack.
Ambassador	A. Scott Sheller.
Lorenzi Patruccio	Robert Van Valzah.
Beppo	Wm. Seaman.
Poalo	Miss Irene Walls.
Perpetua	Mrs. J O. Dreisbach.
AMORITA	MISS MARY DERR.

Peasants, Courtiers, Citizens, Flower-girls, Soldiers, Etc.

The Natural History Society held its regular bi-monthly meeting on February 27. Though the attendance was small, the program rendered was very interesting and instructive. Dr. Aviragnet's translated lecture on sugar-cane was exceptionally good. Mr. Stevens gave a very interesting talk on the work that has been done during the past year in entomology. He mentioned the fact that entomologists were beginning to be regarded as indispensable agents to the science of agriculture.

The subject of antitoxine was discussed by Mr. Grim. In his remarks he stated that antitoxine was believed by medical authorities at present to be a sure approach if not an entirely successful remedy for the cure of diphtheria and other allied diseases caused by micro-organisms or by their toxins.

At a meeting of the newspaper correspondents and others interested in practical journalism in the President's office, Monday evening, February 18, the Bucknell Press Association was re-organized. The object of the press bureau is, first of all, University representation in print, and secondly, mutual study of modern journalism as represented by the leading publications of the day.

Mr. W. C. Gretzinger was re-elected president and Vincent B. Fisk, secretary. Harris, Thomas and LeVan were appointed a committe to draw up a constitution. Dillon, Bower, and Hunt, were appointed as the executive committee for the year. Additions to the honorary membership of the club were made by the selection of Miss Carry Reese, a graduate of the Institute, now connected with the Pittsburg Commercial-Gazette, and Mr. George N. McCain of the Philadelphia "Press." The club is arranging for several lectures on journalism by prominent newspapermen of the state.

Bucknell is to have the privilege of entertaining the presidents of the various Y. M. C. A's in the colleges and preparatory schools of Pennsylvania. The conference will convene in the latter part of April. Some fifty representatives from all parts of the state will be with us.

It seems needless to state that Washington's Birthday was appropriately observed at Bucknell. Routine work was suspended and a large number of the students attended the exercises held in Bucknell Hall.

It had been previously announced that Prof. Hulley would give an address on the "Formation and Adoption of the Constitution" and Prof. Perrine on the "Interpretation of the Constitution," but for lack of time, this program could not be carried out.

After a prayer by Rev. L. C. Davis, '76, Prof. Hulley took the platform and with few preliminary remarks, opened the subject by discussing the difficulties which were encountered by the colonists at the close of the war. There were the heavy debts which had been incurred; the problem of disbanding the army; disruptions between the states due to the demoralized condition of the finances, and many more equally difficult.

He showed that the Continental Congress was quite inadequate to cope with these difficulties. It was a league and not a union:—a diplomatic and not a legislative body. The members acted for their state and not as individuals.

This weakness led to the calling of a convention for the purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation. Our Constitution is the product of this body. A fact of particular interest to college men is, that a majority of the members of this convention were college graduates.

Many difficulties were encountered by this body. The questions of Representation, method for electing the Executive, and others of equal importance, were met bravely and conquered. Sectional feeling was seen at this early date and compromises were numerous. It was only after many weeks of hard labor that the final instrument was placed before the people, and it was many more before it was ratified.

Prof. Perrine, in a few remarks, begged to be excused from delivering his address and Pres. Harris dismissed the audience with the benediction. The University Band furnished the music.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Miss Eliza Bell is with us, and thinks a week in Pennsylvania worth a month in Alabama.

Miss Goddard's many friends will be glad to know that she is now convalescent, and will resume her studies in April.

Washington's Birthday, coming on Friday, gave an opportunity for the students to visit their homes. The Institute ranks were considerably lessened until Monday morning.

Miss Ayer, secretary of the Philadelphia Student Volunteers, spent Sunday at the Institute in the interest of this work. She met the Volunteers and gave them much encouragement and many new plans for work. Her addresses in Bucknell Hall and in the Institute parlor were well received. She presented the importance of the work and the special need of medical preparation. We find visits from practical workers very helpful.

A few mornings ago the class in English Literature listened to an instructive and entertaining lecture by Prof. Martin on Robert Browning. Prior to the lecture the class had a rather dim conception of the universality of Browning's genius, but Prof. Martin made us realize the wonderful breadth and power of the poet, who was first of all an optimist and so in sympathy with humanity that he struck the key-note of the heart life of his characters by showing not alone what they were, but what they longed to be. The class is anticipating with pleasure a talk by the Professor on Lord Tennyson.

ACADEMIC NEWS.

Why not have an "Athletic Meet" of Academy students?

Bayard has been elected captain of the baseball team.

E. D. Fields of Smithfield, Pa., recently entered the Academy.

Cleeland went to Philadelphia a few days ago to have his eyes examined.

Tommy Evans has been compelled to leave school because of sickness.

Several students of the Academy attended the Y. M. C. A. convention at Danville.

George Jenkinson, a recent student of Peddie Institute, has entered the Academy.

Craig and Shuhart were called home recently to attend the funeral of relatives.

Professor, (in Latin class after reading over the lesson):—"There is not a new word in to-day's lesson."

Mr. H. "The Bible says there is nothing new under the sun, Professor."

The preliminary contest in Declamation of the Third Form was held in Bucknell Hall, Saturday, March 3. The following contestants were chosen: Stabler, Pearse, Kulp, Ross, Anstock, Sieber, Wenck, Cottrell, and Sherman.

On February 16, the members of the Adelphia Literary Society and their lady friends took a sleigh ride to Mifflinburg. They proceeded to the Deckard Hotel where a bounteous repast awaited them. After spending a pleasant evening, they returned reporting a good time.

Personals.

'81. Rev. H. F. Stillwell of Freehold, N. J. has been called to the Calvary Baptist Church of Minneapolis Minn.

'84. Geo. P. Miller, Esq., was recently elected County Clerk and Recorder of Taos County, New Mexico.

'91. R. C. H. Catterall, upon completing a Ph. D. course at Chicago University, will be offered a position as instructor in that institution.

Ex-'91. William Mahaffey Kinports died at Cherrytree, Pa., on Monday evening, February 18, of consumption. He graduated in medicine from the University of Pennsylvania in '93, but because of ill-health, he was compelled to give up his practice. He went to the mountains of West Virginia but found no relief. Returning to his home last October, he gradually lost strength until death ended his sufferings.

Ex-'92. Samuel Iredell, Esq., of Bridgeton, N. J., passed a very flattering examination before the State Board at Trenton, this month for admission to the practice of law in the several courts of New Jersey.

'92. Robert J. Holmes was ordained to the ministry on Tuesday, February 27. He has been preaching at the first Baptist Church of Atglen, Pa., and upon receiving a call to that church, presented his credentials and was ordained.

'92. Homer Dowlin, Esq., after pursuing a course of study in the University of Minnesota and having concluded a successful law- clerkship in the office of Hon. Geo. P. Wilson, was admited to the bar at Minneapolis, Minn., and has opened an office at 765 Temple Court, that city.

Ex-'93. H. W. Sneck, Esq., is practicing law at Rochester, N. Y.

'93. Miss Nellie W. Conard is an instructor in the West Academy of Temple College, Philadelphia.

'94. Franklin Reese Strayer has been elected to the chair of mathematics in Stetson College, DeLand, Florida.

Ex-'95. R. D. Minch was at the College a few hours on February, 27.

Ex-'95. Chas. Hall was married on Wednesday, February 27, to Miss Ella Keyser of Chillisquaque.

Ex-'96. Charles A. Mudge, now of Cornell University, won the Sibley prize for proficiency in Mechanical Arts.

—Amos S. Hershey, a former college student here, recently received the degree of Ph.D. from the University of Heidelberg, and is now the holder of the Goodwin Memorial Fellowship in International Constitutional Law at Harvard University. He is now at Paris continuing his studies.

Editorial.

THE improvements of the University are moving on a-pace. The infirmary is an addition of the last term, a spacious, well-lighted, completely isolated room and with a high ceiling. It makes sickness considerably more tolerable for the unfortunate and, from its position and arrangements, will prevent the spreading of any infectious disease. Altogether it is an improvement which we feel proud of yet hope to make use of but little. To further the sanitary regulations the famous Pasteur Filters will be introduced in the various buildings. Everybody realizes how necessary pure water is to health or better how disastrous impure water has always been to a community. It is strange that this fact is so often disregarded, and the University is certainly making a wonderful stride in taking every precaution for the health of its students. The corps of instructors in the Academy will be increased the coming year. This important branch of the University has not been neglected in the general improvement rush and the additions that are made to its Faculty from time to time is a proof that the public recognizes the increased advantages. Other additions and improvements in the various departments are contemplated which we are not at liberty to mention here.

WE are not supposed to devote these coulums exclusively to the interest of base-ball, field sports, &c., though it may actually seem that this is our only purpose. Other publications are guilty of the same thing and some have gone so far as to use up entire issues with athletic news. In a sense this shows the important place athletics hold in College life while at the same time it is a mark of discredit to the students who are continually urged to practice more faithfully. It ought to be understood by the candidates for any team that constant practice is expected of them and not that they are to occasion continual drumming up by the captain. If this simple fact was kept well in mind, it would save a great deal of unnecessary trouble, allow more room for encouragement in the columns of the paper and require less moralizing on the tardiness of the candidates. We soon should reach the stage, if we have not already reached it, where the interest in practice will not be forced but voluntary. For this season everyone knows and sees that if we are to have any success in base-ball and field sports it will be the result of faithful practice, and there should be no need of having this forever forced upon us until its stimulating effect is altogether removed. Once for all at the beginning of the term every man who aspires to the teams should take an oath to be as prompt and faithful in his practice as he can possibly be. We are not aiming to develop professionals but to gain credit in a line of athletics in which in the past we have been especially weak.

A year or so ago some worthy men, by way of experiment, offered two prizes in debate open to the Junior class. This year the prizes are again offered and the affair is attracting no little attention as well as urging the contestants to extraordinary exertion. The success of this experiment does not seem to lie so much in the pecuniary or honorary inducements as in the inherent worth of the practice in one of the greatest of all arts, and in this strikes the key note of all prize-giving. When the contestant feels, though unsuccessful as a prize winner, that his personal gain is great and that the prize itself is but an addendum of no vital importance, the object of the prize-giver is almost or entirely reached. This leads to the question, What is the object of prize-giving? Undoubtedly to induce extraordinary exertion along certain lines of work with a reward to pay for the trouble. If this reward is the prize itself and the honor there may be in holding it, few will be successful and it becomes a very cheap affair. There must be a better and more certain reward,the reward of knowledge gained by hard, honest work, with the prize itself as an occasional incentive.

There are prizes offered along certain lines of work which men as a class might follow a lifetime and gain in the end neither distinction nor self-satisfaction, and the few who gain either, as a rule, would have done so without any incentive other than their own inclination. Consequently it seems hardly a paying investment to offer large inducements along such lines of work when the most of those who follow them might do better in other lines. There are also prizes offered along excellent lines of work such as all might follow with profit if the conditions were made strict enough. The trouble is with the conditions which are often times made so light that the rather bright fellow has an easy time over his slower and possibly steadier brethren and in winning has only the prize as his reward while the less fortunate have their regrets and envious feelings. We are proud to say we have a few prizes which can be reached by hard work and in no other way, and the winners can in no way feel that they have everything and the rest their pains for their trouble. The debate prizes are of this class and it is to be hoped that others interested in education and inclined to encourage by offering prizes may consider the fact of the case and make their contests paying investments to all who may enter.

ALPINE HUNTER'S SONG.

(From Wilhelm Tell.)

The heights thunder loudly, the rocks echo back,
The huntsman, undaunted, pursues his wild track;
He strides, a lone figure,
O'er broad fields of ice
That Spring ne'er adorneth
With verdure's device.

Beneath his feet rolleth a wide, misty sea,
The cities of men no more knoweth he,
Till glint through the cloud-rifts
Faint glimpses of earth,
Till through the mist-billows
The green fields shine forth.

A DISSENT.

"There is no safer criterion of character than everyday speech * * * * the words, the tones, the pronunciation, the accent."—Bucknell Mirror, Feb. 10, 1895.

A certain inmate of one of the conventional houses on Fifth Avenue, New York City, has never been known to abbreviate, mispronounce nor misplace words and never to indulge in slang expressions; and whose flawless syntax and smooth, correctly expressed sentences would delight the heart or head of any grammarian. What a character, what a magnificent character we should expect! What a noble pattern from which to model our own is this aristocratic pet parrot!

The speech and mannerisms of people are more the outgrowth of environment than the product of character. Long continued use becomes habit and although the environment may be changed, the habit to some extent still clings. To habit then "We must in charity attribute most of the errors" rather than "to real ignorance;" for frequently those who make the most mistakes are well aware of their failings. This consciousness leads to timidity, timidity to hesitancy, hesitancy to confusion and further mistakes. Frequently too, their theoretical knowledge of the English speech is more extensive and thorough than those who daily "talk like the book."

But not to habit alone would we attribute these errors. Sometimes men inspired by lofty thoughts or bright ideas of inventive genius, when they undertake to impart them to others are at a disadvantage; they are so impelled by the energy of their enthusiasm, that in their haste their utterance is left to take care of itself; and it, unless it be very well trained, will probably result in numerous mistakes of "pronunciation, tone and accent."

Shall they stop to feel for appropriate terms and seek the nice adjustment of words in well rounded sentences and allow the precious ideas to escape? A thorough course in Rhetoric, Elocution and Practical Grammar, may to some extent counteract the effect of lack of early training and unfavorable environment. And perhaps we shall become so proficient in the art of expression that we shall not feel the need of thoughts to be expressed.

A Philosophical and Literary course may broaden the mind, strengthen the intellect and elevate the soul. If but one course was within the reach of an individual, which should he choose? Can there be any doubt when we know "there is no safer criterion of character than everyday speech?" Place a pen in the hand of our great Hawthorne and behold the wonderful result; place him in a company of men and women and bid him converse and he is completely at a loss what to say, or how to say it.

One of the messages Browing gives us is that truth cannot be gained through words. While Ruskin declares. "Thousands can talk, to one who can think."

McH.

AN APPEAL FOR JOURNALISM.

In any profession the man who can convey his knowledge to others in clear, forcible, pure language is the man who, in a great majority of cases, climbs to the top of the ladder in his work. This is obviously true in the case of the minister, the lawyer, and the teacher. The scientist seems to be as far from being reconciled to this as any man, for his demonstrations must be concrete and explanations are seldom required when specimens, illustrating the subject under discussion, are used. But how could science advance if the experimenter, discovering a new specie in some remote place, could not describe it in such language as to make the specie known to the world?

What would science have been to day if Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, Hugh Miller and a score of other illustrious men in the province of science had not possessed literary ability to make their many obscure facts known to the world at large through their wonderful command of language which so clothed their ideas in fluent, harmonious phrases as to allow the thought to expand quietly, unobtusively, like the opening of a flower?

To be able to write with a clear, forcible, yet artistic style, is an accomplishment to be desired by all. In this, as in everything, it requires patient practice to reach proficiency, but once acquired, you will never regret the time spent upon it. While there are many ways for practice, the college journal offers the student a grand opportunity for developing his talent. Some of our greatest writers of this era began their literary careers as college journalists.

The early poems of Oliver Wendell Holmes were written for the "Harvard Collegian." In those columns appeared many articles from the pen of this scientific literary man; and in after years, when his success was apparent on two continents, he acknowledged the great impetus he received in literary pursuits from his connection with his college paper. Richard Harding Davis began his career as a journalist on the sheet published during his college days.

As was before stated, the college journal offers a golden opportunity for every undergraduate who is ambitious in a literary line. But it is no small task to convince many a worthy man that this is a fact. A student is approached with the request for a contribution and he will reply that "There are so many to contribute to the paper that I could not hope to have my production published; I cannot afford to spend my time and thought on something that will never be used." Well what is to be done if all reply as this one? Possibly a promise will be given him to publish his article; but then the editor is liable to be embarrassed, for some glaring statements might be made which would reflect very "green" light upon him if he allowed it to go to press; and of course the writer would be offended if it did not. Another, with the reputation of a literary man, might present such a heavy, awkwardly constructed article that it would require careful revision before going to press. If changes be suggested, he is offended in a minute at the thought that the editor should take the liberty to criticise his work. Such writers are very unreasonable; for if it be mention that it should be considered an honor to have their article chosen in competition, or that revision is the surest method to secure a good style, they will be offended. Their work is above comparison, and must be given precedence.

Again, there are men who "Can't write anything good enough." These, are about as unreasable as the others. Nine-tenths of them have never tried and the remainder, too contracted in their views, have presented articles which have no interest to anyone except themselves. One may be pursuing work in Railroading, we will say, and presents a dissertation on the "Transition Curve" that may be of intrinsic merit; but it cannot be used in a college paper when possibly not more than one out of twenty will be able to understand it. Another will submit an oration on "Webster as a Patriot" or an essay on "Rosalind." Such time-worn, thread-bare themes, are all right in their place, but their place is not in the columns of a college journal. After "regrets" from the editor on several such occasions, it is natural that they should say they "can't write anything good enough." It certainly is discouraging, yet with a proper exercise of judgment in choice of theme it might not be so.

The last excuse a college man should offer when approached for contributions, is the lazy man's "I don't have time." This is the weakest excuse of all. In the majority of cases, observation will reveal the fact that this same student has any amount of time to visit his industrious, plodding neighbor, and occupy his time with gossip savoring of the corner grocery. Time! He does not realize the meaning of the term. Possibly he has fallen into the Bias of Happy Exercise and thinks that the benefits to be derived from the study of Folk-Psychology on the corner are more profitable than any work he could do in the college community. Under such conditions the work would certainly be too fascinating to allow him time to write for the college journal. Time! Take time! The busiest man I know, one who does his own work and that of an indolent partner, never complains of not having time. Haven't time to improve the faculty most useful to a man in this advanced age? All are very sorry for such people and no doubt would recommend that they proceed immediately to that place provided for tired, distorted, and weak minds.

There is one class it is a pleasure to meet. Those who ask "What shall I write?" are easily answered, many times; for college life is full of humor and romance, especially if it be a "Co-ed" institution, and many interesting stories could be written. Every magazine is asking for short stories, and something original in this line will not wait long for a publisher. The editor of the college paper is longing for these short stories.

They say that "Poets are born, not made." With the natural story teller the impulse to write is a primary one. Instinct will tell the birds when it is time for them to go north, and where it is safe to build their nests. It is as direct and natural for the born story teller to write. The impulse grows and stories shape themselves in his mind because he delights that they should. He tells them that others may enjoy the activity of his mind. We are not all story tellers, but we may advance greatly in the art by careful, patient toiling. To succeed means independence.

Be original. So many of the stories we read to-day are after the same stereotyped pattern. The writer seems to think they must transcend all bounds of reason and limits of everyday experience or their story will fall flat. The sooner such conventionalisms are discarded from your plots, and you introduce only those seemingly insignificant details which all will not notice unless their attention is directed particularly upon them, the sooner you will succeed. for then your story will be so filled with human nature that all will pronounce it delightful. It will be realistic without the labored style of realism; superficially, it may be idealistic, yet its every picture will be true to nature.

It is as necessary for the writer to consider the immediate purpose for which his article is written as it is for the orator to know his audience. When you write, write with the intention of making your article accomplish a certain end and keep that end ever in mind. The base-ball player keeps his eye on the ball he is to strike, not on the bat with which he desires to strike it.

As to style, Lewes says there is nothing that will aid a young writer more than revising his manuscript many times. In this way one must certainly gain power both in simplifying and condensing; but in this one should strive to present the thought in a form which claims the least possible attention to the form itself. Reject what is superfluous but do not reach the other extreme and be miserly. Ornament is often desirable; but many times the simplest and fewest words surpass in effect all the embellishments known to rhetoric. The power of an artist is shown, not in how much detail he reproduces on his canvass, but in his ability to discriminate and choose the characteristic details.

But we must not attempt to discuss such a momentous theme. Spencer and DeQuincey have covered the ground and nothing new can be expected. Indeed, if anything novel should be introduced, I fear fallacies would be suspected and probably not without foundation. I would suggest but one more point. The literary spirit of a college is judged by the sheet which is sent to the other institutions. The editors are not alone responsible for the standard of the paper, but every undergraduate is responsible, in a measure, for the journal which represents his school abroad. Co-operation will make the paper a success and that alone.

THE STUDY OF LITERATURE.

It seems that when one has discovered any fact, heretofore unknown about an object, that object never again produces the same impression upon him. In the study of botany, when we learn what fundamental distinction there is between a corn-stalk and an appletree, that distinction can not be effaced. We always see it, no matter how cursorily we may glance at those objects. That is but one example. Like ones might be found to an indefinite number. For it illustrates a universal fact.

This was never brought before me, at least, in a more prominent way than by the study of literature. Since my attention has been called more closely to some of the elements constituting literary excellence, and especially to the poetic elements of poetry, I have been unable to read a work with exactly the same feeling as before. Certain characteristics stand out more sharply. There are more individual beauties, while the whole effect is about the same. This all tends to produce a certain new delight, I may call it, in reading. I used to enjoy reading Milton. The poetry of Scott would often hold me for half the night. And Tennyson I liked to read. But now I think Comus will have a different charm for me. Marmion will be read, not carrying me blindly along; for all poetry there will be another kind of appreciation.

Perhaps the first time that I noticed this especially, was when I began to read Juvenal. Never before had I been able to see much poetry in Latin verse. It used to scan very nicely, and all that; but the poteic features passed unnoticed. Thus, in Vergil, whatever beauties there may have been there, failed to present themselves, and I thought, if I gave any thought to the matter, that the poetry lay in the measure. As I look back now, I recollect mistily how "Dido meditatur amorem," and many "Quid agant venti;" there was perhaps some fire and vigor too; all of which may have been poetic—but they all were overlooked. Thus it was, too, with Homer.

Coming to Horace, we have to deal with a different matter. Horace may have been poetic, and he may not. He may have been a Pope without so much moralizing. His writings were certainly too much "reduced to the nail" and superpolished. Yet I think that more poetry might have been found in Horace even, if we had known how to find it.

To return again to Juvenal. I referred to the fact that there was to be observed some poetry in his satires beyond the scansion. To be sure Juvenal was too much in earnest, too wrought up with indignation to produce poetry such as that of Wordsworth, for example. Yet the very force and vigor of his satires are more than prose. But every one can see that element. There are others, though, that would not have been seen, had they been read a year ago.

"Iampriden Syrus in Tiberim defluxit Orcretes" is certainly poetic, for that one brief line calls up a strain of imagination far exceeding its own bulk. But so hidden is it among lines less excellent, that it would scarcely catch an eye never before called to notice anything except the meter and the mere general effects.

Then the brilliant coloring and quick, lively changes are poetic, and not directly apparent on the face of the Latin. One can fairly feel the air of the "gelida Praeneste" after the hot, close life of the city. But, if under the same circumstances as in the study of Vergil, how many would know when they did feel it?

Juvenal seems to have rather less than usual of standard poetic expressions for certain things. Yet, when they do occur, they appear to have a rather unusual excellence. Thus the expression "Dum superest Lachesi quod torqueat" is common-place, and yet a little less so than usual. But whether common-place or not, such an expression would once have been taken as a matter of course, and have been passed as such.

If we can draw any conclusion from this, it would seem to indicate that much is lost by the average student through ignorance of what might be found in the classic poets. There is one obvious correction for this. Let there be a preliminary study of English literature before any attempt is made at reading Vergil or Homer. The student would get far more satisfaction from the study of Latin and Greek poets, by knowing how to find the beauty in that study.

DEPARTMENT OF PHILOSOPHY FOR 1895.

There will be some changes in this department the coming year. In the first term Sully's Psychology (large work) will be used as the basis of instruction. This work is written with more direct reference to education than the one hitherto used. The honor course in Hamilton and the lecture course on the history of education will be continued. With the Senior class, Institute, McCosh's Cognitive Powers will be used.

In the second term, Hyslop's Elements of Ethics, recently issued, will be used. The course in Philosophy will be continued two hours each week, and an honor course will be given in Ladd's Outlines of Physiological Psychology. An honor course, open to Juniors and Seniors, will be given in Rosenkranz' Philosophy of Education.

In the Spring term, there will be give the usual course in the Philosophy of Religion based on Diman's Theistic Argument, and honor courses in Lotze's Psychology (in German) and in Bowen's Modern Philosophy.

Friends of the school will place on the shelves by the opening of the year one hundred dollars worth of book, which will embrace all the works of value issued during the last two years.

Local.

The tennis courts are in almost constant use.

The snow has disappeared. "Let's play ball."

The snow has entirely disappeared from the campus.

Lesher has returned to College after an absence of two terms.

Harry Thornton was initiated into Sigma Chi at the close of last term.

Prof.—(in calling roll)—Those who are absent will please hold up their hands.

We are sure that the student body will join with us in welcoming Koons back.

On March 3, President Harris preached at the first Baptist church of Williamsport.

A good method to catch Scarlet Fever—"Suck your chum's lead pencil."—Dr. Groff.

A. G. Loomis has recovered from his severe illness and is again attending his classes.

Hill (at the recent eclipse).—"Isn't it the Sun that comes between the earth and the moon?"

Howard Guss spent vacation among friends at the University of Pennsylvania and at Princeton College.

Douglass,—Prof. "I worked three hours and a half on this." Prof. P. "That is good, excellent!"

An address will be delivered before the G. A. R., on April the 9th, (Anniversary of the Fall of Appomatox), by Dr. Harris. He will speak on "The Fall of Richmond."

Roth '98, left school on March 1, to accept a position as teacher in the Chambersburg Normal.

Owing to the increased attendance a new teacher will be added to the Academy Faculty next year.

"A man knows more Psychology before he takes it up, than when he leaves it." The Seniors answer—"Yes."

Haddock thinks that it would have been a good thing for Rev. J. K. L. M. Dobbs, D. D., to have taken his "work" and stuck to it.

Dr Groff, accompanied by his class in Enbryology, spent the afternoon and evening of March 18, with Prof. H. N. Conser, of Sunbury.

Baldwin the other day in picking out a subject for an Argumentative essay took—"Washington is dead." We may add that he proved his point very conclusively.

It seems that students are not exempt from the many ills which are attributed to the younger element of society. Hanna suffered with the mumps the latter part of the last term.

Brown's catechism: "What is the chief end of man?"

Man's chief end is to get "Ex." and to enjoy it forever.

W. T. Chase, D. D., delivered the university Sermon on March 17, at the Baptist church. A large audience was present, and from the remarks heard after church all were greatly pleased with the discourse.

The Library was furnished with the Welsbach Incandescent Gas Lamps during the vacation. The reading room is very attractive in the evening, now that the lighting capacity is so much more adequate.

On Thursday, April 4, a call was made by the trainer in field sports, for candidates in field and track athletics. It is hoped that the growing interest in athletics will be felt in this department as well as others.

On Thursday evening March 19, Mr. French gave a delightful entertainment in Impersonation and Imitating. Although the hall was not full, the entertainment was pronounced very good. The proceeds went to the Athletic Association.

The new catalogue was distributed at the end of last term. As usual it reflects great credit on the University in its appearance. By its roll we find that there is a large increase in attendance over last year. The total attendance is now nearly four hundred.

The University will have an exhibit at the Intertnational Convention of B. Y. P. U. to be held in Baltimore next Summer. This exhibit will be in charge of Registrar W. C. Gretzinger. An effort will be made to have it ready by Commencement, in which event it will be placed on exhibition in one of the Class rooms.

The Field and Track team of '94 met at the call of trainer Smith and elected J. C. Carey captain for the coming season. Mr. Smith appointed N. F. Davis to take charge of the hammer and shot men, W. H. Carey of the sprints, A. O. Miller of the runs, W. M. Bunnell of hurdling, and F. W. Jackson of walking.

It was announced that Dr. Wayland would begin his course of lectures on Sociology on March 5. All the students took their places in chapel at the appointed time but the Doctor did not appear. But we were not to be disappointed; for Dr. Perrine was announced to speak and, in a very forcible manner, he introduced us into the subject which was expected.

The Summers club is ahead in practical jokes. One of the members has been ill for several days, from the effects of a dose of poison, which he believes to have been administered by one of the club.

The club promptly took measure, to discover the guilty party, and when found he will be expelled from the club.

Robert J. Burdett was greeted by a large and enthusiastic audience in Bucknell Hall on Thursday evening March 14. It is needless to say that he amused and entertained his hearers even beyond their expectations. Good common sense was freely interspersed with wit. His power over his hearers was demonstrated in causing them at one moment to roar with laughter, and in the next, to look on the serious side of life. We all felt better after taking some of his "Good Medicine."

On Saturday evening March 9, the annual Stag Dance was held in the Tustin Gymnasium. The boys turned out in numbers and costumes far exceeding the greatest expectations. The ball was opened by a Grand March in which all participated. The Bucknell Band discoursed sweet strains of music while the dizzy "twirlers" swept around the waxed (?) floor. On the whole, everybody seemed well pleased and look forward to a greater success next year. In closing we should like to extend the many thanks of the boys to the Seminary friends for the loan of dresses, hair pins, wigs, paint, powder, etc.

Bucknell was represented during the vacation by a Y. M. C. A. Band. This is the second time such work has been done by our students, each time going out under the direction and responsibility of the Y. M. C. A. State Committee. The Band was composed of C. W. Harvey, leader, Bunnell, Sprague, Allen and Hanna, quartte. They spent the entire vacation at Catawissa, held evangelastic meetings every evening, and were the means of saving many souls, and of establishing a district section. They cannot say enough about the kindness of the Catawissa people, who opened hearts and homes, and made the days very happy ones.

The Freshman contest in Declamation, held on the evening of March 16, was a success in every particular. The speakers, without exception, showed that they had given careful attention to their selections and the delivery was very good.

Perhaps the most pleasing feature of the evening was, that the Sophomore class furnished the decorations for the stage. Palms and ferns were in profusion and made the stage look like a bower. The music was of the usual high order. Miss Gould, in her magnificent style, sang a charming song; and Miss Aikin's piano solo captivated the audience. In every respect the exhibition was highly commendatory to the class of '98.

The lectures on Sociology by Dr. Wayland were of a high order and very instructive. Although the students were obliged to listen to three lectures in one day, there seemed to be enough interest in them to keep all on the alert. Freshmen even were awake; and many of them took notes with the avowed purpose to pursue the honor course offered. In the evening a large crowd greeted the Doctor to listen to his popular lecture on "Dr. Dobbs in the Antipodes." This lecture was full of facts concerning social methods prevailing to-day and the style of the production kept the audience in good spirits all the time. The entire course of lectures was highly instructive and we all look eagerly forward to the time when we will have another opportunity to hear the genial Doctor.

The Opera, "Amorita," given by local talent assisted by several students from the College, was a decided success in every particular. Every seat in the house was occupied and many were obliged to stand. As a spectacular production, lack of proper equipment hampered the players greatly. But the beautiful costumes helped along the illusion of the throne room. It certainly was the richest and most complete production seen in Lewisburg for a long time.

The acting and singing of the principals showed very careful study as well as practice. The character of "Amorita" could hardly receive fuller justice in the hands of a professional than in Miss Derr's. The part is particularly difficult in that there is so much action; but she took the part grandly, rendering the expressions of pathos, humor and by-play in so clever a way as to win opinions of extraordinary power.

Mr. Bunnell as "Angelo" showed excellent training in all his singing and merited the applause he received. Mr. Megargee was master of the part he took as was Mr. Williams in the part of Captain of the Guards.

The chorus work was excellent,—showing the result of patient, earnest study on the part of each person and careful drilling on the part of Mr. Russell.

The annual gymnasium exhibition was held under the direction of Messrs. Harper and Bunnell, physical instructors, on March 16.

The drills during the entire term were very faithfully attended by the students, owing no doubt to the excellent instruction given and to the fact that the athletic committees exerted their influence to keep the boys in good physical condition.

The drill began promptly at half past two, when the class marched in lock-step from the basement to the main floor, keeping time to the piano. After a short march the class was aranged in position for the free-hand, breathing, and dumb-bell exercises which were conducted by Mr. Harper. After the running exercises the class fell into position for the indian club exhibition, which was the feature of the drill.

After the club swinging, a team selected from the members of the class, played a game of basket ball with the Danville Y. M. C. A. team. The game resulted in a victory for the Y. M. C. A. Score, 3 to 1.

If the game of basket ball had been introduced at the beginning of the term, Bucknell could have presented a very strong team.

The whole exhibition reflected great credit upon the directors and was in every way a success. It might be added that the authorities deserve credit for all the improvements made in the gymnasium, believing that they were an incentive to the excellent work. The attendance was 300.

A large and appreciative audience greeted Mr. George Nox McCain in Bucknell Hall, Tuesday afternoon, March 19. His address, "The Newspaper of the Twentieth Century," was listened to with marked attention and especially so by the members of the B. U. P. A. who secured copious notes to aid in their journalistic study. Mr. McCain was recently elected an honorary member of the local Association because of his great success as a practical newspaper man and because of the great interest he has always shown in the welfare of Bucknell. At present, Mr. McCain is doing the regular staff correspondence for the Philadelphia Press from the state capital; he is an ardent lover of his profession and is enthusiastic in asserting the increased influence and purity of the press which will come in the approaching century. Judging from the remarkable development of the newspaper in the last decade, twentieth century journalism will not fall very much short of Mr. McCain's predictions.

The Bucknell Press Association and the student body highly appreciated Mr. McCain's response to their request for an introductory lecture. The next open lecture will be by another well-known honorary member, Dr. Enoch Perrine, in the laboratory, Friday afternoon, April 12, at 4:30. Dr. Perrine has had varied editorial experiences and is well fitted to give an interesting and instructive lecture upon his chosen subject, "Reportorial Work." This will be a benefit to the members who are now doing practical work and to each student in the University who may be expected at some future time to be more or less directly connected with a journal.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

On Tuesday, March 5, the Senior and the 4th. year class met for their prize contests in Essay. The topic given the Seniors was "Portia;" that of the 4th. year class was "A comparison of the two Homesteads" in the Prelude to Whittier's poem "Among the Hills."

The members of the Senior class esteemed it a great privilege that Dr. H. L. Wayland was seated at their table during his stay at the Institute. As genial and witty as the "Autocrat," his sallies of quiet humor, his kindly inquiries, his power to make common-places sparkle, are more readily perceived than explained. When ice cream was served the Doctor's query was, "Is not this a reward for enduring four lectures in one day?"

But never was the complex problem of human obligation made so plain and forceful as in these same lectures.

The regular Program Meeting of the Y. W. C. A., for this term was held Sunday, March 10, in the Institute parlor. The topic was "A New England Girlhood," the program being as follows:

Chorus	"Jesus Wept."
Childhood of Lucy Larcom	Miss Stifler.
Mill Life of Lucy Larcom	Miss Kunkle
Violin Solo	Miss L. Lawshe.
Life in the West	Miss M. Eddelman.
History of "Hannan Binding Shoes"	Miss Case.
Poem "Hannah Binding Shoes"	Miss Martin.
Solo	Miss Kunkle.
"Natures Easter Music"	Miss Morgan.
Poem from Whittier—"Rhyming Note"	Miss Black.
Hymn.

The Annual Exhibition given by Miss Armitage's class in Physical Culture took place on the evening of March 9, in Bucknell Hall. The large audience of invited guests was greatly pleased by the program.

The Grand March and fancy steps by the girls in their pretty gymnasium suits was the first thing on the program. The Minuet and Delsarte movements which represented in pantomine the "Famine" scene from Hiawatha were the essence of grace and poetry of motion. The dumb-bell choruses and hoop drills showed careful practice, and the excellence of the club swinging deserves especial mention. The exhibition was very creditable to Miss Armitage.

ACADEMIC NEWS.

We are glad to see James and Evans back.

The prospects are bright for a good base-ball team in the Academy.

Did you see Freudenburger, Cooper, LeVan, and Bowman in the stag dance in the Gym?

Powell has been initiated in the Phi Gamma Delta fraternity and Thornton in the Sigma Chi.

Messrs. Hazen, Darre, Miles, Pearse, Cober, and Cottrell remained at the Academy during vacation.

The Fourth Form will read this term Milton's Comus, Lycidas, L'Allegro and Il Penseroso under Miss Armitage and Websters "Bunker Hill Oration" under Prof. Phillips.

The following officers of the Y. M. C. A. have been elected: President, Kulp; Vice President, Sherman; Recording Secretary, Powell; Corresponding Secretary, Cottrell; Treasurer, Devitt.

A promising youth of Main Hall has been struck by a shaft from Cupid's bow. He devotes too much of his time in writing epistles of love to one of the fair sex to be a success in the class-room.

The following officers of the Hermenia Literary Society have been elected for this term. President, Harvey; Vice President, Devitt; Secretary, Sherman; First Critic, Decker; Second Critic, Kulp; Treasurer, Wager; Censor, Pearse; Librarian, Wenck; Sergeant-at-Arms, Davis.

Eight new students entered the Academy this term. Robert N. Brady, Union City, Pa.; Edgar Reed, Muncy, Pa.; Daniel H. Krise, Liberty, Pa.; Mark L. Anthony, Mt. Top, Pa.; Harry V. Miller, Philadelphia, Pa.; Elbert Huft, Stonington, Pa.; Ernest Johnson and Francis M. Stapleton of Lewisburg, Pa.

Personals.

'55. Rev. Chas. H. Malcom, D. D., has resigned his work in New York City and entered upon new duties at St. Stephen's College, Annandale, N. Y.

Ex-'62. H. M. Baldrige, Esq., of Hollidaysburg, died of apoplexy on Monday, March 18, 1895. While in the University, Mr. Baldrige earned for himself a good name as an able and industrious student. His character won the friendship of the faculty and students. He was pure in heart, lofty in his ideals, noble in his aspirations and scrupulous and painstaking in his persistent endeavors to bring his conduct to the highest level of his conceptions. As a lawyer, he was above all pettifoggery and chicanery and was trusted by all who came in contact with him. His moral character made him what he was.

'76. In addition to his work as pastor of the Hollidaysburg, Pa., church, Rev. Owen James has charge, for the current collegiate year, of the departments of psychology, ethics and civics in the Hollidaysburg Seminary.

Ex-'85. Harvey S. Torringer is studying medicine in Baltimore, Md.

'85. Rev. J. Madison Hare, after a spirited contest, was elected for the Excise Commission of Burlington, N. J.

'88. George W. Hatch has resigned his pastorate at Eatonville and is pursuing a course in Theology at Crozer Seminary.

'91. Jacob H. Minick is at college pursuing a post-graduate course.

'91. Chas. Campbell, M. D., is located at 10th. and Wharton Sts., Philadelphia.

'93. On February 14, before the United States consul at Yokohoma, Japan, by the Rev. Brand, Rev. E. C. Pauling was united in marriage to Miss Mabel V. Hall, of Northumberland, Pa. They proceeded immediately to Seoul, Korea, where Rev. Pauling has been for a year establishing a Baptist mission.

'94. Eliza Bell has accepted the position at the Seminary made vacant by the risignation of Miss Rush.

Editorial.

IT has long been the desire of MIRROR boards to awaken in the students the spirit of fiction writing in the form of short stories. This style of literature has reached a high state of development in many college journals,—even to the perfection of the average monthly magazine. In these papers the dull, uninteresting essay is doomed; and why may not the MIRROR be in this class? Essays are written for the Professor of English and should be of such a nature that they are entirely unsuited for the college paper; for very few will be interested in such deep discussions as should be found in an essay. The ability for writing this style of fiction is in Bucknell, but there seems to be lacking a desire to advance in this line of literary work.

There is another line which is worthy of the attention of those who have taste in literature. In the last few numbers of the MIRROR there have appeared translations from the German which have elicited praise from all sides. This field of work offers much in the way of training as well as pleasure to one inclined toward literature, and would prove very acceptable to the general reader. Gems of thought in poetry from the German or French, carefully translated into good English, would find favor in the eyes of the general student body as well as with the editors.

DURING the winter months it was necessary that a certain class of students wear off the excess of animal enthusiasm by throwing snow-balls, and as a result not a few windows in the building are now decorated with various articles of wearing apparel, which give the place more the appearance of a manufacturing plant than a college. The authorities, that the rags might be replaced by the proper medium, have taxed the occupants of the rooms where such breakage exists.

It appears rather unjust that one should be held responsible for something with which he had no connection. Probably three-fifths of the panes were broken out after most of the students were in bed; and if it be necessary for one to be on the alert night and day in order to protect himself from a damage suit, it would be profitable for the students to hire an officer to investigate the matter in the hopes of locating the guilty parties. If these panes had been broken through carelessness or neglect of duty on the part of those occupying the rooms, it would be a very different matter; but the windows are not provided with outside blinds and the glass cannot be protected in this way.

If the student must be held responsible for the damage to the windows of his room, he is equally responsible for any damage whatsoever to the external portion of the building; for the window is nothing more than a wall modified to serve a special purpose. Under these conditions we must expect that our bills would be augmented to the extent of the damage to the building, should some prowling anarchist demolish a section with his deadly bombs.

SENTIMENTALISM in Politics, which we may understand as a readiness to take up anything for the excitement there is in it, has recently received an astounding impetus and many scores of faithful worshippers. One of our leading magazines has made considerable sport of this tendency and has stigmatized it Jingoism and its followers Jingoes. Without doubt Jingoism may be laid with reproach at the doors of a good many politicians, and yet we had better be reasonably sure, as we lay it there, that our own door-step is not contaminated. The fact is, students are the greatest set of Jingoes that have ever lived, not excepting politicians. They have always been the victims of one another's jokes and in many cases the community has come in for a fair share of the fun from the students' standpoint. This may be partly due to their environment, to their "humdrum life," as it is called, which craves for some excitement, or to a complication of circumstances possibly an inheritance from Tom Brown. Whatever may be the case, it is remarkable how this spirit, which once flourished so widely, has largely given place to a worse one,—one which accepts with pleasure almost any calamity for the exciting effect it produces. It is to this we would apply the term Jingoism rather than to the other. There are hosts of students who would hail with a sort of delight a hundred mishaps that might befall their place of education, not because they bear a grudge toward anybody or against anything, but simply as the result of an exorbitant desire for excitement. This term includes those who are slightly moved by this spirit as well as the extreme types. It seems to be a failing all are guilty of at some time,—an instance when sentiment rules and reason is the dog. It is a trait of barbarism, for all that it may seem natural, and should be least found among that class of destined leaders who pretend and are supposed to think twice before acting.

TWO DAYS.

The day is fair and bright,—the birds
Since dawning have not ceased to sing:
Gold dandelions, lavish coin of Spring,
Shine through the tender grass, and words
Would fail to tell the subtle tropic thrill
That courses through the veins,—and still
All, all to me is dark and full of gloom,
Lost, radiance of the early springtime bloom:
I look around round,—only clouds I see,—
For Madge has frowned on me!

The winds moan mournfully and drear,
Bare is each swaying shrub and tree,
The sky above is gray and dull to see.
As slow departs the dying Year,
All Nature seems in mourning garments clad,
All outward sights and sounds are darkly sad;
Yet in my heart the sunshine reigns supreme!
The gloomy clouds can never quench the beam
Of joy that lights up land and sea,—
For Madge has smiled on me!

LITERARY PROGRESS.

The literature of the past receives considerable notice and commendation from students of the present time, and deservedly so; for it is rich in thought, original in ideas, daring in conception, and, finally, because it was the origin and inspiration of the literature which followed. However there is a tendency among many to greatly overestimate its value in comparison with the productions of our time. In the eyes of some scholars all the compositions of the present sink into obscurity before the effulgence of a Cicero or a Homer.

This is doing injustice to our own age; for, although there are vast quantities of printed matter circulated in the name of literature, worthless and even injurious to the reader, yet no age has given birth to so many books that are helpful, inspiring, entertaining, instructive.

The Iliad and Odyssey stand forth as shining representatives of the Ancient Era. No doubt there were other productions possibly as meritorious, but they have not survived for our edification. The Homeric poems are mainly interesting as the beginning of literature. The language is, of course, in but a partially developed state, and does not show the finish of later Greek.

As Greece advanced in civilization there followed the Iliad and Odyssey much valuable literature, showing to what heights the human intellect can soar, unassisted by divine revelation. The Greeks evolved a code of morals, and discussed immortality of the soul and the existence of a supreme diety with almost incredible dexterity. The productions of that age will always be regarded as priceless contributions to the storehouse of human knowledge.

Of the classic period, or Augustan age, we have many specimens. There were numerous prolific writers in that period and some have left books which will stand as monuments to their renown as long as civilization lasts. Space is wanting to discuss or even mention these authors or their works, but Vergil and Cicero may well represent this age in this discussion.

During the middle ages, learning in every branch lay dormant. It was as late as the 14th or 15th century when the revival of learning took place and this was largely due to the invention of the printing press. The recent or Elizabethian period has the illustrous names of Milton and Shakespeare as examples. Now, literature, growing in importance and extending into a diversity of channels, acquires a new importance and impetus, which continues to the modern period. Never have scholars been regarded with more respect, schools and colleges received more pupils, literature, science and other pursuits of knowledge had more devotees than in our own age. We have had and still have authors of genius, unsurpassed by those of any era. To those who boast of the epics of Homer, Vergil and Milton, we may cite the 'Tales of a Wayside Inn' or 'Hiawatha', by Longfellow, Tennyson's 'Princess', and indeed many other epics deserving to be ranked with classic productions.

Our age has developed many new species of literature entirely unknown to previous periods. The ancients had no Mark Twain or Max Adeler or even comic magazines to laugh over. They could follow no Verne, in imagination, through submarine routes to the depths of the sea, the treasure-houses of the deep, and even the inaccessible pole. With no Poe could they unravel, by most ingenious methods, the most mystifying crimes. They could boast of no Cooper, Hawthorne, Howells or Roe. Surely none of their poetry can be more beautiful and touching than that of numerous poets of our age; and learned and deep as are their treatises on science, philosophy, ethics, morality and theology, those of our age, with the most profound scholarship, the benefit of the experience of ages, and the closest study, have acquired a gravity and importance to which their essays must yield the palm.

As the world grew, language necessarily increasing in power and possibility, grew richer in forms, meanings and their adaptations, and acquired a greater variety of expression. So, in this respect the more cultured Attic Greek surpasses the simple stanzas of Homer; and again Roman authors of Vergil's time had still greater scope to display their talent. After the revival of learning, men, with greater experience, could better express their thoughts in books. The subject matter discussed or turned into metre became more varied as knowledge increased, until now we have an almost bewildering variety of style and thought. But it has remained for our age to crown literature with refinement, to require the suppression, in standard books, of all that is immodest or suggestive of immorality; and even the classics are expurgated for general use.

The ancient writers had a slight advantage over the modern in that their productions were of necessity original, while for their successors, every new production narrowed the scope for original thought, until, in the present day, it is a rare and difficult thing to acquire. Yet this drawback is slight, when we consider the enormous advantages we possess over the people of classic times. The printing press facilitates the distribution of books with almost incredible cheapness. Then, books were priceless; now, they are in every home. Increased importance is placed on the ability to read as a recreation, amusement and means of instruction.

The value of the literary productions of ancient times to the people of those times was especially that of pleasure and diversion at feasts, and of inciting the youth to deeds of valor. To successive generations, they served as models and stimulants to increased effort. So in the successive periods, the literature of each has a good effect on its own age, consequently on immediate posterity and the succeeding period. But as no one would be rash enough to claim that the literature of our age; will eclipse that of all coming generations, so no one should maintain that our literary efforts are obscured by those of former eras.

WEBSTER'S FIRST BUNKER HILL ADDRESS, A CRITICISM.

In reading Webster's oration I found myself prejudiced in its favor. Previous conversation, instruction, and reading had led me to believe it one of the greatest ever delivered. I still believe it was, when spoken, a most remarkable oration, tho largely dependent upon the personality of Webster. The time, the occasion, the presence of veterans of the Revolution and especially of Lafayette,—all these conspired to make the oration famous. Yet it will not become a classic. Its popularity—waning now—may be ascribed to the books of declamation, the presence of those who have heard Webster, and the necessity for exhibiting to students some specimen of his oratory.

I purpose to treat briefly a few of its merits and demerits, and to give a reason why the oration cannot become a classic.

When he delivered the address, Webster was in his prime, and had long been prominent in public affairs. His style may therefore be considered fixed. We cannot excuse his faults because he was young or old; we must take him as he is. Look first at the perspicuity of the address.

Webster was an adept in skilful ornamentation. He generally reserved his most beautiful ornaments for introductions and climaxes. Take, for instance, that closing sentence in his vision of the departed heroes of the Revolution: "On the light of Liberty you saw arise the light of Peace, like

'another morn
Risen on mid-noon ;'

and the sky on which you closed your eyes was cloudless."

The renowned orator was also very careful in his repetitions. Did it seem desirable to enunciate a thought before expressed, he had no difficulty in rendering it in even stronger language. This remarkable power enabled him to make cumulative climaxes with great effect.

Webster displayed skill in the use of his large vocabulary. He employed Latin words especially when he became argumentative. To him the greater defining power of the Latin appealed very strongly. Thus, in his argument regarding the advance of the world during the fifty years following the Battle of Bunker Hill, he said: "Any adequate survey, however, of the progress made during the last half century in the polite and mechanic arts, in machinery and manufactures, in commerce and agriculture, in letters and in science would require volumes." But in his passages of strong emotion there is a marked diminution in the number of Latin words, and a corresponding increase in the number of Saxon words. A brief survey of the printed page in that portion of the oration where he apostrophizes the veterans reveals a predominance of short, Saxon words. Using Webster as a model it might be possible to formulate a rule, that in passages requiring strength and passion the mother-tongue holds sway.

In one way, however, the address lacks perspicuity; namely, in its prolixity. Webster lacked conciseness. While describing the monument and its effects upon himself, those present, and future generations, he was quite verbose, in spite of the exalted sentiment and fine touches with which he garnished his statements. The strain upon those who heard him must have been great, tho it may have been lessened by the personality of the man.

Turn now to the energy or vivacity of the address, first considering Webster's choice of words. He chose words proper and appropriate.

Catching sight of the ships moored at the base of Bunker Hill, he says: "Yonder proud ships, by a felicity of position appropriately lying at the foot of this mount, and seeming fondly to cling around it, are not means of annoyance to you, but your country's own means of distinction and defence." What words could more properly describe such a scene? Note the singular fitness of the word "felicity." His language is filled with many such happy turns, whether he be in argument or in the heat of passion.

In his figures of speech the orator is to be highly commended. They are the product of a great imagination trying to express in concrete form some abstract ideas. Webster likens the course of political revolution in America and in Europe to the advance of a wheel. So brilliant is the figure and so climactic is its effect, I cannot refrain from quoting it at length:

"The great wheel of political revolution began to move in America. Here its rotation was guarded, regular, and safe. Transferred to the other continent, from unfortunate but natural causes, it received an irregular and violent impulse; it whirled along with a fearful celerity; till at length, like the chariot-wheels in the races of antiquity, it took fire from the rapidity of its own motion, and blazed onward, spreading conflagration and terror around." It will be noticed immediately that the words used are very picturesque. The quiet course of revolution in America, and the violence of its track in Europe, can be vividly seen. The picture is certainly a startling one.

Webster was a full man. He had had no physical or mental obstacles in the way of his advancement. His education, tho acquired with hardship, was the best that his day afforded, and his body and voice were all that could be desired. On account of his physical and mental superiority, Webster did not need to watch closely everything that he said or did. As a consequence he is by no means brief. It is this lack of compression that fatigues the ordinary man while he is listening. It was, perhaps, not so evident when, Webster was speaking, but it is clearly a fault when seen in print. We may say here by way of comparison that the compression of Demosthenes has been one of the reasons of his enduring fame. Tho we look upon him as a model in this line, we should remember that what he did was the result of an immense amount of labor.

In the arrangement of words there is but little that is worthy of derogatory criticism. There is a remarkable felicity in the use of loose and periodic sentences. They are so well balanced that a heightening effect is produced. There is an absence of interrogation in the address. It was evident to Webster that no appeal to the reason of his hearers for the sake of convincing them, was necessary. The exclamatory passages are climactic, and seem to spring straight from the heated imagination of the orator.

The elegance or beauty of the oration may now claim our attention. There is a peculiar smoothness about the whole production which becomes evident when read aloud. With a tenor or soprano voice the full effect cannot be produced, for the predominance of vowels is not of such importance to those speaking in the higher registers. But to the bass voice the liquid flow of the vowel sounds is a delight. The resonance, the sonorousness, of the vowels is enforced. Read, for example, the following: "A spirit pervaded all ranks, not transient, not boisterous, but deep, solemn, determined,

'totamque infusa per artus
Mens agitat molem, et magno se corpore miscet.' "

It might be possible to ascribe the use of the quotation not alone to the spur of the moment, but to a love of the melody found in Vergil.

The oration may be classed as of the impassioned type.

The occasion and the circumstances demanded strong and exalted emotion. The tendency of the orator under such influences was to heighten his language, and employ the most expressive words. In so doing the imagination of the orator was taxed. It was then that he approached the sphere of the poet. The poetic diction, the rhythm, the picturesqueness, together with its strength and energy, place the oration under the impassioned type.

I have purposely omitted to speak of the wonderful apostrophes delivered under the inspiration of the moment (?) before the assembled veterans and Lafayette. Upon these, it seems to me, depend in great part the effect which the address had upon the multitude, and which it has had upon the subsequent generation. But it may well be questioned whether the address would have been as famous were those splendid outbursts omitted.

We are now led to explain why the oration may not become a classic. A noticeable and blameable defect in the oration is its lack of analysis. There is difficulty in finding even the theme. It may have been delivered to dedicate the monument, or to "commemorate the establishment of great principles of liberty," or to show the progress of America. The discussion itself, as a result of the obscurity of the theme, is poorly defined. No real analysis can be made of its contents. In addition, it is broken twice by long apostrophes. It seems to me that in the orations chosen for class-room work, in those pointed out as likely to survive the “devouring tooth of time,” in those which have come down to us from antiquity, a definite arrangement can be found. For this reason, if for no other, I am of the opinion that the oration can never become a classic.

But whatever may be its faults or excellencies the oration was certainly a great one when delivered. Upon us it has an ennobling effect, living as we do in the infancy of our country. We know, and yet feel, the impulses which swayed our forefathers, and accordingly we sympathize with the exalted sentiments of the oration.

Local.

One of the “brownies” has shed his coat.

“Flunks” in the Astronomy Class are frequent.

Taggart is laughing in English Oratory for an “ex.”

Geary is glad that he had on old trousers when he pitched on Monday.

Messers. Sheddan, Wagenseller, Taggart and Bunnell spent Easter at home.

Johnson, '96, spent Easter at his home. The egg market is “cornered” at New Berlin.

Brick has been practicing throwing the hammer. He says “You want to look out for me next field day.”

The sporting element of '98 is again apparent in the fact that they have challenged the “Sophs” to a game of basket-ball.

Pease received an easter egg with the following inscription: “Soft, on Shell(ey)ng.” You must ask him for the explanation.

Herbert Stanton of '97 is back spending a few days with his friends. It is his intention to enter the Medical department of the U. of P. next fall.

Prof. (in Astronomy class).—Please name the fourth Zodiacal sign.

Student.—Can't Sir.

Prof.—Correct, cancer.

They say the Seniors are writing commencement Orations; the Juniors are star-gazing; The “Sophs,” as usual, are doing nothing, and the “Freshies” are fluttering around helping the “Sophs.”

Prof. (in English Oratory, calling roll);—“Well! Well! They'r all here but two, and they belong to the class I had so much trouble with last term. I mean that Sophomore class. See, do ye Douglass?”

“Walky” came into the “sanctum” and requested us to put in a good joke about him. Thinking of nothing else but that he intends having his head sheared in the near future, we agree to let it go at that.

One of our friends was seen sporting the following combination on Easter Sunday: Seymour coat, polkadot shirt, barber-pole collar and cuffs, full dress vest, crushed elephant gloves, and last but not least, Trilby shoes.

Dr. Harris delivered the usual opening address in Bucknell Hall on Monday morning, April 8. His subject was School Organism. During his talk he gave a high ideal of what a school ought to be, and the part the students have in making it such.

A student read the “Appeal for Journalism” and then looked over his last corrected essay. It had a miserable attack of the “blues,” and on the bottom was written;—“This is rank! kindly consider yourself an airy nothing.” The student decided that he would not try his hand at journalism just yet.

Pease '95, has received a call from the Baptist church at Eatonville, Pa. During the spring vacation he preached at that place and the following is the partial account as it appeared in a local paper: “In the course of his remarks he touched doctrinal facts with illustrations that were wholly explanatory of themselves, using only the English language, avoiding the high flown theologian's dictionary that usually accompanies the university and theological student on his initial preaching work.”

Dillon had a "cold-water" feed in his suite on Saturday evening and we were not invited.

It sounded like the rushing of mighty winds; but it could not be mere wind from that "dormy." The mutterings were resolved into words. "I'll roast him. Yes! By my beard and my matrimonial prospects, I'll roast him! By dad! I'll roast him, or the book will be a failure."

Post 52, G. A. R. held their annual campfire on the evening of April 9, the thirtieth Anniversary of the battle of Appomatox Court House. After a selection by the quartette, of which Messers. Sigmund and Megargee were members, there were several recitations, and songs by the Post quartette. Then Dr. Harris of the 206th Penna. Volunteers, delivered his address on "The Fall of Richmond." The house was crowded and strict attention was paid throughout the address. The exercises were very appropriately closed by all rising and singing—"America."

It might appear that Athletics were on the decline since we have no column in this issue; but this is a mistake. Basket-ball has received a new impetus since the goals have been erected on the campus and the field marked out. Tennis is also attracting many. All the courts are being repaired and put in shape for the warmer weather which we are expecting every day. The Senior court is being fitted with a new net and backstop. Prof. Bartol's has been rolled and presents a fine appearance with the new tape markers. The Phi Gamma Delta court is undergoing many repairs and will soon be in good shape. Candidates for the Athletic Team are taking systematic training under the directions of Trainer Smith, Captain Carey and the instructors in the several departments of the work. Already the records have been broken in throwing the hammer and the mile run.

Doctor Enoch Perrine delivered an address on "The Reporter" before the B. U. P. A. and a large number of its friends in the Laboratory, Friday afternoon, the 12th; but not having finished at supper time, those present requested that the address be completed on the following Monday evening in his recitation-room. The genial doctor consented to this arrangement, and an increased number were afforded an opportunity to hear the entire address which, judging by the marked attention and hearty applause, was highly appreciated by the audience.

After an introductory review of his journalistic career in college and city, the speaker defined the reporter's relation to the other departments of the newspaper establishment, and treated him as a mirror, reflector, or medium for bringing the facts before the public. In properly filling his office, the reporter is to receive and transmit or reflect impressions. In accomplishing the former, first, he must observe the facts through complying with the conditions of securing them by getting in contact with the people as a result of gaining influence from politeness, grace of speech and bearing, favors shown hitherto, and honest, true work in the past; and by being prepared, through having a general education and special training, to appreciate and select the facts. Secondly, he must seize the facts rapidly and accurately. In doing the latter, space and speed demand that he unify, simplify, and express his ideas in clear, terse, vivid language and in proper style by presenting plain, clear, orderly "copy" and by avoiding slang, cheap and nasty devices, suppression of truth favorable to opponents, and a show of ignorance, malice, or deception of any kind.

For various reasons, thirty-two non-resident members of the college, and "preps" too numerous to mention, spent the recent vacation in the invigorating atmosphere of Lewisburg and vicinity. Work, love, exercise, and study commanded the attention of the majority. To avoid the abnormal temperature of the college, members of the "frats" made use of their respective halls during the day time. Jackson and Riemer were kept busy travelling from the cellege to the corner of Market and Third and return; Davis, N. F., was frequently disturbed by callers when in the midst of a French novel or love tale; Cregar would have gone home had it not been for the magnetic power of a Lewisburg—who? Well, ask the dear boy if you are still ignorant. Stephens was attending to his rapidly increasing book business; Josephs was enjoying the oft-repeated luxury of a quiet smoke without disturbing the peace of his neighbors by its fragrance; Macnab, as usual, was doing nothing; Davis, J. W., was writing sermons, love letters, and miscellaneous productions; Megargee was studying the sociological conditions necessary for the improvement of the local streets in order to successfully complete his honor work in Social Science; Brown, that ardent lover of scientific studies, was instructing Miller and Jennings in a new phase of Ornithology; Walkinshaw was seen on the streets of our neighboring town by a reporter of the Sunbury Daily Item, and when asked his business, Walky having indistinctly comprehended the interrogation, replied that it was an extreme falsehood that he was visiting a female friend, but the truth was that he was introducing his well known story into that community. Of the Sophomores, Rodgers was the only one who accomplished what he undertook,—nothing; Burge and Palmer were transplanting blades of grass and other small fruit in Doctor Groff's garden (they are "in it" for Ex. in Botany this term); Summerbell was "working up" the studies that he missed by being absent from college during the first term; Nelson was taking pedestrian tours to Milton and other small towns in this county; Dillon was kept busy locking the gymnasium after it had been opened six or eight times a day by students having directors' and skeleton keys; Fiske is said to have almost ruined a good bicycle by riding along the railroad from here to Milton where he was aiding a prominent evangelist; Sinton was sleeping, exercising, and attempting to preach; and Grim when not with the ladies, was practicing base-ball in hopes of being able to get a position on his boarding-club nine. The Freshmen are last and least worthy of mention with one exception; Diggs is said to have completed the honor course in Sociology; Lindemann was practicing his famous dumb-bell drill and reading light literature: Stober stayed closely in his room because he feared the bad effects of an exposure to the elements (He did not study at all); Joe Schultz was working about the campus; Hazen was feeling homesick so he did not try to accomplish anything; Sinnette and Harlan were conducting a private boarding club in the East Wing, and having discovered an early-growing species in a swamp near the river, they had cabbage for dinner every day; Fithian, Laudenslager, and Thomas are said to have almost ruined the Y. M. C. A. organ and furniture, but along with several other students of the East Wing, they desire to extend thanks to the Association for their unauthorized occupation of the rooms.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

The two tennis courts on the Institute campus have been carefully rolled and neatly marked out for our use.

After a rain or two the track for the Cyclers will be in excellent condition, having been recently repaired.

Several new students entered the Institute at the beginning of the term. We were glad to welcome back Miss Edna Shires and Miss Elizabeth Waiker.

The following is a copy of an announcement which will be of interest to many friends of Bucknell:—

Mr. John J. Rush
announces the marriage of his daughter Frances Mary
to
Dr. Ira Clayton Leedom
Thursday, April fourth,
eighteen hundred and ninety-five,
Montana, New Jersey.

Judging from the ethical method of reasoning employed by our Seniors in discussing every subject, one would think they were devoting their whole time to Moral Philosophy. But this is not the case; for occasionally we see them treading the halls majestically with some American Classic under their arm, or else chattering German as fluently as some new arrival from Berlin. The cause for the supremacy of Ethics can partly be accounted for by the value of the study itself, partly because of the interesting manner with which Mrs. Larison presents the subject.

It is not difficult for Seniors to understand the cause of clusters of Fourth year girls gathering in every place; one skipping this way, another scurrying that way, each with a bulky manuscript. Last year we were in just such excitement for "Soiree" was at hand and we were all eager for its success. We are glad somebody else is to have the honor this year, but we doubt if they will surpass '95.

The Lewisburg Alumnae Club gave a Dickens meeting, April 9. The program was as follows:—

A garden scene:
From Nicholas Nickleby.

Music.

David makes himself known to his Aunt:
From David Copperfield.

Music.

The story of the Princess:
From Little Dorrit.

Music.

"Miggs" waiting for the apprentice:
From Barnaby Rudge.

Music.

Mrs. Jellaby at her work:
From Bleak House.

Music.

Quilp's tea party:
From Old Curiosity Shop.

Music.

Committee { Miss Elizabeth Bates,
Miss Mary Bartol,
Miss Mabel Thomas.

Messrs. Martin and Moyer, who furnished the music for the evening, gave some choice duets. Evidently these gentlemen are masters in the use of the Mandolin and Guitar.

ACADEMIC NEWS.

Jenkinson is winning renown for himself in base-ball.

Have you seen Craig, Cober, and Perrin out throwing the hammer and putting the shot?

At the last meeting of the Athletic Association it was decided to have a field day for the Academy students.

We are glad to see Herbert Stewart about again. He was confined to his bed about two weeks on account of sickness.

Anstock, the manager of the Academy base-ball team, has scheduled a game with the "Harrigates" of Lewisburg. The game will be played on the college campus Friday, April 26. A game will also be played with the Freshmen.

The following officers of the Adelphia Literary Society have been elected for this term: President, Nesbit; Vice President, Levis; Secretary, Pearson; First Critic, Craig; Second Critic, Hall; Censor, Earle; Treasurer, Foster; Chaplain. Hazen; Curator, Shuhart; Sergeant-at Arms McQuistion.

Professor:—"We must have a better recitation the next time."

Student:—"Why, Professor, I can't remember it from one day to the next. It all evaporates."

Professor:—"Not all material evaporates; but it depends entirely into what kind of medium you put it."

Personals.

BUCKNELL STUDENTS AT CHICAGO.

The following old students of Bucknell, all graduates but one, are now at the University of Chicago and without exception are doing hard earnest work, some of them achieving the highest distinction:

'91. Paul Tustin is preparing for foreign mission work, and is making his final preparation for that purpose. In his usual quiet way, he is working industriously in the divinity school.

'91. Ralph C. H. Catterall, is one of a few marked men in the University. His abilities, attainments, and teaching power have won him the unstinted praise of the entire History faculty, and have popularized him to such an extent among the students, that his classes have reached as high as sixty persons, and his name is heard with favor on all sides. He has been advanced to position of tutor for 1895.

'92. Chas. W. Allen has made himself strongly popular in athletic circles. His force of character, independence and originality have made him a power with the players, and he has been elected to captain the team for another year.

'92. Eva J. Stanton, is working in the field of English Literature. As was expected of her, she has established a reputation for scholarship of a high order. It was the writer's pleasure recently to take dinner with Miss Stanton in Beecher hall at the University, and he noticed what deference was shown for her character and opinions by all the members of the graduate table. She expects to leave the University in May for a prolonged and much needed vacation.

'92. A. R. E. Wyant has given up foot-ball. His ambition now is to secure a Ph. D. His plans are now made to spend two years in the University after he finishes his B. D. course. He is preaching in good pulpits, and has written acceptable matter for the Standard, the big Baptist paper in Chicago.

Ex-'93. Mr. Dickerson speaks warmly of Bucknell. A year ago he finished his A. B. course in the college, and has since been enrolled among the divinity students, giving his time to special study in Sociology under Dr. Henderson. Mr. Dickerson is planning to take the course required at Bucknell for the degree A. M., so as to be identified with Bucknell's Alumni.

'93. Ephraim M. Heim. No one could ask for more rapid advancement than Mr. Heim has made. Although not there a whole year he has more than justified the expectations of his Alma Mater. He has done original and fine work already under Prof. Judson, and has won favorable mention as a careful, judicial and deep student of history with a brilliant future before him.

'94. Ralph Snow has acquitted himself with credit in his divinity studies, has been admitted to the glee club, and speaks warmly of the stimulus felt in all departments of work.

'94. R. B. Davidson, is a member of the University glee club. His vocal ability is spoken of highly, and he has already won many friends. He and Mr. Snow room together. Owing to sickness at home, Mr. Davidson was obliged to come East before the close of the last quarter.

'87. Dr. J. W. A. Young's elaborate training in Mathematics has given him an enviable reputation in his department. Last year he was promoted to the rank of instructor which is the only advancement that has been given any one there in this field. The graduate students who take his work speak of his mind with so much respect that one would think him in as high esteem as the Senior professors.

Ex-'64. Rev. M. M. Fogg is now located at Kingwood, N. Y.

Ex-'64. Rev. John C. Entrekin is now pastor at Vineland, N. J. He was formerly located at Tuckahoe, N. J.

'71. Rev. John Humpstone, D.D., of Brooklyn, read a paper on March 11, before the Philadelphia Conference of Baptist Ministers on "The Church and the Kingdom," and was honored by a very large attendance.

'75. H. H. James of allentown led chapel April 10.

Ex-'78. Rev. Charles M. Jones, formerly located at South New Berlin, N. Y., has removed to Oneonta, N. Y.

'81. Prof. Wm. Frear, Ph.D., of State College, was a visitor at the College, March 12.

'87. Rev. Miles O. Noll has resigned his pastorate at Bellefonte, Pa.

'88. Professor Lincoln Hulley recently made a visit to the University of Chicago. During the spring vacation Mrs. Hulley received a telegram from President Harper saying: "Allow me to congratulate you upon the fact that Mr. Hulley has passed his examinations for the Doctorate. His work in Hebrew was excellent. W. R. Harper." The examination was in the Semitic languages embracing the grammar, syntax, philology and literature of Hebrew, Arabic, Aramaic, Syriac, Assyrian, and Ethiopic; comparative Semitic grammar; sight reading; Hebrew History; and Hexateuchal analysis. The examiners were President Harper, Rabbi Hirsch, Professors R. F. Harper, Price, Goodspeed and Crandall. Professor Hulley's thesis, making a volume of 400 pages, was reported by the committee of the Semitic Faculty as a very brilliant piece of work.

'91. Chas. Campbell, M.D., is located at 10th and Wharton Sts., Philadelphia.

'92. Geo. W. Wagenseller, editor and proprietor of the Middleburg Post, spent a few hours with Prof. Fisher, on March 7.

Ex-'93. S. H. Zimmerman was admitted to the Bar upon motion of J. C. Nissley, Esq., in whose office the young man read law. Mr. Zimmerman passed a good examination and was warmly congratulated by his fellow-attorneys.

Ex-'95. Rev. Paul E. Weithasse has resigned his pastorate at Newport, N. J.

Ex-'95. Richard D. Minch, pastor of the Baptist Church at Hawley, Pa., was united in marriage to Miss Eliza Pedrick of Bridgton, N. J., on March 20.

Rev. A. E. Waffle, D. D., a former pastor of the Lewisburg Baptist Church, has resigned the pastorate of the Jamestown, N. Y., church. In his pastorate of six and a half years, the church has increased in membership from 399 to 500, and a new church edifice has been erected. Lewisburg students of fifteen years ago remember his strong and able sermons with pleasure.

Editorial.

WE call attention to the MIRROR Box which has recently been placed in Main Hall. Its purpose is not a mystery to any. It is to be freely used as a receptacle for all kinds of contributions to the MIRROR which, when duly approved by the editor, will find their way from time to time into the columns of the paper. A word of warning. Don't use it as an engine of war. Don't throw stones. It will be energy expended in a wrong direction and so to no purpose.

As we enter upon the season of University entertainments, the question of their attendance and the keeping of order naturally suggests itself. During the past year or two they have not been without exception, but, for the most part, they have been all that could be expected. What can be said at the close of this season, remains to be seen. It ought to be generally understood that these concerts and contests are not hap-hazard affairs, gotten up on the spur of the moment, but that all have dates fixed relatively and are the results of much previous preparation. With this in mind, we can better appreciate the efforts continually made to work up something interesting. The interest may not be very intense at times because of some lack of adaptation or a miscalculation in length. For instance, a twenty-minute declamation is very trying to an audience unless it possesses some special feature, a point too often disregarded by the declaimer. But we can at least hold our peace on the ground that every honest effort merits a hearing if not a warm reception.

* * *

"Now there's the BUCKNELL MIRROR a-setting on the pile,
That's pretty good at promptness, but won't provoke
 a smile;
And as for works like 'Milton', although they're pretty high,
It's best to talk on topics that isn't quite so dry"

This clipping from The Phœnix speaks for itself and for us. The one virtue of promptness which is ours in the eyes of our friends, has its place in a college publication as in other branches of journalism, but is not the only prerequisite condition of success. We have long felt the need of Shakespeare and Milton in the way we have felt the need of "Old Hundred." Through long experience we have come to hold them as invaluable and indispensable and feel that they ought to be treated with all due respect even to the extent of making them the subject not of ordinary but of extraordinary thought. The productions on the lives and works of such men reflect credit on the authors but we question the appropriateness of filling the columns of a college paper with them at all times. It is a mistaken idea that a literary subject, as it is pleasingly termed, guarantees a literary production or that a production to be literary must have a subject that savors of the sublime. These intensely literary sounding subjects make an impression somewhat like the "intensely utter" girl makes upon her country aunt. Not the subject but the subject matter, is the prime question. It need not be sublime; it must not be ridiculous. There is a mean between the two extremes which a great many literary men have followed with success and which it would pay a good many more of a literary turn to follow. The appeal is, therefore, for a reform; a substitution of a lighter vein of literature involving ability, ingenuity and thought, for this more weighty material—too heavy to float above water. Those who write on "Fair Rosalind" have the ability to write on some simpler theme; it is only a question of some extra exertion. For all that this may be the hundredth time the question of a reform has been broached, it is not the last unless there are better indications that it is a growing movement.

How to get rid of some of the brutality, to use a strong word, connected with sports and retain the sports themselves along with their most interesting features, is no simple question, in fact a nineteenth century conundrum. Experienced and keen witted men, for all they have planned and schemed, have so far failed to offer any workable solution. Why they have failed implies a good many things which will need considerable clearing up before the real question can any longer be approached. Possibly this may suggest itself as one of the probable reasons for this seemingly simple question's baffling all attempts at solution. Frequently, if not always, they have begun with the athlete, as if he had been the cause and it was in his power to correct, rather than with the public which has almost forced things into their present condition. The most marked of the undesirable practices which have found their way into our popular games are first. a perversion of their end, and second, an introduction of uncalled for roughness. The long course of training which contestants must now undergo has had a strong tendency to turn sport into business and its aim, recreation, into mental strain. This we at once recognize as the fault of the athlete and so look to him for its correction, though in fact it is a practice that has sprung up to meet the demand of the times. The uncalled for roughness is the direct result of public attention which, when centered upon contestants, as it always is, creates a feeling that reputation is at stake and thus causes the means to be lost sight of in the wild scramble for the end. Extravagance in training has largely removed the benefits; public sentiment has rendered legitimate almost any means of reaching the desired end, and paved the way for the fiercest rivalries and jealousies between colleges and individuals.

But it is said public sentiment, horrified with its fatalities and the general roughness, has been decrying the game of foot-ball, for instance. The truth of this can hardly be based upon the action of its representatives who have never failed to attend the game in great crowds and to bet their last, word or coin, it matters little which. And when we remember that schools have built up or torn down their reputations to an extent according as they have been victorious or suffered defeat in these lines, we are all the more inclined to consider this sentiment as the merest talk. It seems, therefore, that those who have it in mind to wipe out this brutal element which has connected itself closely with many sports, are starting amiss when they begin with the athlete. So long as the people extend their thumbs and offer the palm to the winner, while they show their contempt for the looser, we can look for little progress in this much needed reform. It has undoubtedly received its impetus from the people; it must be retarded by them. The athlete will be ready enough to do his part when the question of victory or defeat is of much less moment.

ESTRANGED.

Think not a flood of passion will divide
  Two lives so long in happy concord spent.
The past will cling forever by our side;
  It's not dismissed as is the arrow sent.

Although without, in calm and peaceful mien,
  I trend my way among the rocky steeps;
Within, the heart, through memories, has been
  Throbbing as if from out its bonds would leap.

But memories, dearest treasures of the dream,
  Will oft creep in and chill a waking hour:
  Banish them? 'Twould take the mighty power
To turn from out its course a mountain stream.

The pain we bear in this estrangement sad,
  Is soon engraven on the scroll of life.
But may we not forget and still be glad
  That we have passed yet another strife?

NANON.

A CRITIQUE OF JOHN MILTON.

A study of the life of John Milton reveals one of the greatest, strangest, saddest men the world has ever known. He was born of a family in which uprightness of character, lofty aspirations and a genuine love of literature and art held sway. Words of beauty and eloquence were whispered over his cradle, and even then his father destined him for the study of letters. He himself says:

> "When I was yet a child no childish play
> To me was pleasure; all my mind was set
> Serious to learn and know and thence to do
> What might be public good. Myself I thought
> Born to that end; born to promote all truth
> All righteous things."

At school, afterwards at Cambridge, and then at his father's country seat, he was developing and strengthening his powers of mind by close application to study. Greek and Latin, Hebrew and Syriac, French and Spanish, old English and all the Italian literature were studied with great eagerness and method; to these music, mathematics and theology were added. All this period of his life was regulated by the one thought of developing and unfolding within him an ideal man. The thought "that he, who would not be frustrate of his hope to write well hereafter in laudable things, ought himself to be a true poem" was the spring of action.

His scholarly attainments and logical powers admirably fitted him for a statesman. And during the period of the Commonwealth in 1649, he was appointed Latin Secretary to the Council of State, and his state papers show with what zeal and ability he discharged his duties. He became involved in various controversies and for twenty years was a powerful and active champion of Republicanism against Monarchy.

He says: "I saw a way was opening for the establishment of real liberty; that the foundation was laying for the deliverance of man from the yoke of slavery and superstition. I determined to relinquish the other pursuits in which I was engaged and to transfer the whole force of my talent and my industry to this one important object." This sentiment and his subsequent acts and writings show him in the light of a Reformer.

But though Milton won great popularity during his life by his prose writings, he comes to us more than two centuries later as a poet surrounded by a halo of glory. While yet in school, his fondness for poetry and the classics, as well as a dislike for the sciences, displayed his poetical tastes; and his talents in this direction were shown in the poetical exercises written at school and College, the "Hymn on the Nativity" being one of these. "With a peculiar grandeur and dignity of thought he combines an exquisite, though somewhat austere harmony and grace. The least elaborate of his efforts are characterized by a solemn, stately method of versification that satisfies the ear like the sound of a mighty organ. Apart from the energy of rhythm his youthful poems are mostly tranquil, tender or playful in tone." As the author of that greatest of English Epics, "that dream of a Puritan who has fallen asleep over the first pages of his Bible," Milton will ever stand preëminent among the great poets of the world.

When we think of this rare, great soul, bearing his blindness, poverty and persecution in solitude with such sublime and patient fortitude; when we think of what his domestic life was and what it might have been; when we think of his devotion to the Puritan cause, when his natural love of refinement and art, his fondness for beauty and display must be sacrificed, the grandeur and dignity of his character rise so far above and beyond us that we feel no words can fitly describe "the genius and virtue of John Milton, the poet, the statesman, the philosopher, the glory of English literature, the champion and the martyr of English liberty."

A LETTER FROM KOREA.

We are glad to publish the following from the pen of a former editor of the MIRROR. It will prove of interest to many readers from the fact that they were personally acquainted with the writer; to some, because of their interest in Missionary enterprises; to others, because of the account of the general progress in that country as the result of the recent political troubles.

SEOUL, KOREA.

For the last six months all eyes have been turned to that little but important peninsula, Korea. It is therefore necessary that the Church in America should know just what is going on and what effects the passing events are producing, in order that she may meet the great obligations of

THE PRESENT CRISIS.

While this term crisis has been loosely used and is becoming trite, yet it is the term which is now constantly on the lips of those conversant with Korean affairs, either in Church or State. No one can question the fact that the present is the greatest epoch in Korean history. The Hermit nation is open. She has been opened politically by the most aggresive nation of the East, and spiritually by the prayers of the Church of Christ. She is now an open door which no man can close.

Radical reforms both in government and in the manners and customs of the people are taking place. Among these reforms are the following:

Qualification for office shall henceforth depend on ability not birth; slavery is abolished; child marriages are strictly forbidden; families are to be freed from the penalties due to one member of the family only; the nation's accounts must be strictly kept and reports submitted; a police force has already been organized and some steps taken toward creating and drilling an army.

In the matter of costumes, white clothes exclusively have been worn by the common people, and highly colored ones, such as scarlet, purple and blue, by the upper classes. Pantaloons are made very broad and the coat reached below the knee. This almost immortal dress seems to be on the eve of its departure. The King went to a famous praying place, "The Temple of Heaven," a few days ago for the avowed purpose of asking the God of heaven whether he should put on western clothes. Such radical changes among the people show how completely they are being moved from their old ruts.

In the midst of these changes what effects have been produced in the reception of the Gospel? The results thus far have been most salutary. In fact there is

A NEW INTEREST IN CHRISTIANITY.

Both the King and Queen have come under christian influence this winter,—from their own invitation, of course. This has been through the medical missionaries who were called to attend them in a professional way. Dr. Avison has attended the King, and Mrs. Underwood, M. D., the Queen. Both have been faithful to their commission and dropped the word of truth as occasion offered. The Prince has been visited also, and found to be open to good influences. Bishop Ninde has recently called on some of the highest officials of the land and reports them as being most favorably disposed toward Christianity. Among the common people a real revival is going on. There have been many recent additions to the church and many others seem to be in an inquiring state of mind.

THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY

ever yet presented by Korea is now before the church of Christ. The great majority of this people are without "God in the world" but not without binding chains of Satan and influence of evil spirits by which they are kept in constant fear and torment.

Shall we not make an effort worthy of the opportunity and commensurate with the need? Does not God's spirit speak to you about making a real sacrifice in order that Christ may be preached to this nation? Any one will risk his life to save a person from a sudden and violent death; why not risk our lives and our means to save a nation from this slow and living, yet eternal death. May the Spirit of the living God lay it heavily upon your hearts and consciences.

Yours for Korea,
E. C. PAULING.

THE CLASSICAL UNITIES IN ADDISON'S "CATO."

Addison was a contemporary of Pope, Swift and Steele in the Classical School of English Literature. He lived in an age when the ancient classical writers were "sedulously studied as models of style and their peculiarities were imitated in every species of composition;" and in which, ancient history and classical mythology were searched for themes and characters. "Cato" is the result of such study and endeavor on the part of Addison; and although its faults as a drama and as poetry are plainly manifest, yet its success was far greater than other productions of its day because it more accurately filled the requirements of the patrons of literature. From the opening to its closing line, "Cato" is almost an exact representation of a classical drama, except that instead of a god, we find a man with a force of character and determination of will in upholding the plainest and most virtuous life against the assaults of vicious men and surroundings, equal to a deity, playing the leading role. The speeches are long and uninteresting until studied; and the allusions and structure are classical, as is the expression, in regard to exactness of metre and finish. But, aside from these minor likenesses in "Cato," we have the classical drama presented in its first principles—the unities of time, place and action.

The time of the tragedy covers but a single day and is determined by analysis and by illustrative passages, the first of which is the opening line: "The dawn is overcast, the morning lowers, and heavily in clouds brings on the day, the great, the important day, big with the fate of Cato and of Rome," and the last occurs in the closing scene,—"On the high point of yon bright western tower, we ken them from afar; the setting sun plays on their shining arms and burnish'd helmets, and covers all the field with gleams of fire." The events of the day are presented in the order of occurrence, with an occasional break usually coming at the end of an act. In the early morning, there are conversations in the spacious halls of the governor's palace and separation of the participants to attend their respective duties; later, about mid-day, the assembling of the senate and failure of the meeting against Cato. and lastly. the approch of Caesar at twilight and the death of Cato.

The scene of action is in the city of Utica in Africa, whither Cato and the remnants of his little army and senate had been driven by Caesar and his victorious allies. Within this city, even within the precincts of the governor's palace, the incidents of the play transpire. We have no mention of a dseparate meeting-place, for Cato's "Roman senate" was so diminished by war and privation that the council chamber of the palace would form the most likely and convenient place of assemblage. The indefinite naming or describing of any other than the "large hall in the governor's palace" increases the unity of place. Again, a similarity to the classical drama in this respect is noticed in the heralding of the arrival of a messenger from Caesar and the reporting of the encounter at the gate and the heroic death of Marcus instead of the presentation of these events.

Unity of action is a fundamental principle of both classical and romantic drama; and in "Cato" it is especially well developed. Every scene follows in time and place, forms a natural sequence, and is closely connected and interwoven in the scene immediately preceding. Aristotle says, "The drama is the tying and untying of a knot." In "Cato" the knot is tied by regular and determined action; no snarls in the threads nor breaks of the fibres, but each twist is given with the studied and unified result seen only in the classical school. Perhaps the way in which one character gives place for the entrance of a new one may become tiresome to many; but this constant changing and contact brings out each feature of the actors' characters. The action is continuous and except for the demands of the modern drama, there is no necessity for division into scenes. How much better unity of action could we desire than one which so vividly presents and accomplishes its purpose—the elevation of the virtue, valor and self-sacrifice of Cato to the good of Rome?

In effect, the unities of time and place, by representing it as visibly continuous, render the unity of action in "Cato" more distinctly and easily perceptible, connecting all its parts as contributions to a single stream flowing like the waves of a ceaseless flood until their embodied ideas are carried into the hearts, minds and actions of the people.

At the coming of spring all eyes naturally turn to base-ball. The season opened April 20, when Bucknell played Dickinson at Carlisle. Though Bucknell was defeated by the score of 9 to 14, she surprised her followers by the showing she made, both because it was her initial game for the season and because Dickinson has an exceptionally strong team this year.

The result of the game clearly showed that Bucknell has a stronger nine than she has had for years. The batting is particularly encouraging. During the game she made twice as many hits as Dickinson. What the team needs is team work, without which we cannot win. The score:

The second game of the season was played with the C. S. N. S. of Lock Haven which unfortunately resulted in another defeat for our boys. It must be admitted that it was a case of hard luck. The game started out promising to be a very close contest, Geary retiring the normal boys in the first inning on three pitched balls. Neither side scored until in the third inning three runs were scored by the Normal. Bucknell failed to make her stick work count until the seventh inning when she scored six runs. Two more were scored in the eighth, and in the ninth she came within one of tieing the score. When, with two men out and two men on bases, Cutler hit a slow one to the short stop who failed to catch the runner at first, the umpire called him out, thus giving them the game. The score:

Everybody in the institution would like to see a winning team at Bucknell this season and there is no reason why they should not. We have better material than we have had for a long time, and all it needs is development. The two games played so far show where we are particularly weak:

1st. It is evident that our men do not understand the game as they should.

2nd. There is not sufficient spirit manifested in the practice games.

3rd. More glaring errors have been made in the games played thus far than can be justified on any paltry excuse; for without doubt the loss of the games is due to the errors made at critical times. A coach is what we need and it is sincerely hoped that we may secure one.

Our diamond is in a sad condition. Though improved somewhat it needs much more of the same medicine before the boys will be able to play good ball. How much would a roller weighing 1500 pounds or a ton cost? Such a roller would put our diamond and tennis courts into the very best condition.

As has been said, our practice work is very tame. Would it not be a good idea to play a game of five innings every evening with the Reserves and post the full account of each game on the bulletin board, where everybody could see the kind of work each man is doing? We must practice hard to win.

It might not be a bad plan if the Freshmen were labeled, for a certain member of the Faculty was recently taken for a member of that class.

L'Agenda will be out May 15,—so the editors say. In artistic design, display of illustrations and literary finish, it is to go ahead of all its predecessors.

The Juniors taking Astronomy have been divided in four sections for Observatory work. From 8 to 9 the members of the class divide the time between star-gazing and exchanging confidences on the roof with the female members. Look out "Herbie," or you'll get caught!

We extend our congratulations to the "Sems" who are lucky enough to obtain the recent privileges, too numerous to mention. We are sure you deserve them.

Company A. 12th regiment N. G. P. passed its annual spring inspection May 2. A number of Bucknell boys are in this company, and assisted in making the fine showing.

Dr. Aviragnet has made the announcement that the commencement music this year will be particularly fine. Several artists in musical specialties have been engaged.

Dr. and Mrs. Harris gave a reception on Friday evening, April 19, to the delegates from the schools of the State to the Y. M. C. A. convention. Many of the University students found time to attend. A very enjoyable time is reported.

Prof. Perrine:—(in pronouncing "Union" with the "dutch" accent)—We have "Onion" here, have we not Josephs?

Douglas:—Is that in good taste, Doctor?

Josephs: (exultingly)—It's not so much the taste, (although that's a good quality), but it is an excellent thing for a weak throat.

Prof. Martin has accomplished much in the way of filling the files of magazines in the Library. He recently added many volumes of the Contemporary Review, Fortnightly Review, Pennsylvania Magazine, Arena and many more. It will not be many years until Poole's Index will be of great value to the students.

Hon. Eugene Emly, of Paterson, N. J., will be the orator, and Rev. T. M. Eastwood, of Albany, N. Y., will be the poet on Alumni night of Commencement week. The board of managers held a recent meeting, at which it was decided to hold the program under two hours, and run the same on sharp schedule time. The exercises will begin at 7.45, and it is intended that they be over at 9.30, P. M. The classes of '75 and '85 will have short parts on the program.

He sits near us in recitation every day, and aside from his general appearance I decided that he had no soul when I noticed that he was very much interested in a volume which lay in his lap. This led me to make a more careful study of the form beside me. His face is larger than is commonly seen on a body of his size, though it may be its smoothness, when he has not forgotten to shave, and the hair combed back from the forehead that makes it seem so large. For his hair is very thin, probably from the close proximity to the heat of a student lamp that I am led, by the numerous books he brings to the class-room, to think it must be subjected to nightly. Or does he bring the books in for another reason, and is his hair a little thin because nature is overtaxed and cannot replenish the wastes in other quarters? I verily believe it is the latter. He generally wears a sweater with a large collar and the strings are never tied. His shoes are always in need of blacking, and I have often longed to tell him to go to the dentist that the enamel of his teeth might be seen when he opens his mouth, which is very seldom. His finger nails might be greatly improved with a judicious use of the pen-knife. From his sallow complexion one would think he had trouble with his liver. I think he needs more bile and would suggest liver pills for a few days followed with a warm-water bath and a generous use of good soap.

Upon special invitation of the House through a resolution introduced by Representative Focht, which was unanimously adopted, President Harris delivered his famous lecture in the hall of the House, before a large number of the members and their friends, on Wednesday evening April 24. The splendid audience that greeted President Harris when he entered and took his place before the Speaker's stand, speaks louder than words of the fame of Dr. Harris as an orator which had preceded him. This was but the third lecture delivered before the House this session and by far the most popular one, which was attested to by the large crowd that had assembled to hear it. In fact, the crowd was larger than expected, and it was with great dificulty that the pages secured seats for the many ladies who honored the speaker by their presence. The meeting was called to order by Representative Focht, who presented Auditor-General Gregg, the presiding officer of the evening. In a short speech Gen. Gregg introduced President Harris and as the lecturer stepped forward he was given a rousing reception, the applause dying away only after the speaker opened his lips to talk. For one hour Dr. Harris held the audience spell bound as he depicted the events that led up to the "Fall of Richmond." It is rarely that a speaker can command perfect silence on the part of the audience whilst speaking in the hall of the House, but absolute quiet prevailed throughout the entire lecture. From all sides, from soldiers and citizens alike, come only words of the highest commendation as to the excellence of the lecture. Dr. Harris is to be congratulated upon the success of the occasion, for he held spell bound an audience representing all shades of life from all over this great Commonwealth; an audience that is nothing if it is not critical. The next morning, immediately after the session opened, Representative Patchin, of Clearfield County, offered the following resolution which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That a vote of thanks be extended by this body to Dr. John H. Harris, President of Bucknell University at Lewisburg, for the very eloquent, patriotic and instructive lecture on "The Fall of Richmond," delivered in this Hall Wednesday evening, April 24.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF COLLEGE Y. M. C. A. PRESIDENTS.

It was a special privilege and pleasure accorded to Bucknell last week to welcome the Presidents of the Young Men's Christian Associations in the colleges of Pennsylvania to their annual conference. The conference opened Thursday evening, April 18, and the last session was held Sunday evening.

The conference was under the leadership of Mr. Gilbert Beaver, college secretary of Penn'a, Mr. S. M. Bard, state secretary, Mr. Chas. E. Hurlburt, ex-state secretary, who is now engaged in Bible Institute work in Philadelphia, and Mr. Hugh Beaver, class of '95, Penn'a State College, who succeeds his brother as college secretary of Pennsylvania next fall.

Mr. John R. Mott, international college secretary, was present at the sessions of the conference held Saturday evening and Sunday. Mr. Mott is a man of remarkable power and has left his impress upon the colleges of the world during the seven years of his work among them. The coming fall he enters upon some advance work, when his place will be taken by Mr. Gilbert

Beaver. Sunday afternoon Mr. Mott addressed all the young men of the University.

The purpose of the conference is to outline a policy for the conduct of associations in the higher schools. This annual conference has been one of the greatest factors in placing Pennsylvania in the very first place in effective christian work in her colleges and preparatory schools.

The associations of the University desire to thank all the people of the town who so kindly assisted by entertaining delegates and in other ways. The delegates have gone back to their schools in all parts of the State carrying most favorable impressions of Bucknell and Lewisburg.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Anna Bell Evans, Class of '86, was married Thursday April 4, at Shubert, Nebraska, to Curtis P. Coe. At Home after June tenth 1895, Baptist Orphanage, Wood Island, Alaska.

At the concert given as a testimonial to Mr. N. M. Halfpenny in the Opera House, Friday April 26, our own teachers, Miss Aiken and Miss Gould took prominent parts and reflected great credit upon the Institute.

A large number of the young ladies enjoyed the kind hospitality of Dr. and Mrs. Harris when on Friday evening, April 19, their home was thrown open to receive all members of the University. The reception was given in honor of the Y. M. C. A. convention.

On Saturday, April 20, the Phi Gamma Delta fraternity invited guests from the Institute and College to their annual arbutus party. The day was perfect, the arbutus was in its prime, everybody was in a happy mood, and consequently all had an unusually good time. After a delightful day spent among the hills at Winfield, the party was voted a very great success.

ACADEMIC NEWS.

Why is Field's head like Heaven? Because there is no parting there.

Meeker paid us a visit on the 27th. He expects to return next Fall.

A student in the Astronomy class was heard to ask the professor a few days ago whether there were any *earth*quakes on the other planets.

Jenkinson, having completed his studies in the Academy, has returned home. He expects to return next Fall and enter the Freshman Class.

At the last meeting of the Athletic Association Bayard resigned the captaincy of the Academy base-ball team and Devitt was elected to fill the vacancy.

The contest in Declamation of the Third Form for the Rev. David P. Leas Prize was held Saturday evening, April 27, in Bucknell Hall. The following were the contestants: Wenck, Cottrell, Pearse, Kulp, Anstock, Sherman, Ross and Stabler. During the exercises they were presented with a beautiful bouquet by the members of the Fourth Form.

The Academy base-ball team opened the season with the Harrigates of Lewisburg on the College campus Friday, April 26. They were defeated by the close, score 19–18 in a six inning game. The Academy team played as follows: Wittenmyer, p, Brady, c, Jenkinson, 1b, Senn, 2b, Schuyler, 3b, Johnson, ss, Hutchinson, lf, Bayard, cf, Devitt, rf.

Personals.

'72. Prof. John Ballantine is supplying the pulpit of the Brookville Baptist church.

'73. Col. Freeman G. Teed is president of the City Council of Los Angeles, Cal.

'80. On May 7, the Rev. H. A. Griesemer was given a mammoth reception in honor of the anniversary of his eleventh pastorate of the Haddonfield Baptist church.

Ex-'83. A Baptist Church has been organized at Ardmore, Pa., near Philadelphia, and is under the pastoral care of Chas. M. Reed, of Crozer Seminary.

'84. Ernest L. Tustin, Esq., has associated himself in the practice of law with Hon. C. F. Warwick and A. S. Miller, Esqs., with the office in the Betz Building, Philadelphia.

'85. Rev. S. G. Reading of Williamsport, Pa., spent a few hours at the college on April 26.

'85. William L. Kurtz has purchased the plant of the Lewisburg Journal and will take possession on May 1.

'85. C. C. Law was recently appointed Deputy State Bank Examiner.

'87. Frances M. Rush was united in marriage to Dr. Ira C. Leedom on April 4, at Montana, N. J.

'88. Dr. William M. Woodward met with a very novel accident recently. He and a friend were walking together along a road on which a trolley car was running. The gentlemen stepped aside to allow the car to pass, but just as it reached a point opposite them it jumped the track, for some unknown reason, and struck Dr. Woodward, knocking him down and cutting off one of his legs above the knee. At last accounts he was still living, and the injured member had been amputated by the surgeons of the town.

'92. Prof. W. L. Kauffman is to be an intructors in science at the Mt. Gretna Chautauqua the coming season.

'94. W. M. Vastine is studying law in the office of James Scarlet at Danville, Pa.

'94. A. C. Lathrop, pastor of the Everett Baptist church, is meeting with signal success.

'94. Prof. Warren Stanley Marts, of Perkiomen Seminary, was a guest of friends at the college on the 13th and 14th of April.

'94. Perry Sylvester Calvin, of Rochester Theological Seminary, spent several days at Lewisburg the early part of the term.

'94. Prof. James R. Hughes is the very successful principal of a school consisting of 800 pupils and 16 teachers in Hyde Park, Scranton, Pa.

Ex-'95. Harry S. Bourn was appointed Justice of the Peace of the 1st ward of Danville to fill the unexpired term of his father recently deceased.

Exchange.

We are glad to acknowledge the receipt of the Washington and Jefferson. It is gotten up in good form and is full of excellent articles.

The University of North Carolina is urging that a debate take place between that institution and the University of Virginia.

Because of the success of the committee on discipline at Cornell, this committee has been given power to act in all cases of University discipline.

The Faculty of Wellesley College have decided to let the girls practice rowing, and an eight-oared barge has been built for them. However, it will not be used for racing.

The last issue of the Messenger is an especially interesting one. Its literary matter is of a high quality, and it contains more literature than any other college journal that we receive.

It has long been a prerogative of Browning jokes to be old as the hills, and perhaps this tale from the mountains of New Hampshire will not prove as new to others as to us. It is sent to us by an unknown correspondent. The scene is laid in a village country store, such as does duty for post-office, circulating library, shoe store, and everything else combined. The dialogue runs as follows:—

Boston Lady (glancing over the books). Have you Browning?

Attendant (regretfully, and not knowing just what kind of an article Browning might be). No, we have not, (then more brightly) but we have blueing and blacking, and we have a man who does whiting. We occasionally do pinking, Would any of these do?—Poet-Love

The Hypercritical Spirit never should for an instant be tolerated in college. Student life should be family-life, not disgruntled, criticising existence. Yet we need not look far to find this unhappy spirit. To censure this and that, here and there, now and always, seems the shriveled ambition of many. They would promulgate slander and gossiping, embitter the pleasures of school-life, and destroy Alma Mater patriotism. We have met these naggers at this and that, e. g. at the Glee Club because they failed to become members, at this society because it is a rival of their own, at the Faculty because permission is not given to do just as one pleases. There is too much of this sharp-cutting criticism. It is small to be a constant fault finder. How much nobler and sweeter is sympathy and love, fraternity and unity! "Judge not that ye be not judged."—College Chronicle.

Editorial.

FIELD Day is an event of the past, and it was the most successful of all that have been held on our campus. Many records were broken and had it not been for the rain, others would have succumed to the assaults of the determined men. But there are a few points that should be remedied. There seems to be a tendency to narrow down the actual participants to a few men and place all responsibility upon them. We want more men to train for the events. It was very evident to a careful observer which men were prepared for the events and these are the men who will win. We want more men in every contest. It was very evident that the events with a large number of contestants were by far the most exciting and it is to be regretted that but two classes were represented by teams. The Juniors and Sophomores did not take enough interest to place teams in the field. There is good material in their ranks and it should be cultivated. Lack of opposition in many of the events made the records very poor when in reality the contestants, if pushed, could make very credible marks. More participants with a proper amount of class spirit will go a long way toward good records, and we trust that another year will see every class as well represented as was the class of '98 at this meeting and we are sure that the present records will not stand.

THE success of the committee on discipline at Cornell is due to the fact that the students are in a position to know what is going on among them. Many a professor who prides himself on being able to detect those under him who pony is hoodwinked every day, but very few of the class are so fooled. It is time that the students at Bucknell took hold of this matter, for self-defence if for no other reason. The man who does honest work in our classes, but is easily "rattled" by the professor's endeavor to hurry him, finds on his report, perhaps, a "G" or a "V. g." His neighbor, who has carried into the class-room day after day a well interlined book or a small slip of paper with the lesson on it, and who, more than likely, has copied from the "V. g." man all his examination, receives an "Ex." Such a state of affairs is just to neither party. The hard worker deserves what the lazy one receives, but instead he gets small reward for his diligence. We know a student should ideally not work for marks, but under existing circumstances he is more than human if he does not feel disappointed at not obtaining a fair share of honor. And he has a just right to expect recognition by marks when that system is in vogue. Without doubt the professors are doing all they can to combat this evil, but they cannot overcome it entirely. Shall the honest and conscientious students submit longer to this abuse of justice, when they have the facts in their hands? We are not advocating any tell-tale plan, but a plain democratic government. It were well if the Faculty would consider something of this kind; and not only in relation to cheating in class but in regard to certain other nuisances which pertain to a college body.

IF we seem to be using too much freedom in criticising the Exchange column, when our own is subject to criticism on the same points, we beg to acknowledge our inconsistency and to say, by way of excuse, that little space or time can at present be given it. It is clear to a fairly close observer that a good many school publications run their Exchange column on rather meager principles. In some cases the news is brief or wanting altogether, presumably for the reason that other matter is of more importance. No one can profitably object to this so long as he is led to believe that other material is of more importance. Some make out of it a foreign joke column, a kind of circulating Puck-and-Judge library. Objections to this may differ with different people. To us it seems, first, too much of a good thing. Everybody appreciates a good college joke, but a poor one may spoil a column otherwise good and too many defeat their own purpose. Second, it furnishes no standard for judging a paper or its represented school. A third class fill this column for the most part with facts of the college world which are quite interesting and of some importance. But it savors much of the country newspaper to calendar odds and ends only and not infrequently there is no close discrimination between temporal and permanent facts. Thus it may be interesting to know that Harvard has 1600 students or Yale 500 instructors, but each year these facts lose their value. There is a fourth class which combines the best traits of the others with a review of the various Exchanges so far as possible, and is not beyond offering a little criticism where merit or demerit demands. This seems the model method so far reached. It raises the position of "Exchange editor" to a plane of responsibility and importance; it does away more effectually with the idea that one journal has nothing to do with any other; and, most of all, it gives to the reader of one paper a knowledge of many papers, of their ideas, their rank in journalism, and in the end, of the schools which they represent.

DREAM OF A QUARREL.

My love is coming! sings my heart,
And throbs with wild delight;
My voice awakes to tuneful art,
Life seems a thing most bright.

My love hath come! his princely form
The eye of Love descries
Far off as yet; I thrill with warm,
Expectant, sweet surprise.

My love hath gone! he leaves me sad;
In anger parted we.
How followed this our meeting glad?
'Tis crushing mystery!

His heart aches, mayhap, o'er some word
I, all unthinking, spoke.
My spirit writhes like wounded bird;
Love's magic spell is broke!

She sobbed till all the house o'erheard,
Then from her dream awoke.

THE LACK OF UNITY IN LES MISERABLES.

In one of the recitations of the class in Advanced Composition last term, a remark was made referring to Victor Hugo's Les Miserables as a wonderful work from the point of view of unity. But the question would arise "Does the novel have this marvelous unity which is claimed for it?"

Let us inquire, in the first place, what unity is. In the strict sense of the term, a production would have the highest possible degree of unity only when every section admitted as a part of it clearly contributes its share towards the object for which the production is written. But in fiction a broader definition must be admitted. We can say then that a story has perfect unity when it has a theme upon which every detail in the whole narrative has a bearing.

Before deciding upon the unity of Les Miserables it is necessary to find out Hugo's theme. It might be said by those who claim for the work perfect unity that the theme is "The Social System of France." But this is not the real theme; it is merely the theme which Hugo sought to illustrate by writing his story. The real theme of the story is undoubtedly “The Life and Work of Jean Valjean.”

Having thus obtained a definition of unity and the true theme of the story, we can very readily find out whether all of the details look toward the great culminating point of the book.

Hugo violates our law of unity by ushering in nearly all the important events by a great deal of unnecessary and almost irrelevant matter. For example, he gives a lengthy description of Waterloo when all he tells us after this long digression is that the father of one of the characters was an officer in Napoleon's army and that he was robbed on the battlefield by a certain Thenardier whom we subsequently meet as a landlord. After this he enter into a discussion of the monastic system, with the only reason that he wants to put Valjean and Cossette within the walls of a nunnery. An enormous amount of space is devoted to an account of the émeutes and other incidents connected with the Revolution of 1832. Some of the characters do appear during these disturbances, but the part they play is so trivial as to be practically nothing. Again, a long description of the Parisian sewerage system is intruded on the reader in one of the most interesting parts. These digressions are not in themselves obnoxious or uninteresting, but they have nothing whatever to do with the theme and from the standpoint of unity might have been omitted with advantage both to the story and to the reader.

But before condemning the work on account of its lack of unity alone, let us look a little farther. There is another rhetorical law which must be taken into account, the law of variety. There is a certain class of novels, which, if they get through the publishers to the booksellers at all, are a drug on the market. This class may have perfect unity but have no variety. Then there is another class, for example a great many of the light novels of the day, which are nearly all variety with very little unity. Both are failures as far as true literary merit is concerned. The perfect novel is the one which combines these two elements, sacrificing one for the other but not in a way to be detrimental to either. And Victor Hugo has accomplished this in Les Miserables, giving us a glimpse of all the varied phases of life in France, and at the same time keeping our interest centered on the life of a single man.

The point of view of an author must also be considered in criticising his work. To determine the point of view of Hugo as the author of Les Miserables one must find out his purpose in bringing the work before the public. This was evidently to teach the literary public about the social status of France in his time, and to teach them this in the most interesting mode of thinking possible,—that of a story. His point of view was therefore that of a sociologist, and he had the right under the general subject which he was illustrating to introduce his descriptions of Waterloo, of the monasteries, of the riots and the sewers.

The reason for the great success of Les Miserables as a literary work lies in the fact that the author complemented unity with variety, and eliminated the monotony which would be consequent upon plain unity by excursions into the general field which he was illustrating.

THE MAIDEN'S ROCK.

We were a happy crowd of students just from college, and our heads were full of Geology, Psychology, Antropology and Romance. We had planned to spend our vacation in the northwest, and the first of July found us in Minnesota with light hearts, ambitious, with bright prospects for a jolly time. One day as we were planning a trip, our landlord suggested that we spend at least a day in the region occupied by the Dakota Indians, better known to us as the Sioux. It was a suggestion discussed at length at the time, but we are all very glad now that we acted upon it.

One morning, a few days later found us on board a little steamer on Lake Pepin, the “Lake of Tears,” bound for the old camping grounds of the Indians. And what a grand morning it was! As we sailed slowly up the lake, with scarcely a ripple, save the extending undulations from the prow of our little craft, to mar its crystal surface, we could not be otherwise than happy to think that we had decided to take the trip; for there was every indication for a beautiful day.

We had proceeded about twelve miles in the indistinct light of the early morning when the sun, from his eastern couch, lifted his head over a precipitous crag and lighted a track across the rippling water; for the breeze came with the morning light. Our mirror is soon transformed into a sea of diamonds; for every vortex, as if happy in the radiance of the new day, is resplendent with the rays of the sun. But the bluff demands our attention. Still obscured in shadows, it awes us with its majestic height. Soon faint outlines are discerned, then distinct details are obvious. Rising rapidly from the waters edge, the steep shore, dark for some distance with a mysterious green and fresh with the dew of the morning, passes in unappreciable gradations into a rocky promentory which, rising to the height of four hundred and fifty feet, overhangs the water. As we were discussing its formation, the captain strolled by and intimated that there was much more connected with that crag than we suspected. Of course this suggested a story and upon being pressed, he consented to relate to us the tale which, no doubt, he had told many times before and will tell again so long as he is commander of that boat and there are tourists eager to hear a legend. After filling and lighting his pipe he proceeded with the story which, as nearly as I can remember, is as follows:

Many years ago, before a pale face had been mirrored in the placid surface of the lake, in the days of the great chief Wapashaw, there lived in the village of Keoxa a beautiful Indian maiden. She was the first-born daughter and, as is the custom among the Dakotas, she was given the name Winona. Her parents, proud of the beautiful child, resolved that she should be the wife of some illustrious warrior.

Time flew rapidly and the lovely child matured into a beautiful woman. The strong frank countenance gave evidence of a loving soul; the beautiful hair, grand form, majestic bearing, made her a favorite with all the tribe and hardly had she reached an age to think of marriage when many presented themselves as suitors for her hand; but all were rejected save Kanawha. He it was who, on returning from a successful hunt, brought the choicest bird to her; again, he finds her gathering sticks for fuel and as she kneels to place them on her back, he takes her hand and helps her up, and than walks home by her side; or, as the shades of evening fall over the camp, the dulcet notes of his "cotanke" could be heard from far over the water as he played for her while the little canoe drifted idly before the evening breeze. With him Winona was happy; but when he came to the father with his horse and the many things he had begged from his friends that he might purchase the maiden for his wife, his proposals were rejected; for that very day a warrior from a neighboring tribe, whose headdress plainly told the number of scalps he had torn from Ojibway heads, had visited the camp. Seeing Winona, he became enamored and went immediately to her parents to purchase her. They, thinking she would be more honored as an inmate of his teepee than that of Kanawha's, gave their consent.

Winona. however, refused to marry the warrior. She could not forget the love she had for her brave; and, though he had been forced from her sight, his absence only served to strengthen her affections. For many long days the disheartened maiden dreamed of the absent lover and the happy hours she had spent with him. The warrior was ever attentive to her; but neither his apparent love, nor the persuasion of friends, nor the threats of parents, could make her marry against her desires. What was position to this noble maiden? The love of Kanawha was more to her than all the possessions of the tribe. She would be faithful to her love.

One bright day the band went down the lake to celebrate a grand victory they had won over their enemies. Young and old were alike happy, and many stalwart braves and charming maidens were enjoying the festive day; for the bright sun, shady nooks, secluded bowers, and beautiful lake, made the very air redolent with the whisperings of love. Winona alone was despondent. Retiring to a secluded spot she dreamed of her absent lover and the shattered plans they had made. No more would she be allowed to see him; never again could she drift on the bosom of the lake while he breathed those sweet love-notes into her ready ears; he must be a stranger to her now.

While thus in meditation, a shadow fell across her vision and soon the warrior was beside her. In his bold, impulsive way he laid before her his prospects; showed her how she would be honored as his wife; how he could give her a position much higher that she could hope of attaining as the wife of Kanawha and;—but here she stopped him. With scorn in her every feature, she reproved him for his cruel words against her absent lover and in a rage, left him. Returning to the margin of the lake, the warrior found that all was prepared for the feast. His friends were suprised when he came into the circle without Winona, for they thought she would surely consent to marry him at this time.

In the midst of their festivities, they were startled by a voice from the cliff above them. Glancing up they beheld Winona in all the beauty of youth, radiant from the exertion of her climb. In her rich, clear voice she related the story of her love and how cruel her friends had been in keeping her lover from the feast. Then, chanting a wild death-song, she threw herself from the crag down to the rocks below where her form was soon picked up a mass of broken limbs and bruised flesh.

This is the story as I heard it from an old trader when I was a boy. It has been handed down among the settlers from generation to generation as a true historical fact and from this legend the cliff we just passed has been known as the Maiden's Rock of the Dakotas.

Athletics.

SECOND ANNUAL INTER-CLASS CONTEST IN FIELD ATHLETICS FOR THE MIRROR CUP.

It seems that the elements are against us when we attempt to exhibit our ability in Field Athletics. Last year it rained all the afternoon of the day set apart for holding the games and this year a heavy shower came up when about half of the events had been run off and it was necessary to postpone the latter part of the program until Monday the 13th. The exhibition was very gratifying this year from the fact that so many men who entered prepared for the contests by systematic training during the term. And this training was very manifest in the trials; for in nearly every case the man who trained won the place. In our previous exhibitions men would go on the field without any practice whatever and win many times. A noticeable feature of the entries is seen in the fact that the Sophomore and Junior classes were represented by but one man each. This resolved the contest into a trial between the Seniors and Freshmen, but the best all around athlete of the former was debarred. Thus '95 was, in reality, not represented as a class, but notwithstanding this she made a pretty race for the cup. As to the success of the games, it is sufficient to state that eight records out of a possible twelve were broken. It seems safe to say that others would have succumbed had the rain held off a little longer.

A feature of particular interest to the University was the exhibition of Bromley Smith of the class of '95 College and Cober, '95 Academy, in the hammer and shot events, and Smith in the high jump and pole vault.

The officials were as follows: Judges, Professors Rockwood, Hamblin and Fisher. Timer, Prof. Hulley. Starter, P. B. Linn, Esq. Clerk, V. B. Fisk, '97. The program and records are as follows:

100 YARD DASH :

1st.	W. H. Carey, '95,	11 ¾ seconds.
2nd.	A. A. Smith, '98,
3rd.	F. W. Jackson, '95. H. C. Downing, '98, } tied.

The summary of events gives the Seniors 39½ points; the Juniors 5 points; the Sophomores 2 points; the Freshmen 49½ points. This gives the contest to the class of '98 by ten points.

It is a fact very much to be regretted that the students take so little interest in base-ball that the management was compelled to cancel nearly all games scheduled to be played at Lewisburg. We cannot expect the management to lose money on every game played on our campus and at the same time not run the association deeper in debt. Why not encourage the team and quit deadheading? Show your loyalty.

On Saturday May 4, the Bucknell nine played the Milton team on the college campus. The game resulted in a victory for Milton. The feature of the game was the comedy of errors in which both sides seemed determined to excel. Aside from the glaring errors, the game was very close. The pitching of Geary was a marked feature, not an earned run being scored against him. Our team expected an easy time and in consequence they were taken into camp by the score of 9 to 8.

After the severe drubbing given to F. & M. by Bucknell in foot-ball last fall, the F. & M. boys have had an itching to get a return whack at Bucknell. The long hoped for opportunity came on Saturday May 12, when Bucknell crossed bats with the F. & M. nine. The game was exciting from the very start, F. & M. scoring three times in her first time at bat while Bucknell went out in one, two, three order. The second inning was a repetition of the first, when things began to look rather misty for Bucknell. She however played a very steady uphill game, F. & M. scoring two more in the third and one in the fifth inning. Bucknell did not succeed in getting a man across home plate until in the seventh inning when she scored two runs. In the eighth two more were added which ended Bucknell's run getting. The features of the game were F. & M's. batting in the early part of the game and the battery work of Plank and Cremer for F. & M. and the battery work of Geary and Brady for Bucknell. Mulkie at short and Carey at the bat distinguished themselves.

The entire game showed a vast improvement over those played earlier in the season, but two errors being charged against our team. With steady training and support our team will yet win. The score:

It strikes us that it would be a good plan for the 'Varsity band to give one open air concert a week during the spring term. It would add greatly to the pleasure of the students, and of the town people as well.

Dr. Enoch Perrine, of the chair of English, has accepted the invitation to deliver the memorial address before the Andrew Gregg Tucker Post No. 52, G. A. R., of this place, in the Lewisburg Court-house, on Decoration Day.

Boating is now in favor and numerous parties of students and their lady friends are enjoying the pleasure of dipping oars once more in the Susquehanna. Serveral canoes are owned by the boys and are in almost constant use.

The 'Varsity band, under the management of A. T. Williams and the leadership of F. M. Simpson, took part in the parade of the K. G. E. held in Williamsport on the 14th. Although the weather was unfavorable, the demonstration was a success, nearly a thousand Knights being in line. The band is a prominent factor in advertising the school and should be encouraged.

It was the delightful pleasure of the Class of '95 to attend a reception given in their honor at the home of our honored President, on Thursday, May 9. It is needless to say that the evening was a pleasant one to all; for it could not be otherwise to the guests of Dr. and Mrs. Harris. Our graduating sisters from the Institute were present making a jolly company. Expressions of delight for our entertainment were heard on all sides, and it was with reluctance that we parted with our genial hosts.

Commencement Speakers:—Hon. John H. Littlefield, law student and personal friend of Abraham Lincoln, will deliver the address before the Literary societies, on "Personal Recollections of Abraham Lincoln." Lemuel Moss, D. D. LL. D., will address the College graduating Class. Hon. Eugene Emly will pronounce the Oration before the Alumni. Rev. T. M. Eastwood has consented to act as Alumni Poet. E. H. Woods, D. D., of Williamsport will deliver the sermon before the Educational Society, and the Baccalaureate Sermon will be delivered by President John Howard Harris.

The museum would hardly be recognized today by one who has not seen it for a few months. N. F. Davis and B. K. Brick have been working at our valuables some time, and now the room presents an attractive appearance. The cases have all been rearranged, cleaned and furnished with new locks. All specimens have been arranged in proper order and with an eye to artistic display as well as convenience. Particularly attractive are the cases containing the Indian relics and the sea shells. They show the work of a naturalist in arrangement. The minerals and rocks have all been classified and are in excellent shape. Many new specimens have been added during the past year through purchase and not a few as gifts.

It is not often, in this advanced state of civilization, that gypsies are able to spirit off such a highly cultivated personage as they did on Saturday evening, May 18. It was the first appearance of the nomads in our vicinity this year, and the class of '95 was the object of their work. Although the physical loss to the class was not of such a nature as to cause serious alarm, the vast mental ability removed from their ranks caused the members much deep thought as to how they could ever graduate and have this brilliant brain away. After careful consideration of every phase of the subject, they concluded that the missing member must be found if possible. A search was immediately instituted and the camp of the wanderers was soon located. But how were they to make known their presence without the knowledge of the captors? This difficulty was soon removed by the appearance of a lone figure stealing quietly from the shadow of the Institute. As he picked his way carefully toward the hill, his figure and motions made it apparent to the searching party that this was their companion. And so it proved to be. He explained his retention at the Seminary as due to the fact that his discussions of innate ideas, immanent finality and first cause were too much for his captors, and they locked him in the building so that they might rest in peace.

The Senior Class inaugurated the closing events of its career on Friday evening, May 3. It was then that the class banquet was held at the Cameron House. The class met in the parlors of the hotel about nine o'clock, and at a little past ten the doors of the dining room were opened and the members of the class seated themselves at the elegantly appointed table decked with carnations, the class flower. After more than two hours had been put in doing justice to the carefully prepared and tastefully served viands of Landlord Moyer, Toast Master Sheddan rose and called for the class song. Mr. Brick was next asked to assign places to members of the Faculty on a scientific system. That gentleman responded quite happily and hit off especially "our well-known Rabbi and his dog." Mr. Hanna spoke upon "Our Class Sisters," both step and otherwise. Miss McLaughlin recounted the athletic prowess of the class as individuals and as a whole, closing with an original poem. At this point the class rose and drank to the health of "Our Athletes," the President using the MIRROR Prize Cup which the class won last year. Mr. Smith responded to the toast, "Our Graduate Students," by a reference to "the quituated members," then urged a devotion to alma mater in the days when all should be graduate students. Mr. Pease followed with an appeal to the pride of the "brethren and sisters" in response to "Our Class." The party then returned to the parlor where Messrs. Simpson and Jackson played a cornet duet, Mr. Allen accompanying upon the piano. Miss Gould, who chaperoned the party, followed with two songs, after which she was unanimously elected an honorary member of the class. Several songs were given by the class, then everybody joined hands and sang "Auld Lang Syne." As a final the class cry was given, and as the clock struck two the line of march was taken for the hill, and '95's class supper was a matter of fond regrets and pleasant memories.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

On Friday, May 3, the Senior Class enjoyed a very pleasant afternoon at Turtle Creek with Mrs. Larison. The day was fine, and the bird-foot violets (for which chiefly the trip was taken) were blooming in profusion. After some hours of fun, wholesome and care-free, the girls returned laden with the velvety flowers, when, in honor of the occasion, an unusually appetizing supper was served.

The following program will show what a unique plan the 4th Year Class adopted for their Soiree. It is needless to say that it was most successful:

The evening of May 9 will be memorable to the class of '95 as one of the delightful occasions of their senior year. The home of President Harris was the scene of a pleasant reception. Dr. and Mrs. Harris are admirable hosts, and their efforts for the entertainment of the class made us feel, when the hour for adjournment came, that the evening had been all too short.

From first to last, the program of the Elocutionary Contest was a most enjoyable one. Both in the character of the selections and in the manner of their rendering they reflected great credit upon the institution and particularly upon the instruction given in the department of Elocution. The University has good cause to be proud of the Mandolin and Guitar Club that furnished the music for the occasion.

ACADEMIC NEWS.

Two foreign nations at war—Darre and Schultz.

Who said: "My! Isn't Perrin a nice fellow?"

Miller was recently initiated into the Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity.

Teacher (in Grammar class): "What is the plural of goose?" Student: "Gander."

A debate has been arranged between the Hermenia and Adelphia Literary Societies. It is to take place Friday evening, June 7.

Bucknell Academy stands at the head of the preparatory schools of the state in throwing the hammer. Cober threw it last Field Day 93 ft. 1 in. He also put the shot 32 ft. 8¾ in.

Joe Schultz, to all appearances, has at last thought it best to stick to one class. He has been telling, with great pride, this last week, that he is a "Third Former," and has been wearing the colors of that class.

Joe Snyder, a former student at the Academy, has become quite famous as a bicyclist. He gave a public performance at the corner of Third and Market streets a few days ago to a very appreciative audience. We learn that he is to appear in Milton at an early date.

Personals.

'62. Rev. J. G. Walker, D. D., has been elected Recording Secretary of the American Baptist Publication Society.

'68. Leroy Stephens, D. D., of Mount Pleasant Institute, led chapel May 15.

'71. Frank S. Marr is connected with the Helios Electric Company, Duncan Building, Philadelphia.

'76. Rev. Owen James, of Hollidaysburg, was recently elected president of Roger Williams College, Nashville, Tenn.

'81. Rev. H. F. Stillwell, formerly of Freehold, N. J., has entered upon his pastorate with the Calvary Baptist church of Minneapolis, Minnesota.

'83. Rev. W. J. Coulston is pastor at Washington, Court-house, Ohio.

'85. Rev. S. L. Batten has resigned as associate pastor of Amity Baptist Church, New York City, and enters upon the pastorate at Norristown, N. J.

'86. George F. Keefer was recently elected City Engineer of Sunbury.

Ex-'91. Chas. W. Haines, of Crozer Seminary, has been called to Washington, N. J.

Ex-'92. Rev. G. F. Love has resigned the pastorate of the North Church, Rochester, N. Y.

'92. Prof. W. L. Kauffman, of the Harrisburg High School, will deliver the Decoration Day oration at Millersburg.

'93. Prof. Edwin Maxey, of Southwest Baptist College, at Bolivar, Mo., recently passed a most creditable examination in law and was admitted to the bar.

'94. J. Roberts Wood, of Crozer Theological Seminary, spent a few days in Lewisburg recently.

'94. Chas. F. McMann, who is now about to complete his course of study at Crozer Theological Seminary, has accepted a call to the pastorate of the Olivet Baptist church at Lancaster, and will enter upon his duties some time in June. This is a large and needy field, and it is hoped he may bring about excellent results.

Exchange.

Base-ball seems to be the great theme of college journals now.

At a mass meeting of the students of Colgate, it was decided to adopt the honor system for the examinations.

The Signal for May has been received and as usual is full of interest. The essay on "Morals in Schools" is worthy of mention.

The faculty of Leland Stanford University have organized a base-ball nine which has defeated every team the students have furnished.

The last copy of Irving Sketch-book is devoted principally to an exposition of the institution, with college and alumni news. It largely serves the part of a catalogue.

A record of the spring sports at Haverford is given in the Haverfordian. Haverford shows up well in running—far above the average—but in other lines she is ordinary.

Greatness is what we master ourselves, what we secure by our own labor. What is given us by ancestry is nothing, but what we make by the God-given powers is of value.

Both Oxford and Cambridge profited by their University presses last year. The Clareden press earned $25,000 clear for Oxford, and the Pitt press $16,000 for Cambridge.—U. of P. Courier.

The Reveille is always enjoyed by us. Most college papers might learn a lesson from the Reveille in conducting their local columns. The paper pays special attention to this department, and often has original and suitable cuts in it.

Ariel, the college paper, says: "Setting aside the moral and hygienic aspects of the question, it certainly is not the best kind of advertisement we get when the first object that greets a visitor's gaze is a dozen or twenty young men smoking pipes or cigarettes.

We are indebted to Dr. J. J. Summerbell for two copies of the Herald of Gospel Liberty. They are teeming with Sacred literature of a high grade. An acquaintance with Dr. Summerbell and a knowledge of his scholarly attainments and the purity of his character make the papers of more than common interest.

The University Courier, of April 3, gives a good deal of attention to the matter of college cycling, and makes the proposition to have a separate association for inter-collegiate bicycle contests. Letters from Columbia, Harvard, College of the City of New York, and Cornell, all show that the idea meets with favor in these institutions.

Than a beautiful woman, one can imagine nothing more pleasing to the sight than a well-trained and manly-looking athlete. In the gymnasium as he performs feats of strength and the muscles of his arms and neck stand out in knots, as with perfect grace and ease he performs some feat of skill, as on the race track he goes dashing by with every nerve and muscle strained, he is the admiration of all beholders. He forms an ideal, or rises toward an ideal, that mankind have ever cherished. Buff and Blue.

Antioch College, Yellow Springs, O., may well be proud of her first President, Horace Mann, who, upon being nominated for Governor of Massachusetts and chosen as the head of that school on the same day, preferred the latter position. His ideas of the State's duty to education is expressed in these words: "Every child should be educated: if not by its own father, the State should appoint a father to it. I would much sooner surrender a portion of the territory of the commonwealth to an ambitious and aggressive neighbor than I would surrender the minds of its children to the dominion of ignorance."

Editorial.

WE beg to call the attention of our subscribers to the fact that the MIRROR will be issued on June 25. It will be devoted to commencement news and will be of exceeding interest to those who will not be here during the week. Students wishing to have the number sent to other than their catalogue address should see the manager and make the desired change.

WE also call the attention of the Alumni to the volume of the college annual just published by the class of '96. L'Agenda is an elegantly bound book containing upwards of 250 pages and is set off by a great many line and half-tone engravings. It contains many things of more than local interest and must be acknowledged as surpassing anything of its kind published here. We hope the Alumni, as in the past, will continue to find sufficient merit in the publications of the University to warrant their patronage.

IT seems to have been a disappointing announcement which the Senior class made a few days ago to the effect that the usual class-day exercises would be dispensed with this year. This is not surprising, for class-day has been the favorite one of commencement week and any deviation from the set custom naturally enough meets with disapproval. But a fact or so may set forth the action in a little different light. The decision of the class was not reached in any off-hand or careless manner. The subject had been considered by some from the beginning of the middle term and it was not until it was rumored that the usual vacation would not be given that any serious objection was presented. It was the unanimous opinion of the class that a good programme would require more time and preparation than could possibly be given under the supposed circumstance and that a poor one was not worth considering. So when the rumor took more definite shape the only thing to do was to meet the question fairly and at once and decide it according to circumstances and not precedent. The class hopes that the deficiency may be more than met and that it may not be censured unjustly for poor judgment or careless action.

IT is now a settled fact that the tennis tournament will be held this year as usual. But it will not be forgotten by the athletic committee, and by a few of the greatly interested, with what discouragements the undertaking was met. This is indeed a serious indication and marks openly the decline of this excellent and popular game. We ought not to overlook our past success in this branch of athletics. When we won the intercollegiate games a few years ago, just after completing an interesting local tournament, it seemed that the interest aroused would continue unabated for several years. At the same time we have only to refer to our recent snubbing by the intercollegiate committee for a proof of the way the interest has actually been kept up. Contrary to all expectations, it seems to be dying out little by little and unless revived by a special effort this year, will be almost past recovery. It becomes, then, the duty of every lover of the game to put forth extra efforts so that this tournament may be such a success as to make next year's meet a certainty and rescue our reputation from the seeming oblivion into which it has fallen.

THE ALUMNUS AND ALMA MATER.

It is strange how nearly alike are the fundamental questions which present themselves to men educated or uneducated and which equally demand an answer. What to do, or, if that has been settled satisfactorily, how to do it, are the questions which force themselves alike upon the one as he steps from the Commencement platform and upon the other as he steps from his father's door a man. But for the college man there is another to be met, whether he will or not, and that is the question of the relationship that shall exist between him and his alma mater. There are three possible positions which he can take: one of neutrality, one of indifference or one of activity. Few if any ever maintain a strictly neutral position, though occasionally some approach so near that the effect is about the same. And those who do so are not only unworthy of their college but of their race, for ungratefulness is hardly a trait of animals much less of men. Many are indifferent, that is to say they make the needs of their schools secondary matters. They indeed take a mean between two extremes, but this mean is an exception to the almost universal rule of Horace. They work considerable good in spite of their indifference and, now and then, arouse themselves to surprising states of enthusiasm. But theirs was a position in vogue when the world was set to a slower pace and is not to be considered for a moment by the active energetic man of the coming century. There remains the other extreme, the position of activity, which all ought to take and which the majority do take, and in either case not without reason. The man who has been well equipped for the arena of life and armed with weapons that grow keener with age and use, owes a debt to his benefactress such as only the service of a lifetime can repay. If he happens to look at it in that way, he can only maintain a position of whole-souled activity toward his alma mater, and if he is too matter of fact to look at it in such a light, he can yet see that it is to his interest as well as to his school's that this same relation be kept up between them. A college is never too great to be affected by the efforts of an alumnus, or too small, too poor, to exert some influence for his benefit. The relation which exists between them is at all times one of reciprocity. As the alumnus gives, so he receives; not measure for measure but four-fold. It need not be legacies or libraries; it may with better effect be service, influence and action. The man who leaves his college without the sense of his duty toward her, and with no notion that their interests are one, has failed to develop one of the necessary principles of a successful career.

Literary.

THE RIVAL FRIENDS.

I was revisiting my alma mater. The years after graduation had been full of life's duties, and it had been long since the familiar scenes had greeted my eyes. I took time to linger a few days after Commencement, and wandered up the hill one evening in a thoughtful, retrospective mood.

The day was dying. Down on the river the soft, red light was reflected from the faintly rolling surface. To the southwest, the horizon was tinged with a reddish gold that faded slowly, indistinctly, into the darkening sky. I took my seat where the view of the river was good, and, leaning against a broad tree, mused.

How often my old friend and I had sat there in the dear school days and dreamed of the future, looking down the placid waters till they were lost, apparently, at the foot of far Blue Hill. There is a friendship between young men that approaches the love that poets sing of between man and maid. Such a friendship existed between Will and me. Our lives had grown together; our love did not come all at once but gradually, and deepened and strengthened until he had told me all the history of his life, and I had told him all mine. Sometimes we sat hand in hand, as two lovers might, and he told me of his father's love and friendship to his son and of the gap in his life yet unfilled because the father came in no more. And I told him of the longing that so often filled my heart to show my mother how much more of a man I was—how I was even fulfilling her fond prophecies which, while looking with pleasure at their fulfilment, she told me she would never live to behold with mortal eyes. So many things I had to talk with her about which only a mother's ear can hear and not call egotistical. We were bound thus close together by mutual love. Our love affairs—simple tales—neither of us had ever been genuinely in love—were all made known.

Then came a new experience. A young lady entered the college and joined my friend's class. She was charming, though not beautiful, cultured, refined, amiable, an excellent conversationalist, always gracious, and one of the best in the class. Will began to pay her attentions. They met often, reciting together in many classes, and I encouraged the friendship. He confided all to me from the beginning. and while I made great sport of him and accused him of being love-sick and that I was jealous, yet did all I could to bring the two together. I had no forebodings, then, of what my good intentions were to bring to pass.

The spring time came, and with it the arbutus and boating parties, picnics, and almost weekly outings, together with the many entertainments of the Institute and College. I strayed hither and thither, but always went with some lady who would be particularly agreeable to Will's friend, Miss Frances Bacon. I sought in every way to bring him out to his best in her presence, and found him always ready to respond. We had little select excursions, when quiet reading was done, and separate walks after the reading was over, when "two was company."

He found her companionship growing more and more delightful. And I in sympathy with my friend's devotion regarded her with increasing favor. One day he was unexpectedly called away on urgent business. He asked me if I had an engagement for the concert the following evening, and if I did not that I should take his tickets and see Miss Bacon safely there. To oblige him and to assure myself of a pleasant evening, I accepted the offer, and found Miss Bacon willing to go with Will's substitute.

He was gone some days longer than he had anticipated and Miss Bacon and I had opportunity frequently to be together. Slowly, imperceptibly almost, I began to feel that she had a great power over me. I longed to be near her and was happy in her presence. My chum's absence did not trouble. He was not forgotten, but I did not miss him so much as formerly.

At last a letter came announcing his return next day. Instead of being glad, a strange, unwelcome feeling stole over me. For the first time I realized that I was in love with Miss Bacon. The thought brought pain. We two loved the same woman. Just before he had gone away, he had plainly revealed to me that his whole heart was hers. And now—how shall I greet him? I felt that I could not meet him without deceit. In love—in love with another man's love! The difficulty burst upon me all at once. Our friendship must cease. We are rivals—and I am at fault! He has confided everything to me, and I have betrayed his sacred trust. God pity him, and pity me! What is to be done? Shall I tell him all, or conceal it? To tell him is to take the heart out of his life. To find that the friend whom he has trusted so implicitly has proved false—the thought is too painful. Yet that is what I have done. No, I cannot tell him! He must know nothing of my secret. He will come, greet me with open heart and happy words and I "must act well my part." Can I do it? It must be done. He will marry the woman I love. And I must be happy in his happiness—that I cannot be. The day of being happy in my friend's happiness is past, but he shall never know.

But what if she does not love him and refuses? A few hours before, such a thought would not have entered my mind. Now, in the mental struggle, the possibilities began to come up thick and fast. If she refused him, the way would be open to me. Certainly. But—but—he would then know all—all my falsity to him—I would be accused of stealing his love from him. I could not endure that. I could not lose the love of my friend. On the other hand, whose fault is it that I love her? Love is spontaneous. We cannot account for it. I had not deliberately planned his disappointment to the building up of my own happiness, and I could not help falling in love with her. Then, too, he has no more right to her hand than I have. He cannot say: "She is mine; you have no right to her hand." Why not go immediately and settle the matter? If she loves him, she will refuse me; if she lovesme—then when Will comes back and discovers,—I would have to tell him, for it would be the acme of cruelty to let him propose to her. And once I tell him, our friendship is at an end. That is clear. Which do I love the more, Will or Frances? But I love them both. Why has it ever happened? It is to lose one or the other, or maybe both. If she accepts him I shall be angry at her—and at him, too, for taking the woman I cannot possess, friend though he has been to me—the dearest friend I have ever had.

I went to bed, but sleep would not come. The round of consequences arising from this or that ground of reasoning went on, always bringing me back to the starting point—I must lose one or the other, and if I do not win her I must lose both.

When he comes back, he will begin talking of Miss Bacon, and what can I say to him? The very subject nearest to my heart I cannot discuss with the friend whom I prize above all my friends. Interminable problems and difficulties arose for solution. As to my course of conduct, I could come to no definite conclusion. The morrow and its events would soon be upon me, and where should I go to escape the consequences of their outcome.

Weary, heavy hearted, I dragged myself through the morning recitation. After it, Miss Bacon stopped me in the hall for a moment. She looked at me closely, and inquired if I were unwell. I laughed (I must practice acting to be ready for Will.), and said that I never felt better in my life,—and her very presence did revive me wonderfully—that I had been up late the night before, and perhaps the loss of sleep had made me look a little haggard; it nearly always had that effect upon me. She seemed satisfied with the explanation, and said that I must come to see her immediately after dinner; that she had something important to tell me, and wanted me to help her in making some plans.

What could it be? Has Will written his proposal? The foolish thought was banished in a moment. But what could it be? It must be something about him. I dreaded the call as I dreaded my chum's return, yet longed for it—longed to be near the girl who had made me so unhappy.

The scenes of that morning had passed so vividly before my mind that I almost shuddered in their recollection. A gentle touch on the shoulder surprised and startled me. I turned quickly, and saw the smiling face of Will.

"Unpleasant thoughts, old man?" he said with a half laugh, which would almost indicate that he had been reading my mind. "I saw you sitting here in our old place, and you looked so serious that till you sort of shivered I couldn't bear to intrude upon you. While I stood here leaning against the tree, close to you, my mind went back to that old love affair of ours which, at the time, seemed the saddest thing in our friendship. But, thank God! it came out all right, Harry. And yonder come the girls, Frances and Gertrude. They are beckoning us to join them for a walk. I promised to get you and that we would all four take a stroll down the railroad. It's like old times, my boy! And they look as young and attractive as ever!"

Stirred by his enthusiasm and boyish gaiety, I jumped up and together we raced down the hill. And if my wife wondered why I seemed at times moody, and looked deep into her eyes with loving expression, she attributed it, undoubtedly, to the scene and the old associations. And she was partly right, for the reflections on the hill had shown me conclusively that youth is fitful, first loves sometimes uncertain, and that Frances Bacon's dearest friend was dearer to me than ever Frances Bacon had been.

A STORY OF PIONEER LIFE.

There is nothing, I think, more intensely and peculiarly interesting to a person than some experience out of the ordinary in the life of a friend. The favorite story of my childhood was one told by my grandmother of her own experience in a pioneer settlement in the far west. It had all happened when she was a child, long years before. In her sweet way she always began the story it was my delight to hear again and again, with

"Well, dear child, it is years ago now, and my hair was a sunny brown like yours. My father, your great grandfather, had taken us away out to the Dakotas. The journey took many long weeks. Though I was only a little girl, I remember it well, the weary days of jolting in the wagon, and the nights of fear and watching. The men in our caravan took turns in keeping guard against the wild beasts, and most of all against the wild men. Then came the days when all our food was gone, and I can remember how little John cried and cried, and Mother couldn't stop him. I can remember the men in little groups talking together, and the women crying. I didn't understand much of what was the matter, but only knew I was hungry and tired. Some of the babies died, and we left the little bodies in the woods behind us. Then I remember one morning we came to a few little log houses, and I remember how the men shouted and wept, and some fell on their faces and prayed. I asked my mother what it all meant. She could hardly tell me, her tears were falling so fast; but at length she said, 'O my baby, you will never be hungry again,' and then she bent her dear head on mine, and sobbed great sobs.''

Here my grandmother's eyes would fill with tears, and she would take off her glasses and look far away over the fields. I waited with a child's awe in the presence of sorrow, though I did not understand then that her eyes were looking far back into her young life, and saw nothing in the fields at which she gazed so intently. Presently, however, she would begin again.

''Well, child, I remember nothing very plainly about those first years, except that Father built our little house, and after that he was always burning down the trees and digging us stumps.

The first two years passed without any trouble with the Indians: They were very friendly, and the men in the settlement were careful not to offend them; but one of the settlers, while hunting, accidentally shot and killed an Indian chief, and all the explanation he could make, and all the promises of reparation the men of the settlement made, did not take away the sullen, hateful look from the faces of the tribe.

''One morning in haying-time, I remember it so well, my father said when he rose from the breakfast table, 'Mother, I am going to have all the hay in to-night.' As he turned to kiss her good-by, Little John stretched out his hands in baby fashion, and Father picked him up and whirled him over his head, repeating as he did so the old nursery rhyme, 'Bye-a-baby-bunting, Father is going a-hunting;' and turning to Mother he said, 'Give little John his bonnet, and let him go with me.' Mother reached up to him as he sat on father's shoulder and tied his little pink sunbonnet under his chin. He played hide-and-seek with her in his pretty way, and then she took hold of his bonnet with her two hands and kissed him, and said, 'My big John will take care of little John for Mother, won't he?' and then she turned to her work again.

''The morning wore away, until it was nearly dinner-time. I was sitting outside on the steps, pulling a daisy apart, and repeating to myself the Fates' rhyme, 'One I love, Two I love, Three I love, I say,' when one of the men from the settlement rushed past me up the steps, shouting, 'There isn't a moment to lose! The Indians are on us!'

''My mother snatched my hand and dragged me toward the field where Father was. He saw us and ran to meet us. A word sufficed to explain everything. My Father told us to lie down, and he hastily tossed some of the new mown hay over us. 'Where is little John, my baby John?' my mother cried. Father tried to smile, as he said 'Big John will take care of little John for Mother. There is the well. We will go to that.' Then he covered us over and left us. The well into which he threw a few forkfuls of grass under which he buried himself and Little John, was a well used for the cattle, but the heat of the summer had dried it up. We were hidden none too soon. A wild whoop from the direction of the house told us they had set the house on fire. It was a matter of a very few minutes before they would be in the field where we were. My arms were fast about my mother's neck. I could hardly breathe. I tried to turn, but my mother gripped me with a firm hand. 'Don't move, child! It means death! Pray, oh pray for father and little John!' I tried to pray in my childish way. Then the fiendish howls sounded close to us and closer: they were beside us now. My hand tightened about my mother's neck. A cry was on my lips,—she choked it with her hand. 'Pray for father and little John,' she whispered. A moment only they stayed, and then went on past the well. My mother was praying. Suddenly a shrill 'Mamma!' sounded over the field. It was little John. My mother's hand relaxed its hold of me. Then I heard a wild, bloodcurdling yell, so horrible I shall never forget it. I knew they were at the well, and childlike I still prayed for Father and little John, and I prayed on long after they had gone and the field had become silent. Then I tried softly to rouse my mother, but in vain. I poked a little hole through the grass and drank in a breath of air. Then I grew bolder, when I saw the field was empty, and uncovered my mother's face, and tried again to waken her. I called to Father, but there was no answer. With a nameless fear I ran to the house, thinking he might be there. Beside the still burning timbers stood the man who had brought us the terrible message. I did not question or wonder why he was there, but pulled him frantically toward the field where mother was. He tried to rouse her, and then said in a pitying tone 'Where are your father and little John?' 'In the well,' I said. He took my hand and led me toward the well, only saying, 'We cannot waken your mother, little one.' A few steps, and we were at the well. There was blood on its brink. He pushed me back with his hand as he looked in and then pulled me away, saying, 'Come, poor little one; this is no place for you. God has taken your father and mother and little John to live with Him.' "

And then my dear grandmother would lay down her knitting, and shade her eyes, only saying, "So you see Father took care of little John for Mother, as he promised. Run now and play."

Commencement.

The music for commencement will be exceptionally fine this year. A plan was suggested at the beginning of the last term for this feature of commencement week and as things look now, it will prove a brilliant success. Dr. Aviragnet consulted the graduating class from each department in respect to the amount of money they would expend in music and he was given authority to use it as he saw fit. This arrangement put the music in competent hands and the artists he has secured will, without doubt, add greatly to the pleasures of the week. Among the artists we would make special mention of Miss Alice Woods, a former student in the department of music at the Institute, who has recently completed her education in Germany. Those who were so fortunate as to hear her play at the Soireè, need no further mention than the name to assure them of a treat. Miss Mary Lyle Smith, the world's greatest lady flutist, has been engaged and if we can judge from reports, she will certainly prove an attraction to the lover of music. There will also be cornet and clarinet soloists present. Saks full orchestra will be here during the week and the University Band will furnish street music.

The Seniors will wear the conventional cap and gown at commencement exercise.

Neither the graduating class of the College nor the graduating class of the Institute will hold class-day exercises.

Room No.2, college building, will be fitted up as a general reception room during commencement. All visitors are cordially invited to register in the book provided for that purpose. Writing, mailing, and messenger facilities will be provided, and all mail sent in care of the Registrar will be promptly delivered.

It is the duty of every commencement visitor to aid the various publications of the College by subscribing. The Commencement News is essential to every person who is here. The MIRROR has grown to be one of the best papers published in the college world. Subscribe for a year. L'Agenda is especially attractive this year. It is full of fine cuts and half-tones and is handsomely bound. You cannot do without it.

Upon application to the Registrar, Card Orders for Excursion Rates on the following roads good for nine days, will be furnished: The Pennsylvania System; Philadelphia and Erie; Northern Central; Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore; West Jersey; United R. R. of N. J.; Camden and Atlantic; The Philadelphia and Reading Railroad, including the Main line and Williamsport Division and the Beech Creek Railroad; Central Railroad of New Jersey, and the Lehigh Valley Railroad.

By special arrangement, good board can be had at private boarding houses from $1.00 to $1.50 per day. Hotel rates, $2.00 per day. Special information concerning accommodations will be furnished on application to the Registrar.

The staff of this year's Commencement News will be composed of the following persons: H. S. Schuyler, '95, Editor-in-Chief; Associates, G. C. L. Riemer, '95, W. B. Sheddan, '95, J. C. Carey, '95, H. H. Bower, '96, J. B. Suiter, '96, L. C. Walkinshaw, '96, A. O. Miller, '97, F. W. Dillon, '97, J. Brown Martin, '98, Jennie A. Davis, Inst. '95, C. W. Harvey, Acad. '95. The Journal office will have charge of its publication. It will contain the Baccalaureate sermon, sermon before the Education Society, oration before the Literary Societies, Alumni oration and poem, complete accounts of the commencement exercises of the school of Music, Academy, Institute and College, and everything else of interest that takes place during commencement week. The Spectator has kindly consented to try his hand again at touching up the faults and follies of some of the erring brethren. The management of the News will be in the hands of Mr. S. G. Palmer. The price of the four issues will be fifteen cents, single copies five cents.

Athletics.

May 26 was another ill-starred day for our base-ball team, when they played Dickinson Seminary of Williamsport. The game was very interesting, the seminary team being composed of some professional material. While our boys hit the ball hard and often, the opposing team succeeded in getting seven more hits than we did and therein lies the defeat. With one exception our team played a winning uphill game. The hospitality shown our team deserves an expression of thanks, and shows the good feeling that exists between the two institutions.

Following is the score:

The fates seem to decree that Bucknell must win at least one game in a season. This happy event occurred on Decoration Day, when Bucknell defeated Watsontown in a five inning game by the score of 22–7. The feature of the game was Bucknell's batting streak, which was scarcely interrupted from the moment play was called to the time when it was stopped.

Watsontown tried three pitchers and all met with the same reception. The first one to fall was the mighty Weidenhammer who was hammered all over the field. Owing to the intense heat the game was very slow.

The afternoon game was played at Watsontown. Our boys lost because not a man was in condition to play owing to the intense heat and to the effects of the morning game. Watsontown's second team was mostly composed of fresh players. The score in the afternoon stood 8–11.

Following is the morning score:

Two base hit, Mulkie, Grim, Cregar, McCullon. Three base hit, Carey. Home run, Cregar. Struck out by Geary 5, by W'hamer 1. Umpires, Marsh and Shorkley.

Our record in base-ball this year is not an envious one, but the material on hand for next season is all that can be desired.

The second team, under the captaincy of Purdy, played two games with the strong Shamokin team. The morning game resulted in a victory for Shamokin. Score, 16–1. Score in afternoon, 23–8, favor of Shamokin.

Local.

It is hot! 95° in the shade.

F. W. Wagner passed several days in Middleburg a short time ago.

T. Reber Taggart visited old acquaitances in Selinsgrove on the 25th and 26th of May. He reports a very enjoyable trip.

Harlan, one of the famous "Heavenly Twins," says, It snowed on Decoration Day. T'other Twin says, One more frost and the chestnuts will be ripe.

Smith '95, has accepted a position as instructor at Keystone Academy, Factoryville, Pa.

Kauffman '95, has been call to the chair of Science at the Bordentown Military Institute.

Allen, Simpson and W. C. Purdy assisted in the Children's Day exercises at the Milton Baptist church, on Sunday, June 1.

H. M. Pease '95, has accepted the call to the pastorate of the Eatonville Baptist church, and will enter upon his duties on June 23.

Dr. Marshall of Chicago, who delivered a lecture on "Foreign Missions" at the Methodist Church, led Chapel on the morning of the 31st of May.

A city bred student whilst strolling down the railroad with some friends saw a "Willie" goat browsing among some cows and remarked,—"What a cute little calf that is!"

J. A. Yoder of '96, is away from College at present on account of the death of his father. The students sympathize with him in his affliction and take this means of expressing their condolence.

The Senior Class has completed the course in Theism; having taken the examination on the 29th ult. There is no regular senior vacation this year, and as a result, no Class Day exercises.

A bearded youth (?) after hearing the statement made that Miss S— was a very fine girl, answered in the affirmative; then, placing his hand on his heart and looking heavenward, he continued, "Yes, and I hope some day to call her Mrs. M—."

Although the Bucknell students, especially those in East Wing, are not noted for early rising, yet on the morning of May 30, they distinguished themselves in that line. For further information see Hall, the Photographer. It is a great picture and you can't afford to be without one.

Dr. Lincoln Hulley will deliver a lecture-reading on James Whitcomb Riley at Bucknell Hall on Thursday Evening, June 6. Dr. Hulley will also deliver the same lecture before the students of Perkiomen Seminary on Wednesday June 12. The proceeds of the lecture in Bucknell Hall will go to the Northfield Fund of the Y. M. C. A.

The anarchists are among us. They made an attempt to blow up Benjamin Meade Wagenseller "Junior," on the night of May 27. We do not know why they singled him out, but suppose it was an attempt to capture the oration which he had carefully prepared for Commencement, or to steal those locks of his for a hair mattress.

Montour Mountain is becoming a popular resort for picnic parties. Messrs. Allen, Pease, and Slifer with ladies, spent Decoration Day among the stones on the western slope of the hill. They report a very pleasant time, yet think the atmosphere was uncomfortably hot. On Saturday, June 1, Miss Armitage chaperoned a party of College men and Institute girls, but they could not go farther than the foot of the mountain on account of the excessive heat.

Decoration Day was appropriately observed in Lewisburg, quite a large crowd having gathered in from the surrounding country. Bucknell, as usual, figured largely in the day's proceedings. The 'Varsity Band led the procession and covered themselves with glory as well as dust. Dr. Perrine delivered a masterly oration before the G. A. R. and their friends in the Opera House. It has been pronounced the finest Memorial address ever heard here. All the town papers printed the address as delivered and give it much merited praise.

The annual exhibition of the Junior Class took place on Friday evening, May 24. The exercises were opened with a selection by the 'Varsity Band, which was followed by a prayer by Dr. Harris. After the Mandolin and Guitar Club had rendered one of their choice selections, the speakers, seven in number, delivered their orations. In order of speaking the members of the Class chosen for the occasion were, Hall, Powell, Davis, Miss Wolfe, Rohland, Reynolds, and Harris. As a whole, the orations were fine productions and showed considerable thought and study. An effort was made by the speakers to say something practical and as such deserve much praise.

On the evening of May 31, the board of editors and managers were very kindly entertained at the home of the publisher of the MIRROR, Mr. J. W. C. Shamp. After spending a short time in conversation they were invited into the dining room where they did ample justice to the following menu:

First Course.
Vegetable Soup.
Second Course.
Chicken and Waffle.
Third Course.
Codfish Cake, Rusk, Lettuce.
Fourth Course.
Curtard Pie, Lemon Custard.
Fifth Course.
Strawberries, Ice Cream, Cake.

Mr. H. S. Schuyler, Ex-Editor-in-Chief, acted as toast master and the following toasts were responded to in a genial manner: "The Ladies," A. W. Johnson; "Base-ball," D. S. Grim; "Our Absent Brethren," J. W. Davis; "Editorial Work," F. W. Jackson; "A Snake Story," J. B. Suiter; "The Ladies of the Staff," B. F. Thomas; "A Fish Story" A. G. Loomis; "The Publisher," J. E. Saul; "How to Find One's Self," S. G. Palmer.

A vote of thanks was tendered Mr. Shamp for his courtesies and then the boys withdrew feeling that they had spent a very enjoyable evening.

On Tuesday afternoon, May 28, the long deferred game of basket-ball between the Sophomores and Freshmen was played in the Gymnasium. On the Sophomore team were several men whose function it was to introduce foot-ball practices into the game and disable Freshmen; these players caused much delay in the game by oft repeated fouling. The Sophomores manifested great affection for the ball and hugged it tightly; one man was threatened with disqualification for his next offence. Their amativeness took a turn, and Freshmen necks were treated with bear-like hugs which would have been debarred even from foot-ball or wrestling.

In the first half the ball was mostly in the territory of '98 and it was clearly evident that the Freshmen were not playing their hardest game. Several throws were made for '98's goal, and in one of these, by the kindly interference of a banner hung over the goal, the ball dropped into the basket. Miller made the throw. The ball was now rapidly worked down to the Sophomore goal and Hill made a good clean throw for the basket and was successful in scoring for '98.

Time was called and the game stood 1-1 in favor of the Bucknell banner.

In the second half Sinton played Grim's position on the Sophomore team, and Lindemann took Downing's place; with the Freshmen. In this half a more scientific and open game was played, yet fouls were too numerous. The Freshmen played a hard game and the ball was kept near '97's goal. Time was nearly up and the score was still even when Lindemann threw a goal and broke the tie.

In the second half Bunnell was injured and Grim took his place; this was against the rules but was made necessary by the scarcity of Sophomoric "subs." The Freshmen made at least 20 clean passes in which the ball was not touched by an opponent. The officials were: Brick '95 and Harper '96.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

The Institute Alumnae have arranged a special program for the public meeting on Monday afternoon of commencement week. The speaker of the day will be Miss Cara Reese, of the Pittsburg Dispatch.

In order to add to the funds of the Christian Association, Dr. Aviragnet gave a Cantata, "The Twin Sisters" on May 18. It was the unanimous opinion that this was one of the best musical entertainments given during the year. The proceeds netted about eighteen dollars.

On Friday evening, May 17, Mrs. Larison entertained the graduating classes of the College and Institute, together with the Faculty of the University. The reception was a pleasant one in every respect, giving the Faculty and students the much appreciated opportunity of meeting socially.

At the May meeting of the Lewisburg Alumnae Club, Mrs. D. B. Miller gave an excellent paper on the political events of the month, and Mrs. Lincoln Hulley a most interesting account of the literary events. Mrs. Martha E. Wolfe presented, in a very humorous way, legal eccentricities. Different members of the Club then discussed social eccentricities; and some pithy anecdotes were told illustrative of this subject. The evening closed with an exercise of extemporaneous verse-making,—more laughable than classic.

On Sunday afternoon, May 26, the final Program Meeting of the year was held in the interest of the Y. W. C. A. The theme being "Flowers," the parlor was brightened by appropiate decorations. Standard writers gave us their best thoughts on Flowers. These selections together with the vocal music breathed the spirit of the sweet floral theme.

ACADEMIC NEWS.

Where was Sherman when the lights went out?

Perrin has made up his Second Form Declamations.

Powell and Brady may be seen on the tennis courts daily.

The Fourth Form gets a week's vacation before Commencement this year.

Sherman's definition of a number—the concrete idea of an abstract quality.

The debate which was to take place this term between the Hermenia and Adelphia Literary Societies has been postponed.

At the last meeting of the Athletic Association, Prof. Phillips and Prof. Fisher were chosen to represent the Academy in the tennis tournament.

Thursday evening, May 23, the Fourth Form was tendered a reception by Dr. and Mrs. Harris. The evening was very pleasantly passed by all;—the hour for departing coming all too soon.

On Saturday, May 25, the Fourth Form defeated the Third Form in a game of base-ball to the tune of 26-12. The battery for the Fourth Form was Hutchinson and Freudenberger, and for the Third Form Cooper and Sherman. Several pretty plays were made. Freudenberger made a home run.

The Fourth Form was again tendered a reception, Thursday evening, May 30, by Prof. and Mrs. Edwards. One of the chief features of the evening was the solving of thirty-one conundrums comprising "A Floral Love Tale." After refreshments were served, Miss Emma Seiler was announced the winner of the prize having but five incorrect answers. Music was furnished by the University Mandolin and Guitar Club. All were well pleased with the evening's entertainment and it was with reluctance that the guests took their departure.

Editorial.

AGAIN it is the duty of the editor to say adieu to his chair and to pass from the arena. This is the last appearance of the MIRROR under the present staff. As a board, we have been most harmonious; every man working to the best of his ability to make our paper as good as the best in the college world. If we have failed in this we have missed our mark. But we are satisfied that the MIRROR stands to-day among the leaders in the college world in literary merit. We do not claim that the success had been alone due to the vigilance and energy of the board, for we realize too well that without the support of the student body no college paper can approach perfection; and we take this opportunity to express our appreciation of the hearty co-operation of both the professors and students in their criticisms as well as their contributions. If the work has been tedious at times, at others it has been most fascinating and pleasant. It is to be expected that we have made mistakes at times; but our friends and contemporaries have been most patient and lenient. We trust that those who follow us next year may be most talented and that each man elected to an editorship may find his proper place in the organization.

THE YEAR 1894-95.

The Board of Trustees suffered severe losses by death during the past five years until in 1894 there were eight vacancies. The filling of these was a subject of much thought and care upon the part of the Board, as the manner in which they were filled would have great, if not decisive influence upon the future of the Institution. There were elected to membership in the Board, of Dr. E. C. Jayne, of Philadelphia, Hon. Charles Miller, of Franklin, Calvin Greene, Esq., of Saltillo, John P. Crozer, Esq., of Chester, Hiram E. Deats, Esq., of Flemington, N. J., E. L. Tustin, Esq., of Philadelphia, and George M. Philips, Ph. D., of West Chester, who was recommended to the Board by the Alumni. While rejoicing in this great increase in the strength and efficiency of the Board, we are called to mourn the loss of one of its most devoted and useful members, Alfred Taylor, Esq., of New York city.

The curricula were revised in 1889, and the class of 1894 was the first to take the revised courses. There have been many additions to the curricula since, and some modifications, though the frame work remains unchanged. The additions have not been mere catalogue offers. The present year forty-four required courses have been given, thirty-seven elective courses, nineteen honor courses, and twelve lecture courses of one hour a week The system has greatly increased the interest of the students in their work, and has nearly doubled the amount of work done.

The removal of the family of a member of the class of '95 to New Haven, and the consequent application for admission to Yale brought to the attention of the public what before was not so well known, that in the last five years the requirements for admission to Bucknell and the courses of study have been brought up to a level with Yale. After careful comparison of courses, and testing of the quality of the work done here, Mr. E. G. Kendall was admitted into the Senior class at Yale without conditions.

The enlargement of the curriculum has become possible only through the increased attendance of students. In 1890, there were seventy-one students in the college, and that was the usual number previously. This rose to one hundred and three in 1891, and to one hundred and seventy-three in 1895. There is every reason to expect a large Freshman class next year, larger than any hitherto. This increased attendance is due chiefly to the friendly relations cultivated between Bucknell and the various academies, high schools and normal schools. Kindness and interest in these schools on the part of the college professors beget good-will in return. The attendance has now about reached the limit of accommodation, with present facilities and an advance in the near future must be made. There will be needed $100,000 for new buildings and improvement of the existing ones.

The appointment of a regular librarian, skilled and enthusiastic in his work has more than doubled the value of that department to the University. The books already owned have been made accessible, sets have been completed, and many new works of value added.

In the Academy the number of students has increased from seventy-five last year to ninety-five this year. Principal Edward, by his firm, but kind, discipline, by his interest in the personal welfare of the students, and by his thorough teaching and tactful management, has more than met the high expectations entertained of him.

The Institute for ladies has advanced beyond its former high standard. An increasing numner of young ladies are taking the Classical Course.

The School of Music under the care of Dr. Aviragnet whose enthusiasm and energy years seem to increase, has made large advances. The department of pipe-organ recently added has proved popular, and has attained great efficiency.

Taking the year as a whole whether we consider the size and quality of the graduating classes, the number of students in attendance, the interest in study, the growing tide of enthusiasm for the schools throughout the state and country, no year in the history of Bucknell shows in a higher light than the one now closing.

ELOQUENT ORATION.

Personal Recollections of Abraham Lincoln.

HON. JOHN H. LITTLEFIELD, of Brooklyn, N. Y., Addressed the Literary Societies, in Commencement Hall, Monday evening.

No character in modern history possesses the human interest of Abraham Lincoln. As the years go by his fame increases, his statesmanship gains for him increased admiration, and his broad humanitarian spirit awakens a deeper sentiment in the breasts of his countrymen. The orator of the evening spoke from personal contact with Mr. Lincoln. After a reference to the condition of the country before the war, Mr. Littlefield proceeded to consider some of the salient characteristics of Mr. Lincoln as follows:

"Born in a slave State, reared in a free State, of good stock, of rare qualities of head and heart, it seemed that Heaven had called him to be a chosen leader of his people. With scanty education, without wealth or rank in society, with no influential friends, he is to make his way in the world. Learning his humble lesson by the light of a pine knot (and on one occasion going miles on foot to borrow a book, and working days for its owner because a drenching storm soiled its pages) clearly revealed an essential quality of the future statesman, Abraham Lincoln. The circumstances that surrounded him were well calculated to develop self-reliance. Books were rare and schools were almost unknown in the State of Indiana at the time of his boyhood. If circumstances do not make, they shape and develop the man. Lincoln inherited a deep religious nature, a sound body, a mind clear and strong, a heart tender and sad, and a will firm in the right as God gave him to see the right. It may be asked, Was Mr. Lincoln's success the result of fortunes or did he achieve success? Was he taken from the people by accident? Did some enthusiastic friend merely announce his name to the Chicago convention, and did the people, suddenly smitten with love, proclaim him their champion? His early struggle with Blackstone and Euclid confirmed his rare qualities of logic and condensation of statement. His success is no mystery; no polished courtier, cradled in luxury or surrounded by idle flatterers; no Alexander, with a kingly father to procure an Aristotle or a Diogenes to shape his youthful mind; no flattering qualities to dazzle the multitude, but a plain, honest, homely, thoughtful man—a man for the hour, for all time. His success was the happy combination of his reason, his conscience, his kindness of heart, power of illustration, love of country and humanity, together with a capacity to call up his latent energies for a concentrated, protracted effort. His logic was a habit of his mind. I know of no statesman or public man, whose recorded speeches and State papers approach so nearly to mathematical demonstration. He could not make a speech without saying something. If Mr. Lincoln were to be judged by impromptu efforts, or such speeches as he made on his way to Washington prior to his inauguration as President, full justice would not be done to his acknowledged abilities. He needed time for preparation. He spoke with a certain deliberation, in an earnest, impressive manner. He more closely resembled Demosthenes than any other of the great models of antiquity in the sententious brevity of his language, elevation of his sentiments and the resistless force of his logic."

Mr. Littlefield described the campaign between Lincoln and Stephen A. Douglas for the Senatorship from Illinois and then proceeded to consider Mr. Lincoln's legal qualities. "As a lawyer he was equally successful before judge and jury. Strictly speaking, he was what is usually termed a 'case' lawyer. While he was familiar with the principles of his profession, yet he did not depend upon his stores of legal lore, but faithfully looked up the facts of each case. He usually contented himself with one or two strong positions, and grouping the facts around them, depended upon the strength of the assault or defense rather than weakening his efforts by a too minute and diffuse representation of his subject. He generally occupied less time than most lawyers in his legal efforts."

The lecturer said that the first time he saw Mr. Lincoln was at Springfield, Illinois, in February, 1859, when he entered his office as a law student. "I had never seen him before," said Mr Littlefield," nor had I even heard or read a description of his personal appearance. At first, I must confess, my hero did not fill out the beautiful proportions sketched in my imagination. He seemed remarkably tall, was absorbed in thought and was walking with long strides leading his boy Tad by the hand. Mr. Lincoln had on, as usual, a large hat which bore down upon his remarkably large ears, and made them appear larger than common.

Mr. Lincoln was six feet three and a quarter inches high, with limbs disproportionately long, a little stoop shouldered, rather thin through the chest, head of full size, high and long, but not broad, his brows were shaggy, and projecting, and, in speaking, he raised the right more than the left one. His hair was coarse and unmanageable, his forehead retreated, but was full in the center, his eyes were of a bluish gray color, deep set, and the upper lids broad and drooping. The cavernous appearance of his eyes, together with the strong lines under them, lent additional force to the habitually melancholy expression of his face."

Mr. Littlefield next spoke of the kindly and sterling qualities of Mr. Lincoln in his private life; of his homely habits and tastes, and his dry quaint humor; of his temperance and religious scruples; of his entrance upon the arduous labors for the salvation of the nation in its hours of greatest peril; of his promptitude and accuracy in the dispatch of public business and his firmness during the darkest days of the rebellion. The speaker referred to Mr. Lincoln's love for story-telling, and repeated some of the dead patriots' best anecdotes to the great amusement of the audience. He then gave a stirring description of the closing hours of the war, and vividly pictured the assassination of the President and the consequent sorrow of the nation.

In conclusion he said: "A poor unlearned lad lay one night on the bottom of a flat-boat floating down the Father of Waters, gazing at the stars and wondering what might be his fortune in the long years to come. Suppose at this time he had been foretold that some day he would become a distinguished lawyer; that he would enter the political arena and become the acknowledged leader of the Whig party in the State of Illinois; that his party should be brushed away as a spider's web by the hand of a giant; that the Republican party should rise from its ruins, and after years of conflict, elevate him to the Presidency; that as soon as he should become inaugurated a great war would break out and rage with terrible fury for four long years; that during this time, as commander-in-chief, he would strike off the chains of four million slaves; that these same slaves would become soldiers—fight for the Union and enjoy the rights of American citizens; that as soon as peace should become established he himself would be taken off by the hands of an assassin; would be mourned by all people as a martyr—if all this had been told him he doubtless would have passed it by as an idle dream. Truth, indeed, is stranger than fiction. Such a dream was more than realized in the life of Abraham Lincoln. He found a nation with its life endangered, its credit impaired, its army useless, its navy scattered, its arms stolen, its officers traitors, its forts captured, the South in arms against the Union, North divided in councils, the Capitol besieged, traitors in every department of the Government, his own life imperiled, a race in chains. He left an immortal record; a character above reproach; a race forever free; a nation united, purified, exalted. Patriot, statesman and martyr, hail and farewell! Thy words of cheer have crossed the Alps and thy image hangs securely amid the Ural mountains. The whole civilized world has been moved by thy life and thy utterances. Thy fame shall grow brighter and brighter while life, love and libert endure."

THE ALUMNI POEM.

The College Bred Man.

By Rev. T. M. Eastwood, '72, of Albany, New York.

Say boys, I was put in a terrible plight
By that vote one year ago,
Which with malice aforethought picked me out,
To bring a rhyme or so;
Just how to get even I wondered long,
And tried earth and Heaven to scan,
'Till at last I concluded to sing you a strain
Concerning the "College Bred Man."

Now the college man is a wonderful man,
As every one present must know,—
The very quintessence of everything grand,
The Acme of things below.
He's a light-house bright on a stormy main,
A beacon from distant shore,
A rainbow grand in a summer sky
And a jewel forevermore.

It used to be thought that the good for nought youth
Who was lacking in pluck and heart
Was the fittest of all for the college life,
And to learn scholastic art.
That time has departed, for everywhere now
Alma mater claims the man
In whose veins the blood of a conqueror runs,
High aims and a definite plan.

He's the pick of the mill, the bank and the store;—
The choice of the flowering life;
A youth of the purest and noblest ideals
In whom ambition is rife.
With eye on the future and heart in the fray
Assured that "Knowledge is Power,"
He seeks to secure a well disciplined mind,
And store it with wisdoms' rich dower.

He's a lover of sport in the open field,
The diamond's the pride of his life.
At tennis he plays with a hearty good will,
And foot-ball's glorious strife;
O'er the river he skims in a dainty shell
On bicycle wheel he flies,
He's an athlete strong in gymnasium halls
A pedestrain too when he tries.

His pranks, they affirm, are a little bit wild,
At least now are said to be so
By those who've been ducked in the river to cool,
Or tumbled in wintry snow.
A relic is this of the far away past
A joy to return no more,
For the greatest instructors now solemnly say
That barbarous hazing is o'er.

The college in session he quickens his mind,
Improving the days of youth;
Over tomes of deep learning he solemnly pores,
And drinks from the fountains of truth.
In his Greek and his Latin he carefully reads,
Mathematics conquers galore;
While logic's an exquisite pleasure so sweet
That physics' a Bete Noir.

He may not remember whatever he learns.
(That's but a trifling affair!).
The process of discipline's what he requires,
Not the knowledge he can air;
The application he gives to the work he does,
Is more than figures or facts,
Persistent endeavor the way to secure
Transmuting of thoughts into acts.

When in need of a friend he's the man to find,
For noble he is and true,
No kindness received he can ever forget
Nor fellows who pull him through,
He notes at a glance the wink of an eye,
Interprets a sign or nudge;
And of everything great and noble and high,
He's the very best kind of a judge.

You think him conceited, 'tis all a mistake,
He's only conscious of power;
Aware that the world is awaiting the touch
Of the man who fits the hour.
His corners are rubbed until perfectly round,
His character tested too,
And what you mistake for form of conceit,
Is high manhood shining through.

At last, graduation, What happiness then ?
The platfiorm he strides a king;
The goal has been gained for which he has fought,
His heart so glad, it can sing.
Oration now spoken he bows his adieu,
The study of years is o'er,
His face to the future he hopefully turns,
And walks hales of learning no more.

The college behind him, his life's but begun,
In patience he seeks the place
Where the brain and the brawn his turning has given,
A prize may win in the race.
He toils and he struggles and battles for years,
Never discouraged is he,
He knows that though mountains may reach to the stars,
Their peaks yet ascended may be.

And so you will find him all over the world
A toiling with right good will.
And there's never a place that he fails to grace,
Nor sphere that he cannot fill.
In his home, he's a gentleman kind and true,
A citizen, pure and grand,
And wherever there's work for the right to do,
He's ready with heart and hand.

He's the man for a preacher, doctor too,
A wise attorney-at-law,
A magnificent man in the business world,
An orator sure to draw.
A leader in politics manly and brave,
A soldier true and bold,
A farmer who gathers the ripening grain.
And a statesman too, I am told.

They say a new woman is coming along,
And nowhere a man to mate,
And that wonderful progress of the fair
Has decreed a single state;
There's never a woman unfettered, free,
Who can ever soar so high,
But will find at her side the college bred man,
As she rises toward the sky.

Then here's to the health of the college bred man,
The teacher who gives his dower
To the lectures and books, the studies and games,
And all his sources of power.
To the God who has made him a leader of men,
And sends him equipped for the fray,
The college that trains him to be what he is,
The king among men of to-day.

Say fellows, don't tell what I'm telling you now,
A secret intended for you,
A fact none the less if the secret gets out
And told the whole nation through.
The glorious present with all its high hopes,
And the future's perfect plan,
The most wonderful prospects however sublime,
Are for you, O college bred man.

CLOSING EXERCISES

Of the Class of '95 held on Wednesday Morning.

AWARDING OF THE PRIZES.

Spirited Contest for the Gold Watch—Twenty Five Graduates.

The exercises of the forty-fifth annual commencement of the college occurred Wednesday morning. Twenty-five young men and women appeared on the stage at 9 o'clock, dressed in the classic cap and gown. Meanwhile a large and appreciative audience had gathered to listen to the orators of the day. Music of a superior character was rendered by Sak's Orchestra of Milton, Miss Alice Woods, of Williamsport, and Miss May Lyle Smith, of New York city. The names and addresses of those who graduated are as follows: Ezra Allen, Coudersport; Benjamin Kane Brick, Marlton, N. J.; Joseph Caldwell Carey, Glen Loch; William Henderson Carey, Glen Loch; Minnie Cotton, Lewisburg; William Anderson Crawford, De Lancey; Peter Bodine Cregar, Annandale, N. J.; Nelson Fithian Davis, Bridgeton. N. J.; Thomas Carson Hanna, Pottsville; William Theophilus Harris, Frankford; Frank Watterson Jackson, Ohiopyle; William Albert Kauffman, Strode's Mills; Andrew Gregg Loomis, Lewisburg; Kate Irene McLaughlin, Lewisburg; William Theodore Paulin, Jr., Philadelphia; Herbert Moxley Pease, Jackson; Cora Reiff Perry, Eagleville; David Phillips, Plymouth; Leo Guido Charles Riemer, Brookston; Herbert Spencer Schuyler, Turbotville; William Boyd Sheddan, Pottsgrove; Franklin Isaac Sigmund, Philadelphia; Frank Morton Simpson, Clifford; Bromley Smith, Wilkes-Barre; Benjamin Meade Wagenseller, Selinsgrove.

Ten members of the class delivered orations. Each production was of a high character, and the author of it was chosen to speak on the score of scholarship. The following program was rendered:

Address to Graduating Class.............Rev. Lemuel Moss, D. D.
Awarding of Prizes and Conferring of Degrees.
Benediction.
Music...Sak's Orchestra.

Rev. Dr. Moss was then introduced. His address was of great value to all, was delivered in an attractive manner and as the fruit of his own life work.

The prize winners were announced as follows:

The President's prizes for excellence in Psychology were awarded first to G. C. L. Riemer; second, H. S. Schuyler.

The Chemistry prize was given to H. S. Schuyler.

S. R. Wood received the first, and D. E. Lewis, the second prize in the Junior Debate.

Miss Mary M. Wolfe won the Registrar's prize in Junior oratory.

In the Sophomore class, Miss Maude E. Hanna was awarded the essay prize, and F. F. Nelson the prize for Declamation.

C. B. Lindemann was given the three Freshman prizes, namely: essay, declamation, and prize for the best preparation in Latin and Mathematics.

The gold watch given to that member of the graduating class who shall pronounce the best oration on Commencement day, was awarded to W. B. Sheddan.

INSTITUTE COMMENCEMENT.

Class of Young, Bright and Beautiful Members.

INTERESTING EXERCISES.

Seventeen Young Ladies Graduate from the Institute on Tuesday Afternoon—Awarding of Prizes—Etc.

At half past two o'clock, Tuesday afternoon, the Institute had its forty-second annual commencement. Notwithstanding the warm weather, the hall was full to overflowing. The class marched from the Literary Halls to the stage preceded by Messrs. Allen and Simpson, in caps and gowns, the faculty, and some renowned alumni. As the class passed through the aisles, we were struck by their beauty, their grace in every movement, and their young and lady-like appearance. It was remarked that the seventeen members of this class were the brightest, the youngest, the most beautiful and the best cultured that have graduated from the Seminary for many years. These girls undoubtedly showed, in all ways that their training has been broad and complete. Their course seems to have prepared them well for accomplishing the duties of their future career.

Judging from the interest taken in the essays of the class, one can say that they were seventeen wisely chosen and well rendered subjects. The productions brought out clearly that woman can do much in a literary way, and that essays are not necessarily burdensome to an audience. In these subjects the class also showed its perfect and complete training, since the members write on themes chosen by lot. The faculty had full confidence in the girls' ability and well did they merit it. The audience was not only captivated by the good thoughts, clearly brought out, but also by the manner of delivery. The reading was a credit to the institution. The girls were full of their subjects and seemed to fill every person in the hall in such a way that many will never forget some of the splendid thoughts.

The program:

Music.
Prayer.
Legends...Frances M. Baker, Lewisburg.
Two Lives...Mary H. Baker, Lewisburg.
The King Arthur of Romance......Elizabeth E. Brubaker, Mifflinburg.
A Review..............................Jennie A. Davis, Camden, New Jersey.

Awarding Prizes.
Benediction.
Music.

President Harris' address to the class was full of words of encouragement and praise for woman. He thought a properly educated woman is in great demand and will be much wanted in the future.

Mrs. Katharine Larison distributed the diplomas and gold medals, and finally the prizes, after they were announced by Pres. Harris. The following persons received prizes for work done in the Seminary during the school year: Miss Mary Wilson, the senior scholarship prize; Miss Grace Slifer, first senior essay prize; Miss Jennie Davis, second senior essay prize; Miss Seiler, first fourth year scholarship prize; Miss Bessie Noyes, second prize; Miss Beulah Hayes, Lippincott prize; Miss Bessie Freas, elocution prize; Miss Minnie Visick, music prize; Miss Mary Thornton, French prize.

The entire commencement was a grand success. The music furnished by Dr. Aviragnet added much to the many pleasant features of the exercises. All present looked well pleased and seemed assured that the Seminary has been making great progress.

ACADEMY COMMENCEMENT.

Orations by Members of the Class.

TIMELY TOPICS TREATED.

Eight Young men Graduated from the Academy Tuesday Morning—Awarding of Prizes—Etc.

On Tuesday morning at eleven o'clock, in the presence of a large audience, the first class graduated from the Academy since the accession of their able and active Principal, Prof. T. A. Edwards. Eight young men delivered orations which showed the results of good training by efficient instructors and zealous work by the young men.

The orations, speaking generally, were very good, combining eloquence of expression and elegance of thought. In the choice of subjects, the speakers showed great discrimination, choosing subjects excellent alike for their interesting subject-matter and for their value as instructive agents.

A feature of the program especially to be commended was the music. The selection rendered by the Milton Orchestra, Miss Alice Woods on the violin, and Miss May Lyle Smith on the flute, were all of high order and reflect great credit on Dr. Aviragnet, through whose instrumentality this array of musical talent was brought together.

A copy of the program is here appended:

Principal Edwards announced the awards of the annual prizes. The Rev. David P. Leas prize for the member of the Third Form who shall excel in Declamation was awarded to Mr. Charles J. Pearse, with honorable mention to Mr. J. W. Cottrell; the Harry S. Hopper prize to the member of the Fourth Form for excellence in composition, to Mr. Charles Way Harvey; the Prof. W. E. Martin prize to the one who shall pronounce the best oration at the Fourth Form Exhibition, to Mr. Charles Way Harvey, with honorable mention to Mr. Edwin L. Nesbit.

INSTITUTE ALUMNI.

The Unusually Interesting Exercises of the Ladies.

An unusually large crowd gathered in Bucknell Hall at 3 p. m., Monday, to attend the annual exercises of the Institute Alumnae. This is one of the most important sessions of commencement week and the exercise this year were of an exceedingly high order.

The program opened with a mandolin trio by Messrs. Martin, Koser and Moyer This was followed by prayer by Rev. F. S. Dobbins, Secretary of the Home Mission Society.

Then came the interesting histories of the decennial classes.

Mrs. Maria Probasco Tustin gave the history of the class of '55. Her manner was easy and pleasant to listen to. She said that literary training was good, but that of the soul must not be neglected. She advised the young ladies if they wished to make a success of life, not to grasp everything, but take up some special line of work best adapted to them. She was one of the three who organized the Alumnæ Association which now numbers four hundred and seventy-one. She was followed by Mrs. Alice Casselbury with the interesting history of the class of '65.

Mrs. Casselbury told all about her seventeen different class-mates who were engaged in the different duties of women in different parts of the world.

At this point on the program a beautiful duet was rendered by Miss Julia Weidensaul and Mr. W. M. Bunnell.

Miss Carrie Kenyon followed with the history of '75. Her rendering of the happenings of her successful class-mates was tersely written and very well received.

In the absence of Mrs. J. E. Sagebeer, the history of '85 was read in a very pleasing manner by Miss Annie Van Gundy, of Lewisburg.

Each thought they had settled in their proper places in life, and were receiving the good from their training while at school.

Miss Juliet Aikin favored the audience with a very fine piano solo.

The address of the afternoon on "The New Woman," was most ably given by Miss Cara Reese, '76.

After a piano duet by Misses Aikin and Morgan, the benediction was given by Dr. Dobbins.

Thus ended one of the most successful meetings ever held by the Institute Alumnæ Association.

Exhibition and Commencement of the School of Music.

On Friday evening, June 14, at eight o'clock, occurred the Annual Exhibition of the School of Music, in Bucknell Hall, under the direction of Dr. Avirognet and his three competent assistants. These exercises were very largely attended and were exceedingly interesting. The following fine program was rendered:

Part I.

Overture of Fra Diavolo,	Misses B. Watkins, O. Silvers, E. Walker.
Cradle Song for Violin	Miss E. Shires.
Camp of Gypsies Piano Solo	Miss E. Seiler.
'Twas April, ballad	Miss M. O'Donnell.
La Cinquantaine Violoncello Solo	Mr. R. Wendel.
Concert March, for piano, 4 hands,	Misses J. Himmelreich and J. Reading.
All in a Garden Fair, ballad	Miss S. Jones.
Mazurka Appassionata, for piano	Miss G. Church.
I Seek for Thee in Every Flower	Miss G. Morgan.
Elysee Waltz, for piano	Miss O. Silvers.
Sognai melody	Miss J. Weidensaul.

Part II.

Charge of Cavalry, piano, 4 hands,	Misses B. Watkins and G. Morgan.
Mon Ame a Dieu Mon Cœur a Toi, Serenade	Miss Potter.
Voix du ciel, piano solo	Miss J. Lawshe.
Grande Valse Brillante	Miss J. Reading.
Sweet Pleasures on the Water	Misses Weidensaul and Davis.
Les Cascades	Miss M. Craig.
Spirito Gentil	Mr. Bunnell.
Trovatore Fantaisie, for violin and piano	Misses Lawshe.
Love's Sorrow	Miss Voris.
Fair Ellen Mazurka, for piano	Miss B. Watkins.

Judging from these exercises and the fine manner in which the different programs were carried out, the School of Music shows much improvement over former years.

Art Exhibit.

Interesting Work of the School of Art for the Year.

Visitors to commencement this year should not miss the Art Exhibition at the Institute Studio. This is one of the most interesting and attractive exhibits which the Art Department has ever offered. Not only is the arrangement of drawings and paintings tasteful and attractive, but the studio is made especially cool and inviting by the flowers and banks of ferns; the latter procured by the boys of the Academy from the Montandon marsh.

It should be born in mind that not one-half of the work done during the year is on exhibition. Many of the art students carry home their work at Christmas and others present pieces to their friends so that the exhibit is made up of what is very largely the work of one term. The time of most of the students is very limited and but very few are able to give their whole attention to this work.

Of the work in the departments, the finest collection is in the way of sepias and water-color drawings. To be noted especially are sepias of the bridge on Faculty Avenue and the one farther down the run. Most of the water-color work is in the way of flowers, the most noticeable being the various collections of pansies.

The paintings in oil are, of course, much richer and deeper in coloring. One of a baby asleep in its cradle is most apt to impress the observer. A little winter scene looks quite chilly and is a great favorite in these warm June days. Of work done from nature there is a fine piece with an ancient blue pitcher and saucer, together with a swiss cheese and some crackers. An interesting tale goes with this picture as a venturesome mouse used regularly to steal the crackers while the work was in progress and necessitate a new supply each morning.

In china work, the most noteworthy is a chocolate set, decorated with poppies. The painting is the work of Miss Emily Clingan, of Lewisburg, and shows refined taste both in the general treatment and the variations in the design.

Most of the black and white work is not placed on exhibition as it is the sort of thing first attempted by students and is necessarily very crude and incomplete. Much of the drawing done at this stage is in books and so not available for display.

While it is especially difficult to pick out that work which is most meritorious, yet several of the young artists deserve a special recognition. Misses Ruth Bower, Lizzie Evans and Viola Pensyl have made especially rapid progress during the year and show in their work evidence of much painstaking care. Miss Margaret Ross should also be remembered for her crayon work. One study, "As Found in the Morning," is quite suggestive with the open Bible, the candle burned to the socket and the spectacles upon the open page.

Many friends are to be thanked for their interest in the work as shown by their lending old dishes, furniture and flowers for models. Miss Neotling, of Selinsgrove, brought out a family heirloom in the shape of an old candlestick over one hundred years old as a model for a drawing.

Miss Wood is to be congratulated on her successful work both as a teacher of art and as the inspirer of such artistic grouping of objects as the finished pictures show.

Laboratory Reception.

As usual, the Institute commencement exercises were so protracted that the reception by the Physical and Chemical Society, assisted by the Natural History Society, was not so well attended as it deserved.

Visitors were met at the door by Prof. Fisher, who directed them upstairs. Here were to be seen sections under microscopes, of cuttings in Anatomy and Plant Histology. After looking at the skeletons and preserved specimens, visitors passed into the room of living specimens. These consisted of about twenty snakes and their charmer, Mr. James D. Macnab. A great deal of interest was show in the manipulations of the reptilian pets by their friend. Several people were heard to say that the greatest curiosity was a man who could wear a snake for a hatband.

The next thing was a visit to the room containing the apparatus for experiments in physics and electricity.

On passing down stairs, the crowd was turned into the main lecture room. Here Prof. Owens discussed the phenomena of combustion, showing how light is produced in a flame, how solids will burn in a gas, and how two solids will unite under proper conditions. Among the most interesting of these was the burning of sugar, potassium chlorate and sulphuric acid, the burning of sodium on ice, and the burning under water of potassium chlorate, phosphorus and sulphuric acid.

At this point Prof. Owens turned over the entertainment to Mr. F. W. Brown, who proceeded to show the color reactions for determining tin, lead, antimony and arsenic. He next proceeded to perform Kellar's famous water and wine trick of pouring water and wine from the same pitcher. Many of the audience were somewhat sceptical and expressed disappointment that "Doc" did not explain the way in which the wonderful changes were brought about.

The Athletic Exercises of Monday Afternoon.

The field and track athletic contests held on the athletic field Monday afternoon, June 17, were attended by a small crowd. The weather, unlike at former occasion of this kind, was all that could be desired, but the rough, grassy track greatly hindered the record breaking anticipations of the contestants.

Shortly after 2:30 p. m., starter Reynolds brought the hundred yard men to the line. The finish was easy for R. M. Brady in 10½ seconds; W. H. Carey, second; F. W. Jackson, third. The former record was 11 seconds.

The second event was the shot put and closed with E. W. Cober, first, 31 ft. 9 in.; second, H. W. Savidge, 30 ft., third, Brick, 29 ft. 8 in. A new college records was then made of 36 ft. 7½ in. by B. Smith. The former record held by him was 33 ft. 8½ in.

The next event was the 220 yard hurdle race with H. C. Downing the only entry. Time, 33 seconds.

Event number four was the half-mile run, in which A. O. Miller had 80 yards handicap over Slifer. The time of Slifer was 2 minutes 15¼ seconds, his former record being 2 minutes 10 seconds. Miller finished first by ten yards.

Next event was the broad jump, which was won by Savidge, 17 ft. 5 in.; second, Harper, 17 ft. 4 in. The previous record of 18 ft. 10 in., held by B. Smith, was broken by him and increased to 19 feet in the last trial.

Hanna and Fetzer started in the mile walk but were ruled off for running. The record is held by Hanna, and is 9 minutes 9½ seconds.

The running high jump had but one contestant, H. W. Savidge, who made a mark of 4 feet 10 inches. The record is 5 feet 4 inches, held by Bromley Smith.

The remainder of the records we summarize below:

HOP STEP AND JUMP.

First, B. Smith, 42 feet 6 in.
Second, Savidge, 37 feet 9½ in.
The winner broke his own record 4 feet 1 inch.

STANDING BROAD JUMP.

B. Smith, 9 feet 10½ in.
The former record, held by Elliott, '98, was broken by 1 foot.

HIGH KICK.

The event was called off, since the only contestant was injured.

220 YARD DASH.

First, Brady, 26¾ sec.; second, Dillon, 27 sec. Brady easily broke the record by one-fourth second, and promises to be an excellent runner.

HAMMER THROWING.

First, Cober, 93 ft. 7 in.; second, Brick, '95, 75 ft. 11 in.; third, Davis, '95, 73 ft. 6 in. B. Smith made a wonderful exhibition throwing the hammer 96 ft. ½in., and broke the old record by 2 ft. 11½ inches.

120 YARD HURDLE.

Downing, 20 sec. The record was broken 2¼ sec.

ONE MILE RUN.

First, Slifer, '98, 5 min. 16 seconds; second, Fetzer, '98. This breaks our record 22 sec. and the State inter-collegiate record 3 sec.

POLE VAULT.

First, W. H. Carey, 8 ft. 1 in.; second, Jackson and A. O. Miller. The record of 9 ft. by B. Smith was not broken.

ONE-FOURTH MILE DASH.

Downing, 1 min. The record was broken 6 sec.

The meet was a grand success. Eleven records were broken and the most of these in dashing and running. The increase toward the track fund amounted to almost sixteen dollars. This will help us a trifle in laying a track and perhaps urge Alumni, who have any care for the success of their Alma Mater, to pay a small contribution toward such a great need. We have experienced the work of a trainer, now we want a track, and then Bucknell will be second to none in the Inter-collegiate Athletic Association.

Next Commencement is the 50th Anniversary of the founding of the University. Preparations are on foot to secure famous orators and excellent music.

The MIRROR staff wish to acknowledge the kindness of the Editor of Commencement News, Mr. Schuyler, in that the material for this number is almost entirely from the columns of that paper. If we have not made a proper selection of material, we are sorry and hope that the editors another year may profit by our experience and re-publish such matter as will be of interest to the greatest number.

As one passed through the many groups of Alumni and visitors during the week, perhaps the remark most often heard was; "How beautiful the campus looks this year." It was very gratifying to the authorities to hear the many kindly remarks about our grand campus and surely it merited all the praise it received. Much work has been put upon it this spring in the way of repairing the unsodded portions of the terraces, trimming the trees and general work to make the grove attractive. The grass has been kept under excellent control and the lawn-mower has been heard every day for many weeks.

Editorial.

GREETING! The MIRROR extends a welcome to the unusually large number of new students. Through the efficiency of those who have it in charge, a well-kept campus and inviting apartments awaited their coming. But the commodius buildings were over-crowded and many were obliged to secure homes in families of the vicinity. Earnest, energetic, and well prepared, the Freshman class is winning golden opinions. Welcome to the new students.

THE MIRROR, issued every two weeks, will collect and make exposition of such affairs as are most prominent, and a perusal of its columns cannot fail to give a broader and better view of the University and its environment.

THE Y. M. C. A. displayed its usual activity. Incoming students found themselves in the hands of obliging and intelligent companions who gave them a neat guide-book containing information of importance to strangers, and directed them to their new home. On Saturday, receptions were held in the different departments introducing the new-comers at once into social life at Bucknell. Did not the Y. M. C. A. also help much to sustain the high moral tone during the whole year, its cordiality on this occasion alone would be sufficient to merit the co-operation and support of the student body.

OUR college life is democratic. A good comradeship prevails, and it is advantageous to enter into that spirit as quickly as possible. To be sure the class of ninety-nine has received certain instructions in etiquette styled "Freshman Commandments," printed by the benevolence of the preceding class; yet there is an etiquette of college life that can be acquired only by entering into its various phases with a determination to gain the most from them.

En passant, this subject of college etiquette will be made excuse for a short digression in the realm of Archaeology. The value of such caprices or jokes, as the one of the Freshman Commandments, cannot be fully appreciated except when they are put in their proper historical setting. There is perhaps only one practical college joke now extant, which bears any comparison with the one mentioned in point of antiquity: That is, the painting of the class number on town pavements. This alternate joke must be immediately resorted to by the class of ninety-nine or its fortunes will be irretrievably ruined.

It is not desirable to have the lower classmen dispense with the rules of deportment holding universally among gentlemen, and to have them imagine themselves among their boyhood companions. A gentlemanly respect for the rights of others can nowhere be better cultivated and will nowhere bring greater returns than among college men. Since here all are equal, a frank, easy and respectful bearing can be readily acquired.

Some skilled in Athletics, some in Music, some in Art, gathering from the far North, East, South and West, college life will be richer than ever before. The greatest experience comes from classmates. Four years of association will change the knowledge and experience of individuals into an enlarged common experience. Depth of experience comes from the class, breadth of experience can come only when there is a respectful equality among the members of all parts of the university. Such a generous democracy should be the aim of each and all.

THE DISCOVERY.

'Mid relics of the long forgotten Past
I searched one autumn day.
Each trophy seemed more precious than the last
In all that odd array.

Time yellowed letters, garments strange and quaint,
Cracked teapots, flowered plates,
Old fashioned chairs, quite innocent of paint,
All things Time consecrates.

When, opening an ancient battered chest
Advanced in mild decay,
An antique hymn-book found I in my quest,
Long hid from light of day.

Full many a name and date its fly-leaves bore,
Son's, sire's, and grandsire's too,
"His Book," in letters large, the name before;
A century since 'twas new.

But to the back I found the leaf adhered
Enclosing 'twixt the two
A mystery small that must be cleared
And straightway brought to view.

A little, yellow, many-folded note
So long and strangely hid !
I shrank at first from reading message wrote
By one an age beneath the coffin-lid.

It ran, "The rose is red, the violet blue,"
Those quaint and time-worn lines,
"The pink is sweet, and she is, too,
My sweetheart, Rachel Hines."

The homely words with subtle romance fraught
Full many a time I scanned,
And fancies shaped until I almost thought
I saw the youth whose hand
Had penned the precious secret of his heart
And hid it with such care.
Thought he of length of years that might depart
Ere it should be laid bare?

"Ah, well !" I mused, turned playful in my bent,
"What e'er the old folks say,
Great-grandpa wasn't wildly different
From silly boys to-day !"

O M. W.

PATRIOTISM IN A PEACEFUL EPOCH.

Flying colors, beating drums, thundering cannon, struggle, carnage and death, these in the thought of thousands are the essential accompaniments to a display of patriotism; these form the background upon which they paint their picture of a patriot. The magnificent strains of Wagner, Handel and Beethoven have lifted men's souls to almost celestial heights, until they have felt the throbbing of the divinity within them, but the martial music of fife and drum has awakened their human nature, fired their hearts with courage, and led them on to victory. To mankind at large patriotism and war are correlative terms, while couragé and reckless daring are synonomous in action, if not in speech.

This association of patriotism with martial times is common to all peoples; it has its birth in the tendency of mankind to be satisfied with causes most easily seen, and has been fostered by every history yet written. This association is natural, because in times of war patriotism finds its loudest expression, because at such times the exhibition of a patriotic spirit are seen by all the world. In the midst of the thunder of cannon and the rattle of musketry men perform gallant deeds, and every reveberation and echo carry the news of their patriotism over all the land. Men cannot help but see and hear, and thus unconsciously they limit the exhibition of patriotism to warlike times.

The reason why so many narrow opinions prevail among men is because they do not search for reasons but accept those that are evident without investigation and demand no more. It is this habit that has led to such a restricted conception of patriotism. Because it is not so easily seen, many men do not associate the thought of patriotism with a time when the cannon are silent and the drums are hushed, and when gentle peace spreads her protecting wings over the land like the cherubim of gold over the ark of Israel. Such times, however, demand patriotism as truly as those periods when the country is rent with strife and surrounded with dangerous enemies. It is this demand which gives us the theme for our thought, namely: The Obligations of Citizenship.

There are two chief elements of patriotism so broad that they comprehend all minor elements that might be said to make a man patriotic. The first and fundamental element is a love for ones country. This is the main-spring that prompts to action the slumbering desire within. No matter what other elements a man may possess, if in his heart there is no love for his country, he can be no real patriot. Brave he may be, and fearless of all danger, but unless urged on and controlled by a love for home and native land, his service cannot be. called the result of real patriotism. The quiet indignation of the poet finds a response in every loyal heart,

> "Breathes there a man with soul so dead,
> Who never to himself has said,
> This is my own, my native land?"

This is the element that has given to us our glorious names, and our far more glorious men, for a true man is always greater than his name! This is the element that has made men forget themselves when the need of their country has called them forth to danger and suffering. This is what gave us Washington and Lincoln, the one the Father of his country, and the other its Saviour.

The second element of patriotism, which makes operative this love of country of which we have been speaking, is courage. While love of country is fundamental in all real patriotism, yet it can find but little expression except it be joined with a courageous heart. Love of country must inspire the heart and courage strengthen it for giving reality to the inspiration. One man may have a warm love for his country, and yet not be brave enough to follow the promptings of his love. Another man may be brave enough to hazard anything and everything, and yet have no love for his country to awaken and stimulate his courage. Neither is a real patriot, yet there are in the two the elements of both a patriot and a traitor. The two elements are not independent, but interdependent; both are essential to a spirit of true patriotism.

I have before said that to mankind at large courage and reckless daring are synonymous in action if not in speech. It may be well to make a distinction here between the two, lest we mistake the nature of this second element. Two men are fighting side by side, each striving for the same purpose, each having the same point in view. But one is naturally bold and daring, while the other is timid and shrinking. The first moves forward recklessly and with no thought of danger, urged on by the smell of powder and the noise of battle; the other moves on as unflinchingly as the first, but with set teeth and nerves at the highest tension as he sees the danger on every side. The first man is daring; the second is courageous, for courage calls for sacrifice, and sometimes for death.

Even a surface study of citizenship will show it demanding these two elements which are at the basis of patriotism. True citizenship, not in name only but in fact, is real patriotism. He who is a true citizen in times of peace will be a real patriot when war demands a different form of service. There must be as deep a love of country in the heart of the citizen as in the heart of the patriot. This must be the principle dominating them both. This must be the foundation upon which both must build their structures, for he who rightly builds one builds also the other. The patriot need not necessarily be made one by the necessities of war, but he already exists as a true citizen, for the love of his country which sends him forth to struggle with arms for her security is not born at the sound of the tocsin, but has always been the spirit that has prompted him to loyal service.

Again, courage, the second element in patriotism is the second factor in citizenship. True, it has different methods of operation, and finds expression in another manner, but it is none the less true courage, for the courage demanded of the citizen is courage of conviction. In times of war many a man, who rushes boldly forward against the enemy in the thick of the fight, is fearful and trembling, when in the darkness and stillness of the night he paces back and forth on sentinel duty. Many a man, who has physical courage that enables him to stand firm by the flag of his country, lacks the moral courage, the courage of conviction, to stand by the principles which he knows to be right. In the peaceful periods of our country's history every citizen is doing sentinel duty, and such service demands the keenest moral courage.

Thus we see that citizenship is akin to patriotism, that the true citizen is the real patriot, and the true patriot is the real citizen. Let us next consider how these elements common to both find expression in the exercise of citizenship. The way that comes first to every mind, or, at least, first to most minds, perhaps, is in properly fulfilling the obligations of suffrage. A man's right to the ballot is the evidence of his freedom, the seal of his political manhood; deprive him of this and you disgrace him in his own eyes as well as in the eyes of others. And yet this right which men prize so much they misuse and abuse to the moral weakening of their own character and to the detriment of their country's good. The weapon thus placed in their hands for their country's defense is used for their own aggrandizement and made subservient to base ends. The exercise of the voting privilege proves a man's patriotism, or his lack of it, because the regard for his country, which animates every real patriot, will not permit him to wilfully vote away her prosperity, while the courage, which is the second qualification, makes him bold to follow his highest convictions. March to the ballot box filled with the same spirit that would inspire you if you were marching at the call of your country against a material enemy. See in every attempt at corruption a menace to your country's prosperity, and regard every man who seeks her hurt as a foe to that which to you is sacred and dear. Be alert, as the sentinel in the silent watches of the night, to catch the slightest intimation of danger, and then with loyal heart prove your love by a neverfailing courage by taking the ballot in your hand that stands for truth and right against error and wrong, and with this weapon overwhelm every foe to Justice and Liberty.

The second manner in which a man reveals his patriotism in a time of peace is by his attitude towards public interests. With jealous eye the true citizen watches every developing measure, to know whether it will add to or detract from the advancement of his country's good. Legislation in its various departments has his attention and his interest. All manner of public work receives from him an intelligent scrutiny. He does not stand by in ignorance of impending measures, and then talk bitterly for month after the measures have become laws about some one feature that opposes his comfort or effects his finances. How many so-called citizens do not know enough of existing laws and present conditions to be able to have an intelligent opinion in reference to any proposed measure affecting them. And here the second element in patriotism and citizenship finds its largest field. Courage to maintain his convictions, and to stand by them as faithfully as the gunner by his piece or the sentinel by his post, is demanded of every man who would be a true and loyal citizen. Neither blind prejudice nor stubborn adherance to individual opinion is what is required, but the moral courage to assert ones firm belief, which has been reached after wise and careful thought, even though such belief be unpopular.

To-day, on all sides, are influences calculated to stir our blood and stimulate our patriotic spirits. If with any here they serve to awaken a dormant patriotism, let it not fall asleep with the cessation of these influences. Let your patriotism shine forth with the brightness and constancy of yonder sun, inspiring others with its confidence thus making them better patriots and citizens. Do not wear patriotism as you would a suit of armor, laying it off in times of peace and springing into it at the alarm of war, but constantly manifest it by adherence to right and truth. so proving yourselves true patriots and loyal citizens.

CELIA'S DEFENSE, OR, WAS ROSALIND SO MUCH MORE OF A HEROINE THAN CELIA IN "AS YOU LIKE IT!"

Some devotees of Shakespeare like the character of Rosalind and in their endeavors to make her a heroine seem to detract from the natural goodness and beauty of Celia. They compare her speeches with those of Rosalind and try to prove that she is less intelligent. They strain to show that she is less beautiful, less lovable, less modest, and less sympathetic. Being enamored with Rosalind, they naturally try to pick flaws in Celia's character to show, as they think, the greater brilliancy of Rosalind.

This is unjust to Celia, so, perhaps, by a comparison of the characters of Rosalind and Celia we can best defend Celia from these unjust and partial attacks,

These people say that Rosalind is more intellectual than Celia, goes deeper down and sees further below the surface. We can refer them, for example, to Act I. Scene II, where Rosalind and Celia are carrying on a discussion. In this Celia speaks just as intelligently as Rosalind and shows just as good an acquaintance with Nature and the ways of the world. She is not a whit behind Rosalind and shows just as much practical wisdom, while of deep thought she has her fair share. Where can one make a distinction between the speeches of Celia and that of Rosalind and say that Rosalind is more intellectual, for instance, in:

> Ros. I would we could do so; for her (Fortune's) benefits are mightily misplaced; and the bountiful blind woman doth most mistake in her gifts to women.
> Cel. Tis true; for those that she makes fair, she scarce makes honest; and those that she makes honest, she makes very ill-favoredly.

Where in this is Rosalind's intellectual superiority shown? This is not an isolated instance to suit our purpose but the play is full of them.

They say that Rosalind's modesty is above reproach, but it seems to us that the modesty of Celia rivals, if not surpasses, that of her fair cousin. Rosalind so far loses her modesty as to say, "He calls us back; my pride fell with my fortune; I'll ask him what he would. Did you call sir? Sir, you have wrestled well and overthrown more than your enemies." It seems to us that this can not be argued away by saying that it was in a sense common or proper at that time. For a woman of our ideal to go unbidden to a man and tell him that he has overthrown her heart, seems to lack that true, innate modesty, which we expect of a Rosalind. While Celia's, "Will you go, coz?" shows the true modesty and sense of impropriety that was lurking in her heart.

They say that she lacks the sympathy of Rosalind. Can any one justly say that Celia does not bear as good will to Orlando as Rosalind does, when he is about to wrestle with Charles? Rosalind says, "The little strength that I have, I would it were with you," and to this Celia adds "And mine to eke out hers." In what consists the difference of sympathy and good will? In the imagination of the reader simply. Or take Rosalind's, "Now Hercules be thy speed, young man!" and Celia's, "I would I were invisible to catch the strong fellow by the leg." Wherein consists the difference of good will and good impulse? If difference there be, it consists in the fact that Rosalind from the start has taken a great liking to Orlando, while Celia feels only a kindly, friendly interest in him. Her expressions are more tempered, but are just as sympathetic and bear as much good will.

Celia was more selfcontrolable than Rosalind in time of need. When they were banished, Celia was the one that came to the front with a feasible plan, while Rosalind was weaker and stunned by the blow. Celia plans the journey to Arden and the method of its accomplishment, and is cool and collected, while Rosalind is in a stupor and almost stricken dumb.

Nowhere does Rosalind show a self-sacrifice worthy to be classed with Celia's great sacrifice, the loss of home, wealth, honor, ambition and all that appeals to a woman in high position. All these she gave up out of devotion to her friend, and this shows how unselfish and noble she was.

To us it seems that some, to extol Rosalind, lower Celia and that too beyond all reason. It is true that Celia is not the heroine of the play, for it is not she who falls in love and around whom the principal interest centres. But, in our judgment, Shakespeare has painted the character of a good, pure, noble, sympathetic woman, one who, in treasures of mind and heart, in modesty, sympathy, self control and self-sacrifice is not to be overshadowed by the fair, the virtuous, the beautiful, much famed and much loved Rosalind.

The foot ball season at Bucknell has opened with a very encouraging outlook. With plenty of first-class material, a good coach, and a deep interest taken by all the students, the prospects are certainly good. The entering Freshman Class is large and brings some likely men to the College. Everywhere can be noticed a feeling of prosperity, and the team shares in this.

The first team appeared Monday evening in new suits complete, consisting of pants, jackets, shoes, stockings and sweaters.

So far the practice has been hard and full of snap. At 4 o'clock Coach Herring lines up the men and puts them through a trial of catching the ball. Then the "regulars" practice signs while the scrubs kick and fall on the ball. After this the two teams line up against each other and there is some good lively foot ball for half an hour. The men then take a run around the field and wind up at the Gymnasium. A training-table has been started and at present twenty men have been taken there. It is a good idea as it keeps the players in touch with each other. Of last year's team ten are back. They are: Cober, Jennings, Lesher, Collins, Firth, "Holly," Davis, Elliott, Bunnell and Wilson. The prominent new men trying for places are: Brady, Devall, Catterall, Griffith, Garner, Mulford, Bryson and Gilchrist. The team is playing under the Pennsylvania—Harvard—Cornell agreement. There are numerous changes from last year's rules all tending to make the game more open and consequently more interesting.

On Saturday, Sept. 20, a game was played between two of the local teams, the strongest men being about equally divided. To the public it seemed uninteresting, but in fact the game was really a hard one. The new rules were tried and the fouls were numerous. No scoring was done in the first half, but in the second the team captained by Bunnell made a touch-down and goal. Bloomsburg was to have been here but failed to appear. Efforts were made to get a game elsewhere but in vain.

On Saturday, Oct. 26, Bucknell meets State College at Williamsport. This will be the great game of the season and a large crowd is expected, Our chances for winning this year are about even. Don't miss it.

The team as chosen for the Pennsylvania game follows:

Jennings, Herring, Lesher, Firth, Thomas, Bunnell, Wilson, Davis, Cober, Collins, Mulford, Hollinshead, Griffith, Devall, Elliott, Brady.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., OCTOBER 2, 1895.

University of Pennsylvania defeated Bucknell in foot ball here to-day, at Franklin Field, by a score of 40 to 0 before about 2000 spectators.

I saw the game yesterday in which U. P. defeated Swathmore; but don't let anybody think that there was any similarity between the playing of Bucknell and Swathmore, although the scores in both games were the same.

U. P. scored 14 points against Swathmore in the first, and 26 in the second half. U. P. scored 34 points against Bucknell in the first half, and 6 in the second half.

Pennsylvania's heavy scoring the first half of the game to-day was due to a glaring lack of team work on the part of the Bucknell players, and a consequent lack of confidence in themselves. The full-back missed three tackles that cost 18 points,and the tackling in general of the Bucknell men was too high. A runner can frequently throw a man off who is on his back, or may carry him along for some distance, but when tackled by the legs he must fall.

Bucknell braced up wonderfully in the second half. The right tackle and end, which seemed week and powerless in the first half, stood with the rest of the team like a stone wall, and Pennsylvania could not have scored in the second half at all had not Bucknell's backs made a fumble at a critical time by which the ball passed to the enemy.

The following is the line up and summary:

PENNSYLVANIA.	POSITIONS.	BUCKNELL.
Brooke (Stauffer)	full-back	Cober.
Minds	r. h. b., l. h. b.	Brady (Thomas)
Orbison	l. h. b., r. h. b.	Capt. Bunnell.
Capt. Williams	quarter-back	Herring.
Hedges	r. e., l. e.	Elliott.
Edwards	r. t., l. t.	Wilson.
Off	r. g., l. g.	Hollinshead.
Bull	center	Jennings.
Woodruff	l. g., r. g.	Lesher.
Wagenhorst	l. t., r. t.	Duval.
Dickson	l. e., r. e.	Collins.

Touchdowns, Wagenhorst 2, Brooke 2, Woodruff 1, Minds 1, Bull 1. Goals from touchdowns, Brooke 6. Halves, 20 minutes, 15 minutes. Referee. A. Knipe. Umpires, Dr. Charles H. Schoff and Harvey Smith-Linesman, G. W. Woodruff.

It is too bad that the game of to-day couldn't be played over. I voice the sentiment of impartial spectators when I say that with one or two changes in the team Bucknell could, with one week's honest team practice, meet U. P. and give her a pretty even game, with a chance of scoring.

Bucknell has the material to make the best team she has ever put on the gridiron, as was demonstrated to-day. The only question now is will the team stick to honest, hard work in order to gain new laurels for Bucknell, and to defeat State College with such a margin that will demonstrate the superiority of the Bucknell team.—Lewisburg Journal. A SPECTATOR.

Mr. Ezra Allen, '95, Ex-President of the Association, gave a most interesting and helpful talk Sunday afternoon, September 15, in the Students' Meeting in Bucknell Hall. These opening meetings are proving a helpful factor in the work of the Association.

The Association Rooms present a much improved and homelike appearance since the draping of the new curtains. Twenty-five additional singing books have been ordered. It is expected that further improvements can soon be announced.

The various receptions to the new students, tendered Saturday evening, Sept. 14. by the Young Men's Christian Associations and the Young Women's Christian Association, were pleasing and helpful in the extreme. The College Association received in the Gymnasium. After a pleasant social period, devoted to becoming acquainted and to toasts on current topics. refreshments were served and songs indulged in. The Academy Association received in the Academy reception rooms. At the Institute the same cordial spirit was manifested. Messrs. Martin and Moyer rendered some enjoyable duets. A fuller notice of this last mentioned reception wili be found in the Institute items.

Miss Alice Lillibridge was initiated into Pi Beta Phi Sept. 26.

Heard in Elocution: "By the blue Phosphorous the black bandit died."

Prof. W. E. Martin attended the sessions of the Northumberland Baptist Association at Jersey Shore.

E. R. Meyers, H. L. Guss and R. G. Slifer spent a portion of their vacation together in the vicinity of Pottsville.

When it comes to hunting trouble, just ask Rawlinson about throwing that twig. Perhaps Miss L—— can explain it.

"THE MIRROR" aims to reflect the progress of Bucknell University, in all its departments, and merits the generous support of all classes of students.

Charles Scull Keen, '99, Cramer Hill, N. J., Morris Bacan Mulford, '99, Bridgeton, N. J.,and James Lewellyn Cattell. '99 Denver, Col. have been initiated into Phi Gamma Delta Fraternity.

This year marks a great advance in attendance here. Many new students were obliged to secure rooms in town. Members of Sigma Alpha Epsilon Fraternity are occupying their new chapter house.

The college girls have given further evidence of their enthusiasm and enterprise by organizing a literary society of their own, wherein the current of their eloquence will not be turned from its course by masculine snags.

Don't forget the "MIRROR BOX" in Main Hall of the College building. It is always ready to receive local items, personals, humorous incidents and news items in general, and hand them over to the editors of "THE MIRROR."

The reception tendered by Mrs. Larison to the several fraternities of Bucknell in the Institute parlors was a most enjoyable affair. This action is new and certainly indicates that the fraternities are held in esteem at Bucknell.

The students of Bucknell University publish one journal, "THE BUCKNELL MIRROR." It is the only publication in which all students of the institution are directly interested. As such an organ it naturally expects the hearty support of all students.

During the summer vacation Howard L. Guss successfully canvased with the International Cyclopædia. While in New York under instructions he took a trip up the Hudson as far as Poughkeepsie. His work called him to Yale where he met Mr. Edward Kendall, Ex '95, who graduated there last June with high honors.

On the day of the Fair a party of students went out to Dale's Cave. On the way out they were fairly presentable, doing nothing more serious than scaring the dogs and chickens, but on the way back—"You'll be sorry when you see me." And to pay for this loss of energy,—four stalagmites, two hundred pounds of mud, and oceans of experience.

It seems hardly possible that, so soon after Dr. Boardman's eloquent attempt to impress upon us the beauty of "Otherism," the talented few who belong to the "Varsity" Band should blow and pound their blatant "Iism" through their instruments as they come up the Hill after practice, while we poor plodders, struggling with the morrow's lesson, are goaded into a frenzy.

"THE MIRROR" congratulates itself on the fact that it is the organ, not of any faction of the University, but of the whole student body. The ladies of the Seminary have their own representative on the editorial staff and so have the ladies of the College. The boys of the Academy elect their own correspondent. In the College the fraternity men and non-fraternity men alike have their representatives on the "MIRROR" board. We rejoice in this manifestation of harmony and co-operation in the publication of our College journal.

"One of the few," while canvassing his massive brain for something with which to make himself famous, hit upon the following "original adaptations:"

"Now little Freshman,
Don't you cry;
You'll be a Sophomore
Bye and bye."

and:

"Men may come, and men may go, but I am fresh forever," as well as:

"A Freshman to Hades was sent
(Such as often all prudence will spurn)
But he made them a terrible time,
For he was too green to burn."

This last so pleased him that he resolved on further effort, and so wrapping his head in a voluminous towel, soaked in cold water (to keep his thoughts from burning through), he evolved a paraphrase on the Decalogue. This last has attempted an appearance before the public. You know the rest.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

A very pleasant and sociable time was spent in the parlors on Saturday evening, Sept. 14, under the direction of the Y. W. C. A. Every one was made welcome and general introductions were in order. A program was rendered which caused the new girls to feel acquainted not only with Bucknell, but with some other colleges as well. It consisted of the songs, yells, and poems of various colleges as found in their respective annuals and song-books, as follows:

1. Song—' Yellow and Blue"—College song of Ann Arbor.
2. Song—"Orange and Black"—Princeton College song.
3. Princeton Yell.
4. Poem—"Our Game"—Franklin and Marshall—Miss MABEL WELLS.
5. College Song of the University of Pennsylvania.
6. Dialogue—"Trials of a Higher Education" or the annoyance of interruptions during the preparation of a lesson—Misses LILLIBRIDGE, GODDARD, HANNA, ALLEN.
7. Wellesley Song and Call.
8. State College Song and Yell.
9. Bucknell Song.

The first new thing that greeted our eyes as we came in the front door was the linoleum. The entire lower hall is covered with it, and, when three or four girls go dancing through the vestibule, there is much less noise than when their feet tripped over the bare floor. It is useless to expect girls, whose hearts are full of gladness because they have the opportunity to get a liberal education in such a delightful home school, to walk like nuns, demure and pensive.

Passing along the hall, we noticed that room "B" had been divided, making a music room for Miss Gould's use. We are glad that dear Miss Gould has such a pleasant room, but we are sorry that room "B" has lost one window and much blackboard surface. Truly we do need a new building for our muise department. Who will come forward and erect a commodious building for our music school and make glad the heart of Dr. Aviragnet?

A number of rooms in the main building have been freshly painted, papered, carpeted and provided with new window shades. An air of general renovation pervades the whole building, making the opening of the term bright and cheery.

The entire Institute faculty, matron and students have been in a flutter of excitement over the preparations for the reception which was given in honor of the Pi Beta Phi girls on Friday evening, October 4. Among the invited guests were the members of the Phi Kappa Psi, Sigma Chi, Phi Gamma Delta and Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternities, also the patronesses of the Pi Beta Phi fraternity, Mrs. Harry S. Hopper, Mrs. Wm. Leiser, Mrs. Harold McClure and Mrs. Lincoln Hulley.

The college girls decorated the large parlor with clematis and bitter-sweet. The Seniors turned the small parlor into a veritable Japanese boudoir. The Third and Fourth year girls made the spacious study hall an autumn study in purple asters and golden rod.

The Specials put the reception room and office in fine shape.

It is fortunate that the vandals, who, under the cowardly "Souvenir" pretext, used to carry off pin trays, hand mirrors, doilies, etc., are no longer at Bucknell. Do you not know, young friends, that "It is a sin to steal a pin, much more to steal a greater thing"? The first and second year girls displayed their taste in making the vestibule and second floor landings places of beauty. There were also palms and ferns galore.

Dear Editor: This discussion will be continued in your next issue.

The C. E. society of the Baptist Church gave a social in the chapel Saturday evening, September 21, for the new students. Cards, on each of which the name of some prominent author was written, were distributed. The person having a card talked with as many people as possible whose names began with the same letter as did the name of the author inscribed on his card; in this way all stiff formality was avoided. At the close of a short program, refreshments were served. None enjoyed this social more than the new students for whom it was given.

The boarders at the Institute have watched with interest the manful efforts of Charles to uncover the old weedy tennis court, and rejoice to notice a result so satisfactory. The smooth, hard ground, and distinct lines have already aroused within many a girlish heart the latent desire to wield the racket once more.

Should any girl be without a liberal education? Bucknell, like her sister colleges, stands with her portals thrown open wide, and there have come to her almost as many girls as she can well accommodate. By this time each girl has her room comfortably and tastefully arranged, and we see no more home sick faces. Each one seems to be doing her utmost to promote the pleasure of others.

More than this, every member of the Institute has entered upon her work with a real earnestness. The coming year promises to be one of nobler aims and higher attainments on the part of the students than Bucknell has known for some years. The interest and enthusiasm manifested by the teachers proves a wonderful incentive to effort on the part of the students. After spending the summer in that exhilarating and inspiring retreat, Chautauqua, our Preceptress has returned to us, eager and anxious to give us the benefit of the methods and ideas she there received.

ACADEMY NEWS.

With a few exceptions all the familiar faces are again seen in the class rooms.

The Academy sends its greeting, and best wishes for a successful year to the MIRROR.

We are glad to report that Prof. Edwards has introduced an evening devotional service each evening from 6.45 to 7 o'clock. The boys seem pleased with the service as the Prof. usually before dismissal gives them a practical talk.

The school year opened with an enrollment of eighty-three students.

Let no man delay the "U. S. Mail" that makes a delivery every evening at the Cad.

In Philosophy class. Prep.: "Prof. why can't a perpetual motion machine be run by power?"

The foot ball team is about being organized. Mr. Gordon Forster is the Manager and Mr. Carl Senn, Captain.

The Fourth Form will study under Prof. Phillips the Apostolic Church, and the Third Form will study the Life of Christ, under Prof. Fisher.

The Fourth Form elected the following officers: President, Chas. Pearse, Vice President, Edw. Bell Secretary, Edw. Mitchell, Treasurer, John Sherman.

The following are the officers of the Third Form: President, Jos. Z. Rowe, Vice President, Wm. Devitt, Secretary, Raymond G. Pierson, Treasurer, George Alexander.

ADDITIONAL LOCALS.

Mr. Alfred Feight, Ex-'93, Acad. was in town October 6 and 7.

The notes from the Academy were furnished by Mr. J. Z. Rowe.

Mr. Frank Green a student in the Academy several years ago has returned to the University. His old friends are glad to welcome him to Bucknell again.

McCay cannot by any laws of Psychology understand why the seats in the Chapel were changed last week. The "change" (?) robbed him of a source of much felicity.

The students of the University appreciate the advantages afforded by a well equipped College Book Store. It is located in Room 1, West Wing, and is under the management of Messrs. Stephens and Thomas. We are pleased to call the attention of the Alumni to the announcement of the College Book Store in the advertising columns.

The Swedish Quartette, with Miss Bertha Webb, violinist, and Miss Jennie Shoemaker, delsartean and reader, are to be here October 28, in the Opera House. Miss Shoemaker is remembered by all the old students from her two appearances with the Schuman Ladies' Quartette. She is sure of a hearty reception from both town people and students.

Editorial.

WILL someone put in a plea in behalf of the outraged letter u? The other morning in chapel we said, "we sing the noo noo song." On another occasion we prayed (in song), "Toon my heart." We speak of our dooty to our college mates; why not also of the booty of the co-eds? Let us give u its rights and say duty and new and tune, as well as beauty and few and mute.

APROPOS of the advanced courses offered to Bucknell Graduates. "Post-graduation" is not a barbarism nor tautology, although awkward; but "post-graduate" is barbarous and tautological. If we say "graduates" and "under graduates" we are with Harvard, Brown, Yale, Princeton, Johns Hopkins, Columbia, Cornell, Chicago, Michigan, Wellesley and Bryn Mawr. Don't be a back-number and indicate your date by saying "Post-graduate."

WHILE it would be wrong to envy, there would be no harm in desiring such a fineness and breadth of culture as was evidenced in Doctor Boardman's lectures before the University. Doctor Boardman is a man of superior natural ability to begin with; but that did not make study and severe training dispensable. Nor did Doctor Boardman abbreviate his course of preparation. He took the Academic, Collegiate and Theological courses and added a year each in law and medicine, so as to gain the breadth of view and sympathy that would enable him to address all men. There is no royal road to superior culture.

WE understand that the College girls have organized a literary society. Perhaps a few lessons could be learned from the flourishing societies at the Hill. As to Program; it is well to have an essay, a declamation, an oration and a debate. This program is varied in one society by occasionally having the oration precede the declamation The other society sometimes omits the oration. It is hard to decide which is better. For the debate subject, a red-hot current topic provokes the liveliest discussion, such as "Which has been most oppressed, the negro or the Indian?" or, "Which is the most destructive, fire or water?" This is offered only as a suggestion.

FOOTBALL is the all absorbing topic. With a good schedule, good players, a good coach, captain and manager, great things have been expected of the team. The games so far have indicated that there is plenty of good material, and, also, that our fort is offensive and not defensive play. Previously our repertoire consisted of straight into-the-line plunges and simple end-plays; but this year the line men take part in every play. The style is very much that adopted so successfully by the University of Pennsylvania last year. The formation of the plays has been massive, perhaps at times cumbersome. But the plays will doubtless prove more effective as the season advances and the players better understand them.

There is not the individuality and dash usually seen on our gridiron. In a great measure, this is due to the new rules. The Harvard-Pennsylvania-Cornell rules have also removed one of the most interesting and most appreciated plays when the long runs from the kick-off were abolished. They made an improvement in abolishing the needless worrying and teasing between the players during the line up, but the verdict of the general public is that the old rules were good enough. The football muddle between Princeton and Pennsylvania, Yale and Harvard is responsible for the double system of rules.

The students who recently heard Doctor Boardman's Lectures on Corporate Society would understand the situation, if it were said that the Bucknell Team has more wholeism than Iism; but among the football magnates at large there is an unusual abundance of the latter.

THE CHIEFTAIN'S BURIAL.

All day long the Winnebagos
And the Iroquois, their allies,
Since the early break of morning,
Since the rising of the sun,

By the broad Monongahela
In the grey and silent forest,
Fought the hated Narragansetts,
Fought with valor and renown.

When the sun was slowly sinking
With its glare of ruddy ochre,
When the forest shades were dark'ning,
When the day was almost done,

Then the latest sounds of battle
And the din of awful conflict,
Joined with cries of deadly wounded,
In the forest died away.

Then the vanquished Narragansetts,
Raising all their fallen comrades,
Slowly turned and started westward,
Fleeing towards the setting sun.

But the vengeful Winnebagos,
In that long and bloody battle,
Lost the bravest of their people,
One of valor and renown.

And they found him in the forest—
Sorely wounded in the forest—
Lone and dying in the forest—
Near his wigwam by the stream.

Then they came up through the woodland—
Through the birch and alder woodland—
Through the pine and chestnut woodland—
To his wigwam by the stream

Here it was that first his fathers
Of the mighty Winnebagos,
Driven westward by the pale face,
Rested from their many journeys.
Here it was they built their wigwams
On the soft green grass beneath them,
On the scattered brown pine needles,
Fallen from the mighty westwind
That had blown them from the forest.

There they gently, sadly laid him—
On the soft green grass they laid him—
On the brown pine needles laid him—
Near the wigwam by the stream.

Then with trouble spake the chieftain—
Slow and slower spake the chieftain—
Dying ever spake the chieftain,
Of his home beside the stream.
When my eyes are closed forever,
When my ears have ceased to hear,
When my tongue is stiff and silent,
When my hands are straight and cold,
While the moon is shining brightly,
While the stars are looking down,
Dig my grave beneath the birches,
Place me in it ere the dawn.
Lest the grey wolf should disturb me,
Pile it high with many stones.

Here it was that first I ever
Gazed on lake or stream or river—
Gazed on plain or hill or valley—
Gazed on sun or moon or stars.

Here it was that first I ever
Gazed on grass or tree or forest—
Gazed on—————————— but the dying chieftain
Closed his eyes and breathed no more.

Then they rose up from around him,
All the chieftain's trusted warriors.
And the sun had set beyond them.
And the night was falling fast.

Not a word was heard among them
As they raised their silent chieftain—
Scarcely yet his limbs were stiffened—
Scarcely yet his brow was cold.

By the stream the grave was hollowed
Scarce a spear's length from the water.
And the moon was shining brightly.
And the stars were looking down.

Then they placed the chieftain in it—
Laid him in it ere the daybreak.
Lest the grey wolfe should disturb him,
Piled they it with many stones.

ROBIN BYRD, '99.

A MARTYR TO A GREAT CAUSE.

NOTE.—Robert Ross was murdered March 6, 1894, at the polls in Troy, N. Y. He had fought down "Bossism" in previous caucuses, and his presence at the polls aroused the fury of the mob of "repeaters" that murdred him. Men of both political parties are at present working to secure funds to erect a suitable monument to Robert Ross in one of the public parks of Troy. This oration is supposed to have been delivered on the completion of said monument. The audience, it is supposed, is representative of many states of the Union.

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen:—The death of a brave man bespeaks admiration. If he die in defence of a friend, that friend will love to honor and revere his memory. When a Nation learns that one of her sons has given up his life to defend her virtue and the principles upon which her safe existence rests, she wreaths the fadeless laurel that we may not forget. So it is that this vast company represents a nation, gathered, beneath a favoring sky and under the protecting folds of "Old Glory," to honor Robert Ross. Within the precincts of this city, most of his influence was exerted while he lived, and Troy therefore has justly been zealous in tributes to her martyred hero. But his defence of great principles that are not merely local, set his spirit free, and everywhere in our Commonwealth to-day, the name of Robert Ross is the guardian angel of pure politics and municipal reform.

When we read in history or biography the early life of any great man, who afterwards in important crises showed himself a hero, we do not find his youth more prophetic of future greatness than was the youth of Robert Ross. Ross's home was an American home, and he grew up an American in patriotism, in industry and in freedom. His Scotch ancestry gave him a strong body and plenty of moral courage. His education was largely gained from experience rather than from books, and he intelligently read the tendencies of the day. He saw the political corruption that had seized and threatened to destroy his beloved and illustrious city. He sprang with courage to the rescue. You know the story; you have been over the battle field; the small polling place; the line of respectable voters; headed by bribed policemen who frequently held back the legitimate voters while "repeaters" filled the ballot box with fraudulent votes; the fearless men who insisted on fairness and who challenged the illegal voters; the assault of the mob with pistols; the wounded citizens; the one fatal bullet; the martyr—you remember it all. The indignation meetings of the citizens that followed; the tributes of love and esteem that have since been continually paid to this first martyr to municipal reform!

Yet not alone because Robert Ross died do we gather to honor his memory to-day; but because he died for a principle and a right that is inviolable and sacred to every loyal American citizen. It is fitting therefore, while we honor the fidelity and courage of Robert Ross, that we should also consider the principles for which he sacrificed his noble life. The city and its government is rapidly becoming a supreme question to the American people. The demands for sound, municipal government increase every year; for the city will soon exceed the country in population. There is a constant movement of population from country to city, and it is about as availing to attempt to stop this movement or to change its direction, as to protest against the laws of gravitation. The same story is heard everywhere. The swarming city is as much a feature of the old as of the new world, and of sparsely as well as of thickely settled lands. London has a population as great as that of Canada. One would think there was enough room in Australia to prevent overcrowded cities; yet one-third of the population of New South Wales live in Sidney.

It must be evident to you, Ladies and Gentlemen, that this concentration of population brings with it grave evils. Forty years ago Mr. Gladstone quoted De Tocqueville as saying, "I look upon the size of certain American cities, and especially upon the nature of their population, as a real danger which threatens the democratic republics of the New World." At that time one-eighth of our population lived in cities of eight thousand and over. Now over one-fourth live in cities of that size and upward. I repeat, then, that the tide of population is toward the cities; and soon they will possess the power to control the state and the nation. The special dangers that confront American cities in this connection are brought about by the heterogeneous character of their population. Men, foreign born, and wholly out of sympathy with our American institutions, often gain control in our cities. Their policy is "for revenue only," and it makes no difference to them if they hazard the public welfare. Almost daily the corruptions of Councilmen, of Aldermen and of Police systems are being brought to light. Greed and Lust flaunt themselves in the face of Purity and Virtue in almost every municipality of our Commonwealth. Public officers, whose duty it is to protect virtue and arrest crime and violence,—for a price, protect anything and everything that is dangerous to the well-being of society and to the pursuit of happiness. But still more destructive to American institutions and freedom is the manipulation of the polls and the ballot box by the political boss. Bossism has been scattering its poisons through our municipal systems for several years; but the ultimate fatality of this rank corruption was scarcely apprehended by the majority of the people, until Robert Ross by his tragic death startled us to look to our rights before they were wholly taken from us and we were left powerless to regain them. Even now, when we look, we see that this pollution has eaten like a canker almost to the very vitals of our city governments, and we realize that a herculean labor is before us to cleanse away the filth that threatens to destroy the freedom of the municipality and the state. If, then, foreign and debased population, ignorant and careless of our institutions, continue to control our cities; if saloon bossess manipulate the ballot boxes in their wards; no great prophet is needed to foretell the future of the nation.

We look with pride upon the nation that has taught the world her best lessons of liberty. We glory in our freedom. We view the face of our fair land and all seems peaceful and prosperous. We go up into a high mountain and gaze upon our cities, our mines, our rivers, our shipping, and exclaim—"Wealth!" We point to our smoking mills and factories and again we exclaim—"Industry!" Our eyes rest upon the dear old stars and stripes unfurled to the light and we shout—"Freedom!" Schools and colleges lift their beacon domes into view, and again we cry—"Education!" Country and city are dotted with churches that point their spires heavenward, and all nature reverently answers with us—"Piety and religion! These are the essons that we have been teaching the world: industry, freedom, education and religion; but let us take care lest we ourselves shall after all become a cast-away nation. This is a glorious land. But the close student sees a shadow flit now and then across the face of the Goddess of Liberty. She fears a storm. The cloud that a moment ago was no bigger than a man's hand has grown larger and is getting blacker. It is the storm of municipal misrule that threatens soon to pour its fury upon us. The reservoirs of corruption are growing larger, and our only hope of averting the storm is to remove the source from whence these clouds are gathering their foul supply. It has required the bravery and sacrifice of such men as Dr. Parkhurst, Josiah Strong and Robert Ross to place the true character of these great problems in the light. Their courage has made for us a heritage that has value only as it is used. If we take up the responsibility that these men have nobly born, we shall strengthen again the foundations of the temple of liberty so that it shall remain unshaken and endure forever. It was to perpetuate this temple and to protect fair Liberty from ravishment that the noble Ross fought and died.

There is greet need to-day of men who thoroughly understand the needs of American municipalities. Municipal government is a science, and it is fast becoming recognized as such. If a broad, intelligent understanding of governments, past and present, is essential to the statesman; so also an intelligent view of the successful and non-successful municipal governments of the world is essential to responsible and useful citizenship. Men are beginning to examine and see where the fault with the government of our cities lies. They are studying the much-praised municipalities of Germany, they are looking at the cities of England and of France. The problem before us is a great and a profound one. But a part of it can be solved now. It can only be solved by courageous men who are not afraid of the political boss, the saloon keeper, nor the policeman that serves a boss rather than the public. To face these questions in a practical way, requires men like Robert Ross—men of character who give no comfort to the enemy.

Troy is a city that produces such men. She has a glorious history and she has illustrious heroes. Trojans are justly proud of Maj. Gen. Wool and of Gen. George H. Thomas, "the Rock of Chickamauga." These men were warriors. The wars in which they fought are over, and the victories won, and they have long since laid down their trophies at the feet of a grateful country. Ross was a warrior and courageously indeed did he discharge his duty in the battles already fought for civic liberty. We read of the "Immortal Ten Thousand." We look again with wonder at the victory of Marathon, and at the dauntless courage of the three hundred at Thermopylae whose patriotism speaks to us still in that famous inscription:

> "Go, Stranger, and to Lacedaemon tell,
> That here, obeying her behests, we fell !"

We gaze backward even to ancient Troy where myth and fact merge together. What heroes there were then! The distance seems only to lengthen and enlarge our telescopic vision, so that all men of that day seem like giants and heroes to us now. We sometimes wonder if there ever has been a time since, or ever can be, when such remarkable heroes shall live and act. Ah, yes! Here is a hero, a Trojan, not shrouded in the mists and inaccuracy of time and fancy; but he has lived in our day and fought for the land of Troy!

Loyal sons of Troy and of this great Commonwealth have reared this magnificent monolith to declare their admiration for that hero, and their determination to perpetuate the principles for which he lived and died. But this obelisk which rises in solemn grandeur before you, speaks more eloquently than I may of the hero who has gone from us. It points a massive finger toward that which is high and ennobling. It has been placed here for a nobler purpose than simply to beautify the city over which it looks. Its solid foundations and the stately column are well calculated to resist time and the elements, while they speak of pure patriotism and devotion. This naked obelisk, bared like the mighty arm of the Republic, shall remind all who pass this way of the meaning of American citizenship. Mothers will tell the story of Robert Ross to their children. Young men will emulate his example. The stone itself shall never be silent. The stranger will wonder and admire when he learns of the noble life whose memory this work honors. The inscription is singularly appropriate:

> "In Honor of Robert Ross, First Martyr to Pure Municipal Government."

The land of the free was never wet with more consecrated blood than that of Robert Ross; and these words that tell of his devotion shall be graven on our hearts as they now are upon the granite. The honor that you accord him with this monument to-day, is honor also to the principle that was dearer to him than life: the sacred right of suffrage. This is not a monument to a dead man, nor to a dead principle, but to a living man and and a living principle. Even more enduring than this solid granite is the monument that each one of us has reared in his heart. In coming ages this stone may perchance crumble away, but still freedom and the name of Robert Ross shall grow dearer to the patriot while time lasts.

REVISED FOOTBALL SCHEDULE.

Oct. 19, Gettysburg, at Harrisburg.
Oct. 26, State College, at Willsamsport.
Nov. 2, Franklin & Marshall, at Lancaster.
Nov. 9, Indians of Carlisle, at Lewisburg.
Nov. 16, Colgate, at Sunbury.
Nov. 23, Duquesne C. & A. C., at Pittsburg.
Nov. 28, Dickinson, at Harrisburg.

The football team has been engaged in secret practice at the Fair grounds during the last week.

A second team has been organized with Harris as Captain. This team is necessary to the success of the regulars and deserves great credit for its faithful work. For a number of evenings the practice has been almost as good as a regular game.

We are all deeply interested in the State game at Williamsport on Oct. 26. Here are some pointers. The special train will leave the Read-station at 12.15 P. M. The round trip fare is 98 cents. It is likely that arrangements will be made so that all can stay for the play in the Lycoming Opera House. Roland Reed, by special arrangement, holds the boards that night. Photos of both teams will appear in the "Grit" of next week. The State team will go to the Park Hotel and Bucknell will hold forth at the Updegraff.

The officials for the game will be: Linesman, Adams, U. of P.; Referee, Bernheiser, Cornell; Umpire, Dr. Schoff, U. of P. The halves will be 30 minutes each.

A good crowd, a fine day and great enthusiasm marked the opening game with Franklin & Marshall on Oct. 9, at 3.30. This was the first home game of the season and naturally all of the Bucknell team's admirers were anxious to see what it could do. They were not disappointed for the eleven certainly put up a great game. Although fumbles were frequent and there was a lack of team work in some instances, yet as a whole the play was fast and snappy and showed what the team can do with hard, faithful practice.

In the first half, Bunnell kicked off a low one, and Bucknell had the ball in F. & M. territory. Cober went at center for 5 yds, then 10 yds were lost on a fumble. Devall went around the right end for a long run. Bunnell made 10 yds, Cober 10 yds through center, then 10 yds through right tackle, followed by a touchdown by Bunnell in 4 minutes. Goal by Bunnell. F. & M. kicked off, the ball being caught by Elliott. Devall made 15 yds and Cober 5. Ball lost but recovered on next down by a fumble of F. & M. Devall made 22 yds, but ball was again lost on a fumble. For F. & M. Hartman made 15 yds, tackled by "Holly." At this point, the ball went to B. U. but they were soon forced to kick. F. & M. made two first downs and then the ball was Bucknell's. Devall made 10 yards and then Brady ran for 35 yds. Runs by Devall, Cober and then a touchdown by Brady. Goal by Bunnell. Shortly after F. & M. kicked off, Elliott was hurt, and Firth went on. In a few minutes time was called.

Second half. F. & M. kicked off, the ball being downed in the B. U. garden. The ball changed hands a few times and then Devall made a 20 yd run. 25 yds on a foul tackle followed and shortly afterwards a touchdown was made by Devall. Goal, Bunnell.

Herring ran the ball back on F. & M's kick-off. Hartman retired, badly hurt. After a few short rushes, B. U. lost the ball on a foul tackle, but regained it in short order. Devall made a touchdown as time was called. Goal, Bunnell. Total score B. U. 24. F. & M. 0.

BUCKNELL 24; WYOMING SEMINARY 0.

Saturday afternoon, Oct. 13, Wyoming Seminary was defeated on the campus. The contesting elevens were about equal in weight. Bucknell was weakened by the absence of Cober and Elliot; and in the second half, Wyoming was strengthened by the playing of their coach, Dr. Griffith. Play commenced at 2:30; and Wyoming kicked to our thirty yard line. Catterall started with a ten yard gain through centre; and hard line bucking by Devall, Bunnell, and Brady carried the ball twenty-five yards. A fumble and a loss by Devall gave it to Wyoming. Collins got the ball on their fumble and made 10 yards. From Wyomings fifteen yard line, Brady ran around the end for the first touch-down, six minutes after the play started. Bunnell kicked the goal. Score 6–0.

Wyoming kicked off to our twenty-five yard line and later gained the ball on a fumble. They could not gain but punted 15 yards. Bunnell returned by punting to the visitors' 40 yard line, where a skillful play by Collins caused their back to lose the ball, Collins picked it up and made our second touch-down at the end of ten minutes' play. Bunnell kicked the goal. Score 12–0.

The ground kick by Wyoming was stopped by Collins on our 35 yard line. Short gains by Devall and the backs netted fifty yards. Fifteen yards' gain was made by Bunnell missing a long pass but Wyoming fell on the ball. No gain by their backs caused Loveland to punt to Brady on their 35 yard line. Good gains by Bunnell and Brady pushed the ball along; and Bunnell made the third touch-down and goal. Score 18–0. The first half closed after about fifteen minutes' play.

In the second half, Thomas was substituted for Brady, and coach Griffith, for Beatty. Bucknell kicked off to Wyoming's twenty yard line and the ball was advanced five yards. Rymer lost two yards, and Gendall fumbled the ball. Jennings broke up Wyoming's attempt to punt and fell on the ball. Short gains by Bucknell sent Devall over the line for the fourth touch-down. Bunnell kicked the goal. Score 24–0. Two and one-half minutes had been played.

From Wyoming's kick off to our 35 yard line, Collins carried the ball back 15 yards. Almost immediately a bad fumble was made on our side, and Gendall ran twenty yards with the ball and was thrown by Bunnell. Wyoming made short gains by hard line bucking and the ball had passed our fifteen yard line when Bucknell got it by Wyoming's holding. Dr. Griffith objected in his usual time-killing way and Prof. Hulley was substituted for Mr. Elliot as umpire. Bunnell punted 25 yards. Wyoming could not gain but retained the ball from a ten yard punt out of bounds. Bucknell got the ball on downs and Devall ran almost the whole length of the field but was called back for touching the side line. A large number of short gains carried the ball to Wyoming's fifteen yard line. Bucknell lost it on downs. Wyoming's backs played hard and their line pushed Bucknell's weak defense into our side of the field. Bucknell regained the ball on downs and had started to make gains when time was called with the play in the middle of the field.

The line up was.

Halves, 15 and 20 minutes. Touchdowns—Brady, Collins, Bunnell, and Devall. Goals—Bunnell 4. Referee—Mr. Reynolds. Umpires—Mr. Rohland, Mr. Elliot, and Prof. Hulley. Linesmen—B. W. Griffith, Dr. Griffith, and Mr. Watkins. Time.keeper—Dr. Griffith and B. W. Griffith.

On October 19 Bucknell defeated Pennsylvania College of Gettysburg on the Harrisburg grounds by the score of 50-0. From start to finish Gettysburg was never in the game and Bucknell's smashing guard and tackle plays ploughed great holes in Gettysburg's line. Every Bucknell man played the game as it should be played. However in the matter of gains, Devall, Collins and Elliott excelled. For Gettysburg Captain Moser did the best work. The line up was as follows:

BUCKNELL.	POSITION.	GETTYSBURG.
Jennings - - - - -	center - - - -	Williams.
Lesher - - - - -	right guard - - - - -	Tolan.

25 minute halves. Touchdowns, Devall 4; Bunnell 2; Brady 2; Elliott 1. Umpires, Hickok, Yale; Hulley, Harvard; Referee, Bernheiser, Cornell; Linesman, Ficicinger, Gettysburg.

Y. M. C. A.

The State Convention of the Young Men's Christian Associations of Pennsylvania is in session at Erie. Mr. E. H. Dutton represents the College Association at the Convention.

In the Bible Study Department of the Association four classes meet weekly (Monday evenings) for devotional study.

While the elective work in the curriculum is most thorough and helpful, it lacks that devotional element that is so essential for a constant maintainence and growth of the spiritual life. The study of the Bible in connection with the Association classes is not meant to take the place of this study. On the other hand, each should and does, supplement the other.

Following is an outline of classes, topics, leaders, etc.:

Freshmen . . . . S. R. WOOD,
Life of Christ.

Sophomores . . . . E. C. KUNKLE,
Parables and Miracles.

Juniors and Seniors . . . . . E. ALLEN,
Foreshadowings of Christ.

Alternate for all . . . . . C. W. HARVEY,
Personal Workers' Training Class.

The week of Prayer will be observed by the Association, November 10–16. Meetings will be held each evening during the week. Dr. Lincoln Hulley has kindly consented to conduct the services. This fact alone is a guarantee of interesting services. Special music will be arranged for the meetings. Here is an opportunity for an honor course—one period each day for one week—an opportunity to honor both God and ourselves.

Topics and Leaders for November Meetings:

Nov. 5 . . . . C. W. HARVEY,
What hinders the immediate effort to plant the Gospel in every nation and island and home in all the earth within the next decade?

Nov. 10-16 . . . DR. LINCOLN HULLEY,
Week of Prayer.

Nov. 19 . . . . H. C. FITHIAN,
"White already unto harvest." John 4 : 35.

Nov. 26 . . . . . . H. T. COLESTOCK.
Perfecting of God's Power. II Cor. 12: 1-10.

Mr. J. M. Brodnax, a graduate of Princeton, now traveling Secretary of the Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions, is expected here on Thursday and Friday, Nov. 7 and 8. Mr. Broadnax will present the Student Volunteer Movement in a meeting to be arranged. Every student, if only from the point of education, should be informed on the progress of the world's evangelization. Be sure to hear Mr. Brodnax.

On Tuesday, October 8, our Association received a visit from Mr. McA. Beaver, College Secretary of Pennsylvania. A very helpful joint meeting of the College and Academy Associations was held in Bucknell Hall, addressed by Mr. Beaver.

Local.

Registrar Gretzinger has returned from his vacation.

Mr. Fred B. Hunt holds the position of Assistant in the College Library.

Miss Grace Slifer and Miss Mary Wilson were initiated into Pi Beta Phi on October 11.

"Bob" Burdett will deliver another of his funny lectures here on January 9, 1896, for the benefit of Athletics.

Prof. in Rhetoric—"To understand and appreciate Lowell one must know a great deal. That's why I like him."

Mr. Joe. Shultz is becoming quite interested in the work of the Literary Societies. He attends regularly and participates in the discussions.

Rev. Dr. Hanna, of Pottsville, father of Rev. T. C. Hanna, '95, and A. Judson Hanna, '99, conducted Chapel services one morning last week.

The College Seniors greatly appreciate Dr. Boardman's kind gift of his book, The Problem of Jesus. He sent a copy to each member of the class.

The Sophomore Class has recently enrolled in its membership Miss Mary Wilson. We are glad Miss Wilson has decided to take her college course at Bucknell.

The officers of the College Girls' Association for the following year are: President, Mary M. Wolfe; Vice President, Maude E. Hanna; Secretary, Anna M. Rodgers; Treasurer, Clarissa Fowler.

A glee-club has been organized by the college girls, and a course of earnest, hard practice has already begun. Miss Mary Harris has been appointed Leader, and Miss Rosa L. Hartley, Business Manager.

Both the Presbyterian and Lutheran Synods of the Northumberland District convened in Lewisburg this month. At the invitation of Dr. Harris the delegates of both gatherings visited the Hill and inspected the buildings.

About two hundred students and town people went over to Montandon on a special train Saturday night, to meet our boys on their return from the victory at Harrisburg. The Bucknell Band was along and much enthusiasm was manifested.

A Literary Society for the college women of the University has been organized with the following officers: President, Mary B. Harris; Vice President, Maude E. Hanna; Secretary, Mary Cotton; Treasurer, Anna Gilchrist; Critics, Mary M. Wolfe, Rosa L. Hartly.

The Theta Alpha Literary Society and the Lewisburg Gas Company have come to a mutual agreement concerning the old gas bill. The bill has been settled and the society once more enjoys the luxury of good light. The Gas Company has agreed to put in separate meters for the societies.

The special excursion to Williamsport on Saturday will leave the Reading station at 12.15 P. M. Six coaches will be provided and handsomely decorated with college colors. The Bucknell Band is to accompany the excursion. Returning, the special train will leave Williamsport at 7.15 P. M. Rate for the round trip, 98 cents,

Dr. Harris is expected home to-day from his trip to Chicago and other parts of the West. On Monday, the 21 inst., he addressed the Minister's Conference, in Chicago, and on Tuesday, the 22, he delivered the annual address before the State Education Society, of Iowa, at Burlington. While in Chicago he was the guest of President Harper.

The Local Editor sits musing at his desk, anon glancing out on the railroad, wishing his thoughts would come as the speeding train, and cudgeling his brain for items for the next issue. Just as he has begun to grasp some grand thought, or some mighty conception, down the hall comes the mournful wail—"O-i-i-i-l," and his reverie is broken, alas, to appear no more.

"Congratulations on the appearance of the first issue of the MIRROR for the college year; may its shadow never grow less. I am certainly glad to hear of the great increase in the number of students; in my time it we had as many in the whole College as you have in your Freshman class, we thought we were doing well." These kind words are from an alumnus of the class of '86.

Reynolds reciting in Psychology: "Sensations may be received by grasping an object with the hand, by holding it with both hands, or, in the case of a larger body, by clasping it with the arms." [Here the consciousness of the force of the last clause causes him to laugh.]

Dr. Harris: "It seems to call up some pleasant recollections, Mr. Reynolds."

On Thursday, October 3, a rare treat was afforded the students of the University in the form of Dr. Boardman's lectures on Social Ethics. The students thoroughly appreciate the opportunity to listen to such an able scholar as Dr. Boardman, as was evinced by their close attention throughout the three lectures. The student body stands ready to accord the Doctor a hearty welcome whenever he shall appear at Bucknell.

Improvements are still going on in Bucknell Library, and the students are learning to appreciate more and more the advantages that this department of the University affords them. Recently over fifty volumes for the Theological Alcove were received from Mr. Wm. J. Coxey, of Camden, N. J. Fifteen volumes for the Department of History have also been added. Already the need of a larger room for the library is coming to make itself felt.

Bucknell came down like a wolf on the fold.
Their sweaters were striped with dark blue and gold.
They rushed and they tackled like giants of might
And kicked Gettysburg far, far out of sight.
But they battled like men, like men they forgot
The gridiron scars, each bruised, bleeding spot;
Combed the soil from their hair, then cheered with a will
And kissed, in their minds, fair Camille D'Arville.
O Bucknell! O Gettysburg! come back again
The glory is yours and so is the —pain.

Harrisburg Evening News.

The Press Association held its second regular meeting of the term last Monday evening, Oct. 21. Editor W. L. Kurtz, of the Lewisburg Journal, who has been doing newspaper work since his graduation from Bucknell in '85, was present and addressed the meeting: He outlined the difference in the influence of the metropolitan and rural newspaper and the social standing of their editorial management. He also impressed upon the minds of his audience the necessity of following a policy carefully founded in honesty and integrity. Dr. G. G. Groff was a visitor at the meeting.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Miss Mabel Lovegrove was made happy on Saturday, October 12, by a visit from her parents, Mr. and Mrs. F. G. Lovegrove of Philadelphia.

Miss Wheeler and Miss Emma Kunkle spent Sunday, October 13, at the home of Miss Edna Shires, near Limestoneville, Montour County.

On Tuesday, October 8, Miss Maud Hanna, the president of the Y. W. C. A., welcomed the new members by an initiatory service, held instead of the usual prayer-meeting.

The officers of the Senior class are as follows: President, Miss Mary Williamson; Vice President, Miss Bertha Watkins; Secretary, Miss Emma Kunkle; Treasurer, Miss Gertrude Kase.

A few days ago the hearts of all the girls in the Main Building were made glad by the reception of some new tables. This is another improvement. What may we expect next for our comfort and advantage?

For the past two weeks, on Wednesday afternoons, Mrs. Larison has been quizzing the pupils on Dr. Boardman's lectures. Many of the forcible arguments and bright sayings of the Doctor have thus been more deeply impressed upon the minds of those who heard him.

The young ladies of the Institute, under the direction of Miss Eddleman and Miss Bell, have organized two Literary Societies which will hold their meetings every other week, alternating with each other. It is hoped that a generous rivalry will spring up between the two societies, inciting each to earnest efforts in the cultivation of the forensic and literary art.

Miss Armitage has gone to Philadelphia for the treatment of her eyes. Upon examination by several expert specialists, the affection of her eyes seems to be of a serious nature. Her absence has consequently been prolonged. During Miss Armitage's absence Miss Bell has had charge of the work in elocution. Miss Jennie Jones has also been absent several days on account of trouble with her eyes.

At the annual meeting of the Bucknell Institute Alumni Club the following officers were elected: President, Mrs. Martha Wolfe; Vice President, Miss Annie MacDonald; Secretary, Miss Annie Evans; Treasurer, Miss Florence Van Dyke; Correspondent to Philadelphia Club, Mrs. Mary S. Gretzinger.

Mrs. D. Bright Miller gave an interesting talk on Life in Mexico.

The Institute Class of '97 has elected the following officers: President, Miss Mabel E. Batten; Vice President, Miss Sarah Black; Secretary, Miss Mary Kline; Treasurer, Miss Anna Judd. The preparation for Soiree has already begun and the Fourth Year girls are anxious that their exhibition, in May, shall surpass any that has been given in the past.

Professor Aviragnet has entered upon his work this term with all his wonted enthusiasm. He has organized a French Club which meets each Monday afternoon at 5 o'clock, and which is well attended by the teachers, and ladies of the town as well as by the students who are more advanced in the study of the language. A class has also been organized for the free instruction of all who wish to learn the elements of music. This class meets Thursdays at 5 P. M.

The fact that a number of ladies have now taken up the study of Art under Miss Wood's direction is proof of their appreciation of the excellent work that is being done in the studio. Miss Grace Wales of New York State, who graduated from the Seminary in '69 has come here this term expressly for the study of art. Mrs. Larison, Mrs. Case, Mrs. Edwards, Miss Stoughton, Miss Annie Evans, Miss Darlington and Miss Bastress of Sunbury, are among the ladies who have entered the studio.

The present method of keeping a record of the attendance of the Institute girls upon religious services, is a great improvement on the former plan. Previously it was necessary for at least three of the girls to carry their roll-books to Chapel, and spend all or nearly all of the fifteen minutes, set apart for devotional service, noting who were absent and who present. The system now in use is this:

Each girl has a card on which her name is written. On the left hand side of the card, in a column, are the four requirements: Church service, Sunday School, Sunday Afternoon Chapel and Morning Chapel. Opposite each is a blank space where each girl writes once a week just the number of times she has been present. If absent with an excuse, she may write the word excused. The record of attendance, thus given, is transformed to the regular roll-book at the weekly meetings of the faculty.

ACADEMY NEWS.

Sherman says, 'Gravitation ceased to work in my room the other day, and as a result all was confusion.''

Prof. In Philosophy Class:—"Which way would the Mississippi River flow if the earth revolved in the opposite direction?"

Rowe is enjoying single blessedness, for Devitt is at present spending a week at home. We do not know the exact (?) cause of his going, but we trust that he will return in a better condition.

Until quite recently we were unaware of the existence of a village in our immediate vicinity, bearing the name of Kelly Cross Roads; but on account of frequent visits to that place by one of our number we have become quite familiar with the place.

The practical joker is still in our midst, and as usual some one must suffer for his amusement. The town clock struck the hour of ten, the pale moon cast its soft rays over the earth, and a profound silence reigned. A certain student who lives in one of the Academy buildings, regardless of the fact that study hour had passed, and while busily pouring over his book, was disturbed by what sounded to him like a female voice calling him by name. Mr.— Mr.— came softly to his ear, he goes to the window, shields his eyes with his hand, and searches for the supposed fair one who wishes to see him. Ah ! there she is. Wait a minute, I'll be there. Although he knows that the doors are securely fastened he is not discouraged for the will prepares the way, and almost instantly we see him searching the surroundings, and quietly calling, "where are you?" In vain did he search, for the object had vanquished. The dissapointed young man returned to his room wondering if it was but a dream; no it cannot be. He is right, it was not a dream, but a reality combined in an almost indistinguishable feminine voice, and a stag party costume.

AS THE GIRLS SEE IT.

I took the gentle Anabel
To see a football game.
And thus unto a friend of hers
Did she describe the same:

"Oh, May, you should have seen them play,
'Twas such a lovely sight!
And though the first game I had seen
I understood it quite.

"First came the Yales, all dressed in blue,
Then Harvard came in red
One fellow, the rest all tried
To jump upon his head.

"And there one fellow stopped and stooped,
And all the rest got round;
And every fellow stopped and stooped,
And looked hard at the ground;

"And then the other fellow yelled
And each man where he stood
Just hit and struck and knocked and kicked
At every one he could.

"And then one fell upon his neck
And all the others ran
And on his prone and prostrate form
Leaped every blessed man.

"And then the ambulance drove on,
And, loaded up with men
With twisted necks and broken limbs,
Went driving off again.

"O, football is just the game!
It cannot be surpassed,
But yet it really is a shame
To use men up so fast."

Editorial.

THE Lecture and Concert season has opened. Several entertainments have been arranged. Lewisburg is noted for its good musical entertainments; the music lovers of the town co-operating with the School of Music have brought it about that we are offered only what is first class. For the student, these are opportunities that ought never to be missed. Nothing will so refresh our minds as hearing good things. It wakes one from the dead routine of class-room work, cheers him up and sends him forth with a lighter step.

THE names of those engaging in the various organizations connected with our college life are few. Those who are energetic workers in one enterprise are the ones wanted, and the ones who are found, in the others. Thus the few willing to bear their share of the burden are saddled with the whole load. For instance, one is required to practice at football two hours every evening for the match games on Saturday; twice a week he leads at band practice; he conducts chapel singing every morning; and on Sundays he sings in the choir for which there is a preliminary choir practice. There is opportunity for all, let the work be more evenly distributed.

OF course it is not so, but apparently there is among us more than the usual percentage of those bent on hoarding up knowledge. The picture of a miser gloating over his gold is sad enough. But not more sad is it than that of the young man studying on the way to and from his meals, his head in his book all the livelong day and far into the night; willing to discuss with his fellows (if perchance he at all tolerates such beneficent interruption) nothing but lessons, lessons, lessons. Oh for a brush to paint this second miser! Is he lively? As the last exhumed Ramesis. Has he blood coursing through his veins? As much as have the autumnal leaves, which he scarcely knows are falling.

THEORY and practice! How plentiful the one; how scarce the other! The multitude shout at capital ideas; the few labor to execute them. The student body in a mass meeting applaud and endorse with enthusiastic interest the plans made for a demonstration before a great football game; a paltry dozen carry the banner and parade the town. One student goes without his supper to letter the banner, and then must needs carry it on his own shoulder in the parade because others have done their share in the mass meeting. Marshals are appointed for each class, and at the time for the demonstration find none to marshal except a half-dozen loyal students and a few small boys of exuberant spirits. If all the slumbering eloquence of the marshals and the few loyal students finds expression at the next mass meeting, surely it will outrival Congress as an attraction.

THE ability to do should be developed equally with the ability to learn. Executive ability distinguishes the man-of-affairs from the pedant. There is to be gained, along with the discipline which enables us to learn, a discipline that will enable us to deal with men and circumstances. Insight, tact, capability, which will increase our usefulness many fold, will be the reward of those who take part in college affairs. This, we admit, is an appeal to selfish motives; though it was not selfishness that during past years has made the football men practice night after night, sustain injury after injury, sacrifice any comfort that their team might win,—though in return they received a training that makes men of iron, it was love for Bucknell and a desire that her name might stand well in the college world. And their efforts have met with success. The Press Association, the baseball and track teams have him interests at heart, also. In a sociological comparison between College and Nation, the men helping on these affairs are the patriots, while the student-misers can be compared oniy to those despised creatures who are bent on selfish gain, oblivious of their country's welfare.

Literary.

In nature, trees put forth their leaves,
The birds their nestlings feed;
The farmers sow for future sheaves,
And plough the fields they need,
In the bright and joyous Springtime.

The ice-bound brook sings merrily,
Freed now from Winter's chain;
The tiny flowers grow steadily
Helped by the sun and rain,
In the bright and joyous Springtime.

Our maidens fair at dear Bucknell,
  Are breaking nature's rule;
For new things now they're striving well,
  All loyal to the school,
In the earnest, busy Autumn.

In making melody divine,
Some meet to practice now,
While at the literary shrine,
All gladly, humbly, bow,
In the earnest, busy Autumn.

And best of all, in each girl's heart,
Some strong desires lurk,
With basket-ball to do her part,
And for this cause she'll work,
In the earnest, busy Autumn.

ANON.

THE HERO IN FICTION.

As the passing years indicate transitions on every side in customs, dress and modes of life, perhaps in no department is this change so manifest as in that of literature, and especially in fiction. The very word "hero" implied a man of great bravery, and gave to the production a martial tone. The use of the word to-day, however, has a far broader signification, and with the meaning of impersonating any masculine character who plays the leading rôle, gives the authors of modern fiction a much more extensive field of action than the writers of past times had.

Everyone has his own conception of the hero in the abstract. In some this amounts to nothing save a vague perception of some supposably faultless being; In others the idea is more tangible, and resolves itself into a creation of flesh and blood like ourselves, endowed with special qualities which distinguish him from mankind in general.

In the ideal hero we demand a certain health of mind and manliness, together with the sympathy and tenderness of which great natures alone are capable. That the concrete conception of the hero differs widely in individual minds, is well shown by the endless variety of masculine creations resulting from the press of writers both in our own and other countries.

Illustrative of the union of the past and present characteristics of the hero in fiction, may be mentioned the William Wallace of Jane Porter's "Scottish Chiefs." Of the past in his life of war, of the present in his love for his peaceful home and watchcare over those dependent upon him.

From the happy seclusion of Ellerslie to the sad exile in London tower our admiration of Wallace becomes higher and higher. His consideration for the weak; his unswerving sense of right in the hour of great temptation; his exceeding valor and manly beauty, with his holy love for the sweet bride of his youth, and later for the noble Helen Man, make him "a king among men."

This "Scottish Chief" inspires us with lofty aims. He incites a longing to devote our lives for the good of our fellow-man, sharing alike his "sunshine and cloud". As he loved and sorrowed with those about him, so we give him our truest affection, rejoicing in his joy or mingling our tears with his, at the fall of Corie Lynn and on the wild moors of bonnie Scotland.

A hero of widely different stamp is Tito the Greek, as portrayed by the master-pen of George Eliot in "Romola." Possessed of extreme beauty of person and plausible in manner, his Grecian refinement and learning at once awaken in us a favorable interest. His devotion to the pure Romola also increases our regard, but from the outset Tito seems wanting in that manly quality of unswerving uprightness. Year by year this deficiency becomes more apparent until the retribution of death.

Yet this Greaco-Florentine is by no means a weakling, for strength of will and determination are among his leading traits. Used to proper purpose these would have made him a man of lasting power, but deception, that deadly foe to all nobility of action, completely hinders the development of manly characteristics. Tender though he may seem in his mistaken kindness to Tessa, our righteous indignation is stirred at his neglect of Romola, who, despite her apparent coldness, demands the honor and confidence ever due a wife. The very brilliancy of Tito demands our admiration, while mingled closely with it comes a feeling of regret, and as the pallid face lies motionless upon the wave we sadly murmur, "A wasted life."

Such are the fadeless memorials of Jane Porter and George Eliot, most worthy illustrations of the classics in modern fiction.

Nor are these pre-eminent or above numerous other characters, for English literature is especially rich in these creations, many of them destined to live but for one brief day, while others make for themselves an abiding place even in our very lives.

As the mariner becomes oblivious to all about him in the contemplation of heaven's starry dome, so we in the study of the heroes of refined fiction, are lifted from the petty cares of daily life into the more congenial surroundings of fancy's realm. M. E. H. '97.

RIPON.

It was upon a bright morning in the early spring several years ago that I left York, that ancient English city, midway between Edinburgh and London, for a walk of twenty-five miles toward the west to the fair little city, Ripon.

The walls of York, its cathedral and Roman towers are left and the vast stretch of level country is opened to the traveler's view, who now begins to enjoy the walk over roads almost as smooth as an asphaltum street. During the severe winter the earth had been clad in its immaculate blanket and now all nature seems to burst forth in fulness and, as each farm is passed, the bleating lambs echo the voice of the first season and now the lark starting up from the brown grass, which has not yet been touched by the verdant wand, soars toward the heavens until it is a mere speck in space, while from it come those sweet melodies which have given music to many a poet's verse.

Time, with noiseless step, goes on until the clock of the small town in the distance tells of the hour for dinner.

An enjoyable rustic meal is taken by the side of a playful stream and the principle of Diogones is brought into practice, as the refreshing waters of the brook need no cup to make them agreeable. Such a repast sometimes brings the refreshment of a more sumptuous one and, with renewed strength, urges progress. Owing to the disposition to loiter among the beauties of the way, the horizon begins to hail the approaching sun before the city, which will afford a night's rest, is reached.

The place which we call Ripon does not appear large enough to be called a city, but when we see the great cathedral towering before us, we decide that it is the see of a bishop and use the term "city" expressing that fact.

With the night's refreshment, there comes a desire to see the interesting features of this famous English pleasure resort.

We are directed to a village about three miles from the city. There we find the secluded estate belonging to Lady Mary Vyner. Passing the gatekeeper's house, we enter the large park of five hundred acres and directly in front, about one quarter of a mile away, we see Lady Mary's mansion; but a glance to the right shows us that there is a beautiful church in the park, which may be worth our attention before going farther.

Now, an old guide comes out and for a few pence, offers to take us through the magnificent building. He describes the place with his oft repeated speech and says that the building, complete, cost £40,000, which statement we think incredible at first, as the edifice is no larger than the smallest church of this town. When he takes us into the interior we believe him, as all work there is of the highest class. He, with pride, points to the oak pews and tells us that they are made of American wood and shows the font, the marble of which, says he, was brought from Tennessee.

On the altar decorated with pure gold we admire a cover, around whose borders is some artistic needle work showing the abundance of the same precious metal. The old man tells us that the lady, herself, did the work.

At the utterance of her name he tells us of her great interest in the whole church. "Her son," he continues, "was making a tour through Greece with two companions, in the year 1870, and all fell into the hands of brigands who demanded a ransom of £12,000. Young Frederick Grantham Vyner offered to stay in Greece while the others came to England for the money required.

"The amount was immediately advanced by Lady Mary and one of the party was sent on his way to pay for the release of the young man. After the messenger had reached Greece and was within a short distance of the place where he had left his friend, the Greek soldiers fired on the brigands and compelled them to flee to the mountains. It is supposed that the young Englishman could not make the progress that they wished and, in order to be free from their burden, they slew him. The ransom thus came too late and was brought back to England.

"The anguished mother raised the amount to £40,000 and placed this church on her estate where it could be plainly seen from her house and gave it the appropriate name of The Church of the Consoler."

He directed attention to the Rose Window in the rear of the structure which is circular, in form, and represents, in the centre of its costly glasses the Redeemer. Surrounding Him is the representation of almost every condition of life.

Here, we see the poor laboring man, next to him is the rich, in this well shaded leaf we see the mourner, here the widow, the mechanic, the heart-broken one in affliction, the youth beginning life, the middle aged, and the old man approaching the grave. All in their different conditions have their eyes turned to the most prominent One, Christ, the Consoler. In his stereotyped way, the kind escort says "good day" and we are again left to our own wanderings through the great estate.

Gardens, monuments, palatial stables, roaming deer and majestic swans are all left as we start for the road leading to the city. We reach the great cathedral before the strange thoughts of the solitary estate and the memorial church have faded from the mind.

This great Church of England which is well supplied with bishop, canons, curates and scripture readers, impresses the observer as the most beautiful cathedral of Britain, and though it is not so large as York or St. Paul, yet the carvings and architecture show to better advantage as a greater part of the whole can be seen at one time and the connection of work is not lost, as is frequently the case in the former massive structures.

The guide, with candle in hand, takes us into the Crypt below and as we follow almost breathlessly through the narrow, winding passages, he tells us that these underground ways bear a great resemblance to the Catacombs of Rome, though the eastern corridors are much longer and wider.

After a few hours in the interior of the building, where we read the ancient carvings on the monuments, with their old form of spelling, and admire the oak work of the choir and the brilliant tapestry of the altar; with thoughts turned from the serious to the ridiculous by the grotesque figures in the chapter house, we leave the cathedral, as its deafening bell sounds the sixth hour from noon, and pass through the large square of the city. We read above the court house door: "Except ye Lord keep ye cittie ye wakeman waketh in vain," and are confronted by the sign pointing its great finger to Knaresboro. The beauties of the cathedral, the spacious parks, the curfew bell and evening bugle sounds, are left to the bishop, canons and contented inhabitants.

Athletics.

Franklin and Marshall cancelled the game scheduled for Nov. 2, giving as a reason that their team was not in condition.

There will be no game on the campus Saturday, Nov. 9. The management of the Carlisle Indians asked that the game be postponed until Nov. 16.

The Academy football team defeated an aggregation of town players under the name of the Lewisburg High School, by a score of 10–6, on Saturday, Nov. 2.

Colgate cancelled for Nov. 16. The game was to be played in Sunbury and would have been very interesting. This leaves three games to be played, the Indians here on the 16th, Duquesne C. & A. C. at Pittsburg on the 23rd, and Dickinson at Harrisburg on the 28th. We should win all of them. There is great interest in town and college over the Indian game.

At the Athletic meeting held Saturday, Nov. 2, a new constitution was proposed and adopted. Under it the old officers were re-elected. It provides that the membership fee shall be $1.00 and that season tickets be discontinued. All season tickets of this year will be redeemed A financial committee was elected consisting of Kunkle, Chairman, Registrar Gretzinger, Suiter, Lesher and Bower. This committee has charge of subscription papers and all home games both of football and baseball.

Bucknell's second team defeated the Susquehanpa University team at Selinsgrove, Saturday, Nov. 2, by a score of 16–0. The first touch-down was scored in five minutes after play started. Garner and Catterall played the best game for Bucknell. Susquehanna had the weight but lacked skill in team play. Our boys were accorded fine treatment and speak in praise of the Selinsgrove players.

The summary:

By superior playing in the second half, Pennsylvania State College defeated Bucknell in the annual football contest at Williamsport, Saturday, Oct. 26. Over two thousand people witnessed the game. Of this number, about six hundred from Lewisburg and Bucknell went to Williamsport on special excursion trains. Twenty-two defenders of the orange and blue left on the early Reading train and stopped at the Updegraff hotel, which was appropriately decorated with Bucknell colors. The crowd of admirers of the local team was never more hopeful for victory—many were confident—but all were disappointed when they saw State's flying interference plough through our line and send three men down the field with the ball.

The students of Williamsport's educational institutions—the high school and Dickinson Seminary—all shouted for us. In the grand stand, a bevy of young ladies from Lewisburg joined a large group of Institute maidens in waving the orange and blue and cheering the Bucknell players with songs and an occasional "yah, yah, yoo." Bucknell's supporters occupied the bleachers and several hundred loyal State "rooters" cheered the white and blue to victory on the other side of the oval. All Williamsport wanted to see Bucknell win and many of her citizens left the grounds feeling very sore over the defeat.

The great feature of the game was an absence of brutality, although some foul tackles by State players almost caused injuries, and the presence of outside officials whose decisions met hearty approval. During the game, when Bucknell held the ball, State's ends played as much as a yard offside at times and five or seven men often started in their flying interference without being noticed by the officials.

State had an advantage over Bucknell of three pounds in weight to each player. The judgment displayed by Capt. McCaskey won the game. During the first half, he tired out Bucknell's line by continually rushing his heavier linemen against the opposing centre and tackles, and in the second half entirely changed his tactics and won by breaking through our line and running his flying interference around the ends for big gains.

The first half was a brilliant contest, in which Bucknell had a slight advantage. It was a continual plunging against tackles and centre, by which it is shown that our line is as strong as State's. Cober and Devall, for Bucknell, and the Dunsmores and Thompson, for State, were the giants of the game.

The line-up and officials were as follows:

BUCKNELL.	POSITION.	STATE.
Jennings	center	Murray.
Lesher	right guard	Scott.
Gilchrist, (Davis)	right tackle	J. A. Dunsmore.
Devall	left tackle	J. G. Dunsmore.
Collins	right end	McKibben.
Catterall, Firth, Gilchrist	left end	Curtin.
Herring, Firth	quarter-back	McCaskey.
Bunnell (Capt)	right half-back	Brown.
Thomas, Brady	left half-back	Thomas.
Cober	full-back	Thompson.

Touchdowns: Thompson, 2; Brown, 1. Goals, Thompson, 2. Referee, C. H. Bernheisel (Cornell). Umpire, Dr. Schoff (U. of P.). Linesman, Mr. Adams (U. of P.).—Lewisburg Journal.

Miss Mary Owens, Ex-'96, has returned from Philadelphia, where she has been for some weeks.

Zeta Literary Society was delighted recently with the tasteful bulletin box presented by Mr. Macnab.

Cleeland, when asked to tell of something new, instantly replied, "Neuralgia, pneumonia, pneumatics".

New courses in Human Anatomy, with dissection of cadaver, will be offered next term at Bucknell.

We sympathize deeply with Miss Kate McLaughlin in the sad loss of her father who died Oct. 29.

Miss Mary Wolfe, Miss Anna Rodgers and Miss Vida Davenport cheered for Bucknell in the State-Bucknell game.

Dr. W. R. Harper, President of Chicage University, is expected to lecture at Bucknell during the Spring term.

An Athletic Association has been organized by the College Girls, with a view to forming a basket ball team in the near future.

We had supposed that the Sophs had completed the study of Geometry, but we notice that Elliot is still interested in the Angle.

The College Girls' Glee Club rendered a choice selection of music at the entertainment given by Mrs. Lucia Mead Priest on November 1.

Dr. Hulley, on Tuesday evening last addressed the Bradford County Convention of the Y. P. S. C. E., at Canton, Pa., on the subject: The Bible as a classic.

Prof. H. N. Conser, of Sunbury, was assisting Mr. N. F. Davis in the Laboratory, Saturday afternoon, October 26, in the preparation of Histological specimens.

The Press Association was addressed Monday evening, November 4, by Robert B. McCay, '96, on "The Daily Newspaper in a Town of Ten Thousand Inhabitants."

The bridge over the run on Loomis St. is being repaired. An arch made of double layer of bricks is being put in below the bridge, and it is otherwise being strengthened.

This is what the Williamsport Sun has to say of the conduct of Bucknell students at the State-Bucknell game: The State College boys certainly did not make any friends in this city by their ungentlemanly action. Bucknell, on the other hand, deserves much credit for the gentlemanly deportment exhibited by the football team and the "rooters".

The University sermon for October was delivered in Bucknell Hall, Sunday afternoon, October 21, by the Rev. P. L. Jones, D.D., of Philadelphia. The discourse was thoroughly enjoyed by all who heard it.

D. E. Lewis, '96, was called home recently on account of the serious illness of his father. We are glad to have him back after an absence of more than a week reporting an improvement in his father's health.

The Class of '98 is manifesting its advance in the college world by adopting a class cane. The manipulation of the cane is revealing to more than one Sophomore how difficult it is to be unostentatious in his walk.

For copies of "The New Era", Social Evolution, Our Country, Mavella, besides the Bonie Brier Bush, etc., call at the College Book Store. Here you can get also good editions of the poems of Whittier, Browning, and Tennyson.

The flood of catalogues, circulars, etc. from Medical, Law and Theological schools, which annually overwhelms the Senior Class has begun to pour in—a proof of the keen competition existing between the professional institutions.

The Cabinet of Views of Bucknell University, exhibited in the B. Y. P. U. Convention at Baltimore and at various places in this State by Registrar Gretzinger, is back at Bucknell. The Cabinet may be inspected at the office of the Registrar.

Literary Societies are abundant in the University at present. The College has three, the Academy two and the Institute two. Three of the eight had their birth this year, an additional evidence of the broader spirit pervading the University life.

Arrangements have been made by which graduates of Bucknell, who have taken the courses in Organic Science, will be admitted without examinations to the second year's work in the medical departments of the Universities of Pennsylvania and of Michigan.

Dr. Aviragnet is about to introduce a new feature in the musical department of the University in the form of occasional concerts by the University Band. One concert will be given this term, and two in each of the remaining terms. This new departure will be both practical and enjoyable.

The work of Miss Mary Bartol for her A. M. degree at Bucknell has been accepted by the University of Michigan as part of the work required in the course leading to the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. Miss Bartol is now pursing the studies of the Ph. D. course at the University of Michigan.

On Wednesday evening, October 30, Dr. Harris addressed the New Jersey Education Society, at Camden, on the subject: Characteristics of Christain Education. On the following evening (Thursday) he delivered his lecture on The Fall of Richmond before the Lackawanna Teachers' Institute and the G. A. R. of Scranton.

Prof. in German class: "Owing to the fact that I have some notes for the class to copy each day we will omit prose composition for a few days. In lieu of this the class may take three pages additional to the regular assignment in Irrfahrten each day." A unanimous vote of thanks by the class naturally followed this concession (?).

The street in front of the Institute, between 6th street and the railroad, is being very much improved by the laying of an asphaltum pavement along the North side. When the improvements are complete, the residences along this street will be among the finest in Lewisburg and will aid very much in beautifying the surroundings of the Institute.

The closing session of the Bible institute was held last evening in the Reformed church. The attendance was larger than at any of the previous sessions and Prof. Hulley's lecture on "How to Study Your Bible," was one of the most interesting and practical of the services. The institute has been a great success and all those who attended received both pleasure and profit from the lectures. The attendance at every meeting has been very large and the total attendance has been estimated at over three thousand.—Milton Standard.

Thursday evening, November 7, Dr. Aviragnet tendered a reception to the members of the University Band and students of music. A most enjoyable social evening was spent by all present. Refreshments were served during the course of the evening. Before leaving the Institute the Band played several selections. This social event is only another evidence of Dr. Aviragnet's tireless energy and indefatigable labor in the interests of the musical department of the University. The occasion was the anniversary of the organization of the Band.

The last game of the season on the College Campus will be played November 16. May we appeal to the loyal students to attend this game, not only to cheer for our boys, but also to contribute something towards paying the visitors. There is hardly a student who does not know that the Athletic Association is finanically involved and is making a strenuous effort this season to improve its condition. If all the students will do their duty, the Athietic Association will have enough money to pay the team and a nice surplus to apply to old debts.

On Sunday, Nov. 3, Dr. Lincoln Hulley delivered the first of a series of lectures on selected minor prophets. The prophet Amos was the subject of this lecture. The series will continue through November, a lecture being given each Sunday afternoon in Bucknell Hall, at three o'clock. The public is invited.

Following is the series complete:—

November 3,..........Amos.
November 10,..........Joel.
November 17,....... Janah.
November 24,.......Nahum.

Dr. Hulley has just finished conducting a Bible Institute of seven lectures in the various churches of Milton. At each lecture the church was crowded to the utmost, not less than five hundred being present at any lecture. The Milton press speaks in warmest terms of the lectures. Dr. Hulley has also lectured upon the same subjects in various summer schools. This is a rare treat afforded students and town people.

We now have in the college the Class of '96, the Class of '97, the Class of '98 and the Class of '99, and next year we shall have the class of '00. 'Twill be a perplexing question to determine just how to designate the class in terms of the year of its graduation. We might call them century plants, or, going back to earlier political times for a suggestion, the (k)no(w) nothing (0-0) class. Again, to the Sophomoric mind at least, they might be the naught-y class. The professors might indicate them as the flunkers, or, zero class. It is rather paradoxical that their year-name, suggestive as it will be of the wonderful promises and possibilities of the twentieth century, should be composed of such insignificant figures. We believe, however, that the class will rise above any and all depressing influences that may be suggested by the oddity of the figures and will make a name for itself. In their case, the oft-propounded question, "What's in a name?" may truthfully be answered, "Nothing, Nothing."

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

It speaks well for our athletic spirit, that two teams, one from the College girls and one from the Institute, are vigorously playing basket-ball these beautiful Autumn afternoons.

At the Sunday afternoon chapel in the Institute parlor, the study for the year will be the lives of Bible characters. The life of Moses in its various phases has been the subject thus far; and in addition to our own study we have had the pleasure of two delightful and instructive talks from Professor Martin.

The newly formed Athena Society elected the following officers: Miss Emma Kunkle, President; Miss Margaret Ross, Vice President; Miss Laura Angle, Secretary; Miss Katharine Johnson, Treasurer; Miss Alicia Zierden, Chaplain; Miss Mable Wells, First Critic; Miss Edith Phillips, Second Critic.

A missionary training class has been organized by the Y. W. C. A. The class is under the leadership of Mrs. Hulley. The text-book in use is "The Cross in the Land of the Trident." Much enthusiasm is being manifested in the study by those who have entered the class. Among the members are Mrs. Larison and Miss Eddelman.

The following are the officers of the Kalomathia Literary Society. Miss Mary Williamson, President; Miss Elizabeth Rossiter, Vice President; Miss Ella Bender, Secretary; Miss Emma Probasco, Treasurer; Miss Minnie Morris, Chaplain; Miss Mary Youngman, First Critic; Miss Bertha Watkins, Second Critic. It is to be hoped that the name Kalomathia, which means, "Lovers of the Beautiful" will prove peculiarly fitting to this society and that its fair beginning will be succeeded by a fairer future.

The committee on Missionary Work, appointed by the President of the Y. W. C. A. held their first regular meeting October 13, to consider the organization of a class to pursue the study of Missions. The intention is to take up the work systematically; following the instructions given in a book entitled, "The Cross in the Land of the Trident," compiled by Harlan P. Beach. At the close of the term a review of the work, conducted on the plan of an old time "Spelling Bee," will be given publicly. This has been suggested, to keep up the interest. It is hoped that those who are devoting time to the study of this work will join us in this final Contest. We are glad to have secured the services of Mrs. Hulley as teacher.

The Y. W. C. A. was fortunate in securing Mrs. Lucia Meade Priest of Boston to give her interpretation of some Classic English poems. The following statements will show how great is her power as a reader.

The Professor of Oratory and Rhetoric of Brown University says: "In the interpretation of 'Elaine,' Mrs. Priest has caught the spirit of the poem with a fine sympathy that gives it a living expression."

An extract form a letter sent Mrs. Priest by the General Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. of Norristown is as follows:

"I want to thank you again, in behalf of our Association for last evening's entertainment. People have said to me already 'Be sure and engage Mrs. Priest for next year.'"

All who heard Mrs. Priest, Friday, November, 1, in Bucknell Hall, can heartily endorse the above recommendations. It is to be greatly regretted that her recital came at a time of such an abundance of entertainments, etc.; the attendance was small in consequence. We can bespeak a large audience if Mrs. Priest should come again to Bucknell.

The game at Williamsport, October 26, between Bucknell and State College, developed among the members of the Institute, a true College spirit the depth and fervor of which is well worthy of emulation by our "brothers" on the Hill: Our principal's words, "I give you permission to attend this game only from the feeling that our boys may be incited by your presence to play the better", echoed in our hearts as we took our seats in the car decorated with our University's name and colors. The best places on the grand stand were ours and no prouder wearers of the orange and blue could have been found than the party of fifteen which represented the Institute. The progress of the ball was watched with unflaging interest through the entire game; and, though at the close, we recognized our defeat with unspeakable regret, true to the characteristic trials of woman there sprang up in our hearts a feeling of loyalty and devotion to Bucknell which even victory could hardly have inspired. Our team worked faithfully and well. We are proud of them, and our hope is, that from this defeat may spring the seed of future victories.

ACADEMY NEWS.

Jos. Jeremiah has returned to school again after having spent a week at his home in Scranton.

We are glad to report Devitt back again much improved in health after having spent two weeks at home.

Word has reached us that Mr. A. Anstock, a former student of Bucknell, is dangerously ill at his home in Mahanoy City with typhoid fever.

The Academy football team defeated the Lewisburg High School team Saturday afternoon, November 2, by a score of 10-6. This was the first game for this year's team. Many complimentary remarks have been made concerning the playing of the Cad. team.

Principal Edwards entertained the Academy students last Thursday evening with a genuine Halloween party; games, and charades were indulged in. The most interesting of all, was to see the boys capture an apple from a tub full of water without using their hands.

By the doings of a certain Academy student we recall an adage which runs thus: "Where there's a will, there's a way," for he has found out that the so called "fire escapes," provided for the different departments of the University are convenient for another purpose than that implied from the name, for by this means he keeps one of the fair sex supplied with dainties.

Personals.

'77. Rev. T. J. Collins, late of Scranton, has taken up the work of the Baptist Home Missionary Society in Salt Lake City, Utah.

'79. Rev. George E. Nichols is the pastor of a prosperous young church in the city of New Haven, Conn.

'80. Rev. F. H. Cooper, of the Memorial Church Binghamton. New York, supplied several of the prominent churches of Troy, during his vacation.

Ex-'81. Rev. F. G. McKeever is pastor of the First Baptist Church, New Haven, Conn.

Ex-'82. Rev. Ben. L. Herr, for five years pastor of the First Baptist Church Binghamton, N. Y., has resigned. It is rumored that the First Church of Hartford, Conn., is anxious to secure him as pastor.

'84. M. W. Shreves was recently admitted to the bar of Erie County.

'84. W. L. Kurtz recently delivered an interesting address before the Bucknell Press Association on the subject of "Country Journalism as distinguished from City Journalism."

Ex-'91. T. J. Cross, pastor of the First Baptist Church of Atlantic City, conducted chapel exercises yesterday morning.

'91. On Tuesday evening Oct. 20, the Allegheny Avenue Baptist Church gave a reception in honor of their pastor, the Rev. A. Lincoln Moore, who has just completed his third year of labor among them. The church was beautifully decorated with potted plants and palms. The ladies served a bountiful collation. The following prominent clergymen were present and delivered eloquent addresses: Rev. Chas. H. Thomas, Rev. Bernard MacMackin, Rev. Miles S. Reed, and Rev. W. Ward Willis. Deacon John Coley presided and introduced the speakers. The Rev. W. W. Willis on behalf of the church presented the pastor with a beautiful gold watch as a slight token of their love. During the present pastorate 227 new members have been received, making an average of 75 additions each year.

'93. Mr. Arthur F. Gardner, late instructor in Peddie Institute, Hightstown, N. J., has entered Cornell to pursue a Ph. D. course.

'95, Inst. Miss Florence Stoner is teaching in the graded schools at Berrysburg, Dauphin Co.

Ex-'97. Miss Ruth H. Sprague is this year teaching Latin and French at Darlington Seminary, West Chester, Pa.

Ex-'97. Stephen G. Palmer, late Business Manager of the MIRROR, is assistant professor of Latin and Greek at Antioch College, Yellow Springs, Ohio.

Exchange.

Brown has now over 900 students and it is expected that the thousand mark will be passed next year.

President Harper, of Chicago University, has forbidden all students to join fraternities during their Freshman year.—The Madisonensis.

The time is ripe for an intercollegiate debating league. Dickinson has the material. What do you say Lehigh, Lafayette, and Franklin and Marshall? —The Dickinsonian. Where is Bucknell?

Saturday's game at Annapolis proved quite disappointing. Our boys had an off day and allowed the Naval Cadets to roll up 34 points against them. The Cadets played a fast, snappy game, but indulged in rough tactics and slugging. The "savages" not being up in these "civilized" ways, were placed at a disadvantage, the umpire, a cadet, being unable to see the fouls. In spite of this, our boys put up their usual clean game.—Indian Helper.

We desire to call the attention of the students to the only Latin exchange which comes to our table. The Praeco Latinus (Latin Herald,) published monthly at 1318 Spring Garden St., Philadelphia by Prof. Arcade Mogyorossy. This magazine offords an opportunity to classical students to read in Latin matter pertaining to modern affairs. Prof. Mogyorossy has his own ideas as to how Latin should be taught and his system is entirely orignal and although it has been published but a little more than a year, several institutions of learning have already adopted his method.

Editorial.

ACCORDING to Longfellow's descriptions, Miles Standish had not a very large team with which to fight the Indians.

"Then, too, there are my soldiers my great invincible army Twelve men all equipped, having each his rest and his matchlock."

Braddock, at Fort DuQuesne, tried to win with heavy mass plays, and was badly beaten; Standish, on the contrary, believed in an open game and his men scored frequently. If Young and Herring could only have coached them a little on flying interference, the puritan hardships would have been considerably lessened; for Massasoit would not have cared to schedule another game.

THANKSGIVING is at hand with its train of hearty festivities. Fourth of July is for the Nation, Christmas for Religion, Thanksgiving Day for the family. The three fundamental objects of man's affection are thus strengthened by our three great Holidays. Other celebrations can be but secondary.

As an institution, Thanksgiving Day was many centuries old before it came to America. With how much relish our Teutonic ancestors, off on an all-summer campaign of hunting and fighting, must have looked forward to the brumal home-gathering.

"Let us home,
Our mortal enemy is come
Winter and all his blustering train
Have made a voyage o'er the main.
Fly, fly, the foe advances fast
Into our fortress let us haste,
Where all the roarers of the North
Can neither storm nor starve us forth."

The thankfulness of their hearts for domestic protection and prosperity was proportionate to the bleakness of northern winter and consequently somewhat stronger than our's nowadays.

FOOTBALL has taken a regular place on the Thanksgiving program. The game between Yale and Princeton at New York has been immensely popular and now every village goes out to see a game. Of course, if one were to attend a game in which the Carlisle Indians participate, its appropriatness to the retrospective spirit of Thanksgiving Day is easily seen, and such a game would be greatly appreciated here on our Campus. But any football game, since it accords with the Teutonic love of personal conflict, is appropriate on that holiday of ancestral memories.

NEW YEAR'S EVE is the ordinary time for reflection and resolution; but since this is the end of the football year, a few such for that reason, will, not be inappropriate.

First. State College, judging from the past and present, can never be trusted to play a team of strictly college men. Second. William Young, on account of his commanding personality, is the man par excellence to develop team play. Third. That since he is no longer playing, a coach like Hering, who will put on a jacket and play and who has been freshly coached, is necessary if we wish to be up with the new plays. Fourth. The Harrisburg game coming before the State game was a fatal error. Fifth. That a liberal treatment of the Press is eminently advantageous, Manager Thompson, of State, to the contrary notwithstanding. Sixth. If properly advertised a game on the Campus can be made a financial success.

HARVARD, Yale and Princeton were compelled a few years ago to acknowledge Pennsylvania as a fourth great team. But since Michigan played Harvard; Brown, Yale; Lafayette, Cornell; and Cornell, Princeton with such close scores, those old time magnates must see that the monopoly of football science is broken and that the laurels are open to widespread competition.

Dr. Perrine in an article appearing in a late University Magazine has proved also that the larger colleges have not a monopoly on educational advantages. His arguments in brief are as follows: "(1) The tendency of the large college in or near a large city is toward artificial, local, temporal aspects of life, while that of a small college is toward meditation on what is fundamental resulting in fixed ideals of character and conduct. (2) The extremes to which athletic, social and religious enterprises are carried affords refuge for the non-student from the discipline of the college curriculum. (3). The formation of aristocracies of wealth and the destruction of democratic ideas is incompatible with liberal scholarship. (4). The close association and interchange of ideas among students which forms an important part of an education, is unknown in large classes. (5) The elective system is carried so far that a person can graduate wholly deficient in some sides of culture. (6) The commercial and specializing atmosphere instead of the spirit of sound education is prevalent at the large colleges. Bucknell stands for what is best in the line of college education, the term University being a misnomer since the Theological department has been removed."

THE ORANGE AND THE BLUE.

Hail to the colors that usher the morning!
Orange and blue in the gates of the day.
Sing to the colors, the sunset adorning;
Orange and blue lead the matchless array.

CHO.—Hold up the colors of Bucknell on high;
  Orange and blue till they dazzle the eye.
  Shout for old Bucknell. Merry old Bucknell!
  Ring out her sky-rocket cry.

Hail to the colors the rainbow bends o'er us!
Orange and blue on its arches of light.
Sing to the stars as they ride on before us;
Orange and blue in the glimmering night.
CHO.—Hold up the colors of Bucknell on high; etc.

Sing to the colors that dance in the waters;
Orange and blue where the bright ripples play.
Sing to fair Bucknell, her sons and her daughters;
Orange and blue in the thick of the fray.
CHO.—Hold up the colors of Bucknell on high; etc.

Sing to the maidens who live in her story;
Brimming blue eyes in our visions we see.
Sing to the gridir'n's mad battle for glory;
Orange and blue in the wild victory.
CHO.—Hold up the colors of Bucknell on high; etc.

THE COLLEGE-GRADUATE IN MEDICAL SCHOOLS.

(From the Medical News).

Can the college-graduate properly take advanced standing in a medical school requiring four years' attendance on lectures? Most medical schools have answered in the affirmative, and admit to the second year's work graduates of literary and scientific colleges who have pursued certain biologic studies. The University of Michigan goes further and admits to the third year in the medical department the graduates of its own literary department who have pursued a prescribed course of study in biological subjects.

The preliminary studies required of the college-graduate who desires to enter the second year in medicine by the University of Pennsylvania, are General Biology, Comparative Anatomy, Botany, Chemistry, Physics, Histology of Plants and Animals, Human Anatomy, Physiology, Zoology, and Embryology. The University of Michigan (medical department) devotes the two first years wholly to laboratory-teaching, and the third and fourth years to practical medicine and surgery. The branches taught the first year are General and Organic Chemistry, General Anatomy, Bacteriology, Physics and Histology. During the second year the subjects are Regional and Surgical Anatomy, Anatomy of Nervous System, Hygiene, Embryology, Physiology, Physiological Chemistry, Histology, and Electro-therapeutics.

The preliminary subjects required at the University of Pennsylvania are now taught in all first-class colleges. If human anatomy cannot be practically taught at a rural college, this branch can readily be made up when the student enters the medical school. The question next arises, Can ordinary colleges do a second year's work, such as is mapped out by Michigan University, if the amount of laboratory-work there required is desirable? The answer given is that, with the present rate of development in the smaller colleges maintained for a few years, they will generally be equipped to do this amount of work. If this work is desirable, it can be done better in the biological department of a non-medical school than elsewhere. Whoever has passed through a medical college knows how difficult it is for the student to concentrate his efforts on subjects which he thinks do not directly bear on medicine. Thus he cannot, and does not, study chemistry as he studies anatomy or materia medica. But in a non-medical college chemistry is pursued without any such difficulty as is experienced in a medical school. The cost of living is generally less in the small towns where literary colleges are situated than in the large cities. There is also much less to attract the attention of students from their studies. The disadvantage which is seen is that the study of practical medicine is postponed for two years, and the course is shortened by that much time. To this it may be answered that the college man who has had a thorough course in Biology, ought to be able to do as much in two years in a Medical School, as the High School man does in four. Also, one or two years in hospital or post-graduate work will be of more value to college graduates than the same time spent as undergraduates in a Medical School, no matter how excellent it may be. It is believed if college men have the advantages of preliminary training recognized, that they will generally enter hospitals and post-graduate schools, before beginning to practice. It would be no more difficult at the present time to maintain preliminary medical schools to do two years' work in such places as Meadville, Lancaster, Easton, Bethlehem, Lewisburg and other smaller towns, than it is now to mantain medical schools at Burlington, Vt., Hanover, N. H. and, as was done in the past, at numerous villages and small towns, all over the country.

Is it desirable to do this work in the literary college? I believe that it is desirable to have as many cultured and broadly educated men in the medical profession as possible. I think the doing of this preliminary work in the colleges offers one solution of a serious problem which confronts the educators of to-day. The preliminary requirements of the literary and scientific colleges are greater now than they were a generation ago, by fully two years. The medical courses have also been lengthened from two courses of four or five months to four full college years, or made fully four times as long as formerly. Certainly four or five more years' time are now required to take a thorough collegiate course, and then a professional course at a University, than was required a generation ago. Many young men are cutting the Gordian knot, by entering the Universities at once on leaving the High School. The Universities on their part seem to offer but little opposition to the entrance of these untrained and unprepared men. Is it true, as was remarked a few years ago, by the Dean of a Pennsylvanian Meidcal School, that "the chances of making a good Doctor are better when the material is a boy from a shop or store, rather than a College Graduate.

BUCKNELL UNIVERSITY. GEO. G. GROFF.

NOTE.—For three years past, Bucknell University has prepared students for the second years' work in Medical Schools of the standing of the Universities of Pennsylvania and Michigan. These students have done well, maintaining good positions in their classes. There is no doubt at all, that if it is to become the settled policy of the Medical Schools to require two years of preliminary Laboratory work before what might be called practical medicine is taken up, then this work can be done fully as well if not better in the College than at the Medical Schools. Provided always, that the Colleges are equipped in Professors and apparatus. To do one year's work properly will require at least three instructors and equipment. While for the second years' work not less than two additional instructors will be needed. That professional schools can still be maintained in small towns is seen in the success of the Universities of Michigan, Wisconsin, Vermont and Virginia, all of which are located in small towns, and each of which has a flourishing Medical School. In Pennsylvania, Dickinson College has a law school with nearly 100 students. For the advanced student the city offers certain undoubted advantages, but for the beginner, the small town offers some advantages no less real. G.

ORIGINALITY IN ESSAYS AND ORATIONS.

My calendar reads for to-day: "November 6, Wednesday. Originality consists quite as much in the power of using to purpose what it finds ready to hand as in that of producing what is absolutely new. Lowell."

There is something decidedly attractive to the student in that word originality, and my eye rested for some minutes on the little passage from the thought of our famous American. To some, the idea of being original has become a little god, and daily they worship at its shrine. The results we can see in the original renderings of Latin, Greek or German passages, or in the original proofs supposed by their keen minds to be so much better than the ones printed in the Geometry. According to Lowell, the student who knows how to use his text-book is the original pupil. Some, we have observed, seek for originality in this particular line, and succeed in using their books in class in a way quite different from the way laid down by the fathers of education, viz, the class ahead of them.

But it is the essayist and oration-writer who desires most to be original, and to that long-suffering, much-to-be-pitied and often ill-appreciated class this article is addressed.

The way to fame in literature is often thought to be along the line of originality in thought. Examine the novels that have lived to be read by the middle-class people, and those of the present day which the critics say will have a long-lived popularity, and try to find originality of thought. Look in Dickens's stories; in Uncle Tom's Cabin; in Ramona; in Adam Bede, and, perhaps, in Jane Eyre; among the latest books, in Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush. The foregoing will be sufficient to exemplify the principle. In all these we find recital of common life, with no attempt to give the world something that it does not already know by experience. What are the most popular poems? Are they, in Wordsworth, the Ode on Immortality, or We are Seven? in Tennyson, In Memoriam, Maud, or I'm to be Queen of the May and Dora? in Bryant, Thanatopsis, or A Forest Hymn and Little People of the Snow? Among the poets, who is the people's? Is not Longfellow? Yet for greatness of thought he does not compare with Browning, Lowell, Whittier or Tennyson. Pope strove after originality of thought and is neither popular nor yet capable of being correctly classed with poets or prose-writers. Confidentially, just between you and me, he is a prosy verse-maker.

In all these we find a simple portrayal of the romantic side of life, not dissertations on the proper modes of thinking or doing. Real men and women figure in this literature; not always "true to life;" to be sure, yet never untrue to life. The secret of their wide and continued popularity is in the use of things "ready to hand" to a purpose. They have sought for no new truth, but has been caught in all its varying attitudes, and, gay or sad, sober or riotous, laughable or pitiable, transferred life size to the author's canvass.

> " . . . the everydayness of this work-day world"

The mighty struggle of a John Valjean belongs not to the common people, but the suffering of Uncle Tom and Eliza do in a sadly strict sense even to-day; there are times when we want to think for a few minutes with Rabbi Ben Ezra, but the finest trained intellect finds true relief during grief-stricken days in the story of Marget Howe and her "lad o' pairts;" Maud and Enoch Arden do not move in the same world, but in Enoch Arden we find the "C major," the common chord of life. It is to the romantic side of our life that this literature appeals; and by romantic I do not mean the sweet-heart sort alone, but the experiences under which our thoughts leave the every-day toil for bread because a dear one is about to take some important step in life, or a happy event occurs, or a loved one wanders away and is "missed," or Death reaches into the monotony of our lives and creates a change,—but not the wished for change. And he who can picture human life in these days and not offend is the popular writer. May we not say he is the original writer, because these events are always "ready to hand?" They are the bonds that make the world akin, and strive as we may to call the educated and rich the "better class," we come to know after all that life lies not in the brain but in the heart.

"Reason's not a thing that weeps!"

This use of the common things of life Ruskin has made famous in the purest of literature, but because he has rather confined himself to the inanimate common things and has written in a style that the majority of people cannot appreciate, he has yet to attain a wide popularity. We may say that in choice of material he fulfils Lowell's definition of originality as above quoted, while Shakespeare fulfils it even better because he never travelled, but confined himself strictly to scenes close at home. Yet Shakespeare is not a writer "of the people." Both of these writers carry the idea too far and their reasoning, begotten of the true impulse, wanders into abstractions which the popular audience cares not to follow. Let no one misjudge, and think I imply that Ruskin and Shakespeare did not use their subjects "to purpose." They did. I am simply endeavoring to point out the reason of their failure in attaining popularity among all classes. Howells sees his star paling because of his ultra-realism, literature of a more refined type than Zola's, but of too detailed a nature. The people demand idealized men and women, for if a man's ugliness crops too plainly to the surface it mars and even conceals the beautiful sides of the same character. Unfortunately the public eye sees all too easily the evil in our lives, while the good must needs be called to its attention repeatedly and in almost oriental hyperbole, or it forgets our better natures. Hawthorne's well-nigh perfect prose is all we can ask in expression, yet he chose the uncommon rather than the universal experience of man, and it is for this reason that he is not widely popular.

You may be saying: "What has this to do with my next essay or oration?" Just this. When you first say, "What shall I write about?" if an essay, think of an event of peculiar interest in your own life or of some friend's, and write it so as to impart encouragement, pleasure or an uplifting influence to the lives of common people. At all events, write with a purpose higher than simply to tell the story. Think out the teaching it contains, and bend all forces to that one end, omitting details that do not pertain thereto, except as they enliven, and even then they are to be used sparingly. By all means make the lesson plain without appending a moral; only an antiquated Aesop would be guilty of such a breach. Most people like to be of the opinion that they have formed their own conlusions, and he who can influence the mind of the reader or hearer to draw the conclusion aimed at accomplishes more than he who must distinctly state his moral. The end in story writing is, first, to have something to teach, and, secondly, to convey it in the most attractive and forceful form. If an oration is to be written, decide upon a favorite study and defend it; or learn of the political situation here or at home and make a stump speech; uphold the publishing of L' Agenda; produce valid arguments against football, and be able to convince a student audience that you are right; or uphold self-government among students such as is carried out at Princeton and Cornell; or choose a scholastic subject of common interest.

True originality in essays and orations lies not in new thought expressed in hackneyed phrases, but in hackneyed thought expressed in new phrases, dressed in the very best Rhetoric, and abounding in figures introduced solely for the sake of making the thought clear. An effort to be original in expression will lend interest to an otherwise distasteful exercise, add vivacity to the production, cultivate a successful mode of writing, and inevitably stimulate thought in unexpected lines.

Athletics.

The second team has a game scheduled with the Williamsport High School eleven on Thanksgiving day. The game is to be played at Williamsport.

A statement on the bulletin board shows that $200.35 was the net receipts for the Indian game. This is a good showing and speaks well for the management of the finance committee.

The team is practicing hard for the last game of the season. We play Dickinson on Thanksgiving day and arrangements have been made to play the game in Sunbury. No doubt a great crowd will attend as trains can be run from points both up and down the road.

The Bucknell team met and defeated the crack team from the Carlisle Indian School on the campus last Saturday, the 16th. Judging from the fact that Yale managed to score only 18 points against the Indians, many expected our team to be beaten and some did not expect it to score. But their calculations were away off as was demonstrated by the final score of 18–4 in our favor. And then our team won on its merits and by playing good, straight football while the four points made by the Indians resulted from a trick, the criss-cross. All in all it is a game to be proud of and too much praise cannot be given to our football team. The excellent coaching of William Young of Williamsport for a week previous to the game accounts in a great measure, for the improvement, seen in the interference and tackling. The game started with the ball in B. U's possession. Catterall kicked off and Bucknell had the ball in short order on four downs. Then, without losing the ball, a touchdown was made by Elliott, four minutes after play started. Goal. Score, 6–0. Indians kicked off and after a few gains were forced to punt. Shortly afterwards B. U. got the ball on downs and then Collins made his famous run of 60 yards to Indians 40 yard line. Short gains by Devall and Collins and then Collins made the second touchdown. Goal. Score, 12–0. Kick-off by Indians, the ball being caught by Hering and passed to Gilchrist for a short gain. Thomas, Devall and Collins made gain but ball was lost for offside play. Indians were forced to punt, the kick was blocked and Bucknell had the ball on 15 yard line. Small gains were followed by Collins making the 3rd touchdown. Goal. Score, 18–0. After the kick-off time was called with the ball on the Indians, 40 yard line. Second half. Indians kicked off. The ball changed hands several times and there were also exchanges of punts. The Indians were playing desperately and B. U. had plenty to do. At this point Hering was hurt and Firth took his place. Catterall was called on for a punt but the ball went too high and the Indians got it. On lining up the criss-cross was worked and Jamison made the first and only touchdown for the Indians. No Goal. Score, 18–4. Bucknell kicked off and the ball was punted in return. After a few plays Pierce punted 40 yards and on the line-up Catterall punted back 25 yards. Time was called as Pierce made a ten yard run. Final score, 18–4.

Mr. J. M. Brodnax, traveling Secretary of the Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions, was with us during the 6, 7, 8 insts. of this month. Very helpful meetings were held with Mr. Brodnax by the Bands of the College and the Institute, and a general student meeting in Bucknell Hall on the evening of the 7th.

Apropos of this mention of Mr. Brodnax's visit we desire to supplement invitations already given to all students to attend the meetings of the Volunteer Band on alternate Thursday evenings from nine to ten o'clock. One is not necessitated to become a volunteer for Foreign Missions by attending these meetings. The meetings will, however, prove interesting and helpful to all students interested in the progress of the eastern world. The Band is now pursuing a line of study based on "The Cross in the Land of the Trident," by Rev. Harlan P. Beach, Educational Secretary of the Movement. All meetings are held in the Association Rooms.

We are now prepared to announce the additional improvement in the Association Rooms of which mention was made in a recent issue. A new pulpit, or stand, lamp has arrived, a gift from the College Faculty. The new lamp is a beautiful piece of work in bronze, having an opaque cylindrical shade with side hood, which prevents the light from shining into the eyes of all present and throws it directly upon the book or manuscript of the leader. A fine oak table, also the gift of the Faculty, accompanies the lamp. The Association greatly appreciates the kindness of the Faculty and their interest in this department of the University.

Miss Clarissa Fowler is a newly initiated member of Pi Beta Phi.

The Bucknell University Club of Philadelphia will hold the annual banquet at the Colonnade Hotel, Monday evening, December 2, at six o'clock. Orders for covers should be sent as early as possible to the secretary, Rev. R. B. McDanel, Oak Lane, Philadelphia.

The following young men from Crozer Theological Seminary will act as a glee club at the December banquet of the Philadelphia Alumni Club: F. I. Sigmund, W. A. Crawford, G. H. Waid, W. T. Pauling, Jr., C. W. Williams, A. E. Finn and Rev. T. S. Fretz, of Beverly, N. J.

The contributed articles in this issue are particularly pertinent and practical.

A Council of Jr. O. U. A. M. has been organized in the College. The order has now about thirteen members. The Mirror extends best wishes to this new organization.

Miss Kate Goddard represented the Institute Association at the state convention of the Y. W. C. A. which was held at Bloomsburg on the 15, 16, and 17, of this month. A number of others also attended the meetings, among whom were, Miss Maud Hanna, Miss Mary Chambers, Miss Anna Rodgers, and Miss Vida Davenport.

The college-bred woman of to-day is useful as well as highly intellectual. The Sophomore girls of our own Bucknell are a striking example of the useful, and will furnish instruction in bread-making to any-one who will give them a day's notice. The Junior girls can prove "from experience" that clothes "freeze dry" in winter time before they have reached the clothes line.

The Juniors write orations! Listen to the triumphant march of this conclusion! "Song is a great thing! How great a thing it is cannot be learned in lands where a Patti stands at every dishpan, a Jennie Lind over every washtub, and a Christine Nelson at every scrubbing-brush; but go to the lands where song is a wild and gutteral groan, where the mother's lullaby is a war-whoop, and—where college boys abound. Then, indeed, will you appreciate song. Truly song is a great thing!"

We know that every student has rejoiced in the many evidences of advance in the University which this school year has furnished. This advance is seen in all departments, although in some departments not by all the students. This last is true in reference to the work of the University Band. Not since its organization has it possessed such talent as at present. The bi-weekly practice has resulted in greatly improved playing, both by individual members and by the Band as a whole. That both students and town people may have an opportunity of measuring for themselves the advance in this department, on the evening of December 6, will be given in Bucknell Hall the first of a series of concerts of which brief mention was made in the last issue of the Mirror. The program will consist of selections by soloists, a quartette, orchestra and the Band. This department of the University activity deserves the earnest coöperation of the student body. Be sure to attend the concert and spend a pleasant evening with the Band. Talent from the Institute and town will assist.

A new feature in connection with football games was introduced last Saturday. Notwithstanding the large number of tickets printed for the game, there were not enough to supply the large crowd in attendance. The committee was forced to use whatever was at hand, and the most available thing seemed to be a small vest-pocket edition of the Proverbs. Consequently, the leaves of this book were made to do duty for tickets. It was rather amusing to see a dignified deacon, fearful of the result of the game, reading, "Boast not thyself of to-morrow; for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth." Fancy a "Sunburyian," calling himself an "Indian," yelling against Bucknell, fancy him glancing at his ticket and reading, "Delight is not seemly for a fool," or another reading, "Pride goeth before destruction, and an haughty spirit before a fall. Better is it to be of an humble spirit with the lowly, than to divide the spoil with the Proud." The energetic business man read with a complacent smile, "Seest thou a man diligent in his business? he shall stand before Kings; he shall not stand before mean men." A poor, innocent, gullible individual, a victim of innumerable practical jokes, read with a sigh, "The simple believeth every word: but the prudent man looketh well to his going." What acomplimentary ticket would have been the leaf with the following passage: "O ye simple, understand wisdom: and, ye fools, be ye of an understanding heart."

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

The pretty little pin of the class of '96 was designed by Miss Emma Sieber.

Miss Carrie Folmer has gone home for a few days to recover from an attack of tonsilitis.

The girls Athletic Association has secured the services of Mr. Hering as coach for the basket-ball teams.

We are sorry to say that Miss Esther Green may be unable to return to Bucknell this term on account of ill-health.

The girls of the Institute, under the direction of Mrs. Larison, have been meeting Sunday afternoons for the study of Moses. This work will be deferred, that they may avail themselves of the opportunity to learn of Amos, Joel, Jonah, Nahum.

Mrs. Larison attended the luncheon of the Philadelphia Alumnae Club on Monday afternoon, November 18. The topic for general discussion was "Is the New Woman any Improvement upon the Old Time Lady?" During her stay in the City she was entertained at the home of Mrs. F. W. Tustin.

The Bible Lectures, given by Dr. Lincoln Hulley in Bucknell Hall, at 3 o'clock Sunday afternoons, beginning with Nov. 3 and ending with Nov. 24, have been attended by large and appreciative audiences. These lectures have taken the place of the Sunday afternoon chapel held in the parlor of the Institute.

The Eighth Annual Convention of the Young Women's Christian Association of Pennsylvania was held at Bloomsburg, November 15–18, 1895. The delegates from the schools of the state found the Bible study and college conferences especially helpful. A spirit of prayer prevailed throughout the convention which adjourned with an increased desire on the part of all present to do better work in their respective fields. The Bucknell delegation included the following: Misses Kate Goddard, Maud Hanna, Emma Kunkle, Minnie Morris, Martha Jones, Anna Rodgers, Mary Chambers, Vida Davenport.

The young ladies at Mrs. Larison's table very much enjoy helping to entertain the occasional guests seated there. It often happens that the charm of personality is most enjoyed when we meet a public speaker in the moments of his leisure and unrestraint. This we have known to be true in the case of the distinguished guests whom the Institute has had the honor of entertaining this term,—Dr. Boardman, Mrs. Priest and our latest guest, Mr. James M. Brodnax, Traveling Secretary of the Student Volunteer Movement. His courtesy, his skill in repartee, his breadth of sympathy and his zeal and enthusiasm in his work won for him the favor, not only of the students, but also of our worthy principal. We should certainly hail with delight a second visit from any of these three, who, during their stay, so graciously made themselves "one of us."

The November meeting of the Lewisburg Alumnae Club was attended by an unusually large number of the members. The ranks of the faithful few who graduated in the sixties, being reinforced by the vigorous young life of '93, '94 and '95. The President, Mrs. Martha Wolfe, occupied the chair. Plans were made to ensure the adherence to a single line of study for the year. The program for the evening was devoted to a consideration of the life and work of that greatest of recent American poets, Sidney Lanier. A brief sketch of his life was read by Mrs. Martin. The speaker enlisted the sympathy of all her hearers in the man whose genius burned so brightly in the midst of the shadows of disease and poverty. Mrs. Larison reviewed his work as a musician and a poet, telling us of his early struggles to decide what his life work ought to be, and then telling of his heroic devotion, in the face of severest privation, to that life-work, to which he had been divinely called. She also read several extracts from his writings, including the inimitably beautiful and pathetic story, "Hard Times in Elfland." A violin solo by Miss Lawshe accompanied by Miss Mary Thornton completed the program.

Basketball has taken the Bucknell girls by storm, and great interest was felt in the match game between the College and Seminary girls on the 20th. The game was an exciting one to the players, but more so to the onlookers, whose sympathies were about equally divided between the two teams. Mr. Mulkie umpired the game, and Mr. Slifer acted as referee. Twenty minute halves were played, and the game was pronounced a good one. The College girls won by a score of 3 to 2. Both sides did excellent team work considering the short time they have practiced. The players comprising the College team were Miss Wolfe, Captain; Misses Harris, Taylor, Thomas, Chambers, Lillibridge, Goddard, Gilchrist and Henrietta Allen. The Seminary team consisted of Miss Bell, Captain; Misses Church, Campbell, Wells, Zierden, Youngman, Bastrons, Kase and Lovegrove. Dr. Aviragnets kind generosity provided a box of candy for each member of the winning team, and he also presented the umpire and referee with the colors of the teams, together with a sovenir pin in the shape of a small silver buckle. The two teams met after supper, magnanimously shook hands all around and merrily devoured the candy, thus burying the hatchet until the next contest between the blue and the red.

ACADEMY NEWS.

Mr. Robert Brady has been noticed among the visitors in the Literature Class the past several weeks.

Certain male members of the 8.15 A. M. Algebra class have found out that glass is a good transmitter of sound.

"Say, Pearse, don't idle-away valuable time in the Algebra class, you know the Prof. said that he would make necessary arrangements."

The Third Form has adopted the red rose as class flower, and maroon and white as the class colors. The class also has an organized a football team.

A certain Academy student is negotiating for bids for a placard to read thus, "Please pass the cakes," which he wishes to hang at his place at the table.

The Academy library has been enlarged by the gift of twenty-five volumes of the Century Magazine substantially bound in half calf, which is highly appreciated by the students.

Many nonsensical questions are heard in the class room. This is what was asked in Bible class to-day, "Do you think, Prof. the devil knows that he will be burned up some day?"

Those who read the MIRROR last year will remember reading about several Academy students who had regular races to get down town first in the evening. We notice that Pierson has entered the race this year. Where does he go?

Editorial.

THE next number of the MIRROR has been entrusted to the College Girls' Association. They will select their editors and conduct all the work now done by the staff. The Woman's Edition of the Press was in some particulars better and in some far below the regular edition of that daily, but the readers of the MIRROR are hereby warned that the Woman's Edition of this paper will surpass their most sanguine expectations.

WHAT a glorious thing to end the season with victory! Several seasons, oftener than otherwise, we have finished with a demoralized and consequently defeated team. The game at Sunbury was a success in every way. Our tendency to fall to pieces at the end of the season was for a great part due to lack of energy. The players who then controlled affairs, wearying of the game, failed to keep up hard practice, but now a strong-willed executive board spurs them on to the very finish.

HALF of the meetings of the University Literary Societies were broken up this term by entertainments and socials connected with the school. There are two societies in college and two in the academy, meeting (supposedly) on Friday evening. To have a good society the meetings must be held regularly, and that is impossible unless those who have the matter of arranging concerts in charge make some change. Let us either recognize the fact that such societies exist or dispense with them altogether. The present travesty is disgraceful.

SEVERAL of the students take a daily run around the four mile course after school hours. An excellent scheme for exercise, especially for those engaged in sedentary work. Perhaps it would prove popular to start up hare and hound, the great English game. There is plenty of room for cross-country runs between the football and skating season.

Basket ball is a splendid game; the only difficulty is that we don't understand it. If a team could be organized and five or six match games arranged with neighboring teams, much delightful exercise would result. And that is perhaps the only way to develop the game.

Hand ball is a simple game apparently, requiring little apparatus. It develops agility and endurance more than tennis. (There is place for all of these.) Arrangements could probably be made by which those engaged in them might be excused from drill work, which to some is extremely irksome.

WHAT electives are you going to take? With this question the Junior and Senior are greeted on every hand. One youth remarked that he liked nothing in school life so much as the choosing of his studies. Just as the epicure skilfully culls from his bill of fare, the student gazes on the bulletin board to see what he wants most. The futurus newspaper man selects literature and history; the physician, laboratory studies; the preacher, Hebrew and Bible, and the lawyer, logic and history. During the college course one can discover what profession he wishes to enter, and nothing helps him so much as the electives of his last two years. It approaches specializing, but is not really such; and since the many electives have been added studying has greatly increased. And many, who showed no ability in Latin, Greek and mathematics, now enjoy their work and can be called first rate students.

MY LOVE.

My Love has gone off and left me,
He has gone to a far away land.
I remember the kiss that he gave me—
I long for a grasp of his hand.

My Love has gone off and left me,
But he told me to bear still in mind,
Though he wandered the wide world over,
His heart he had left behind.

My Love has gone off and left me,
And perchance I shall see him no more;
But my heart shall ever beat faithful
To him, as it beat of yore.

My Love has gone off and left me,
He has gone to a land far away;
And I long to hear his fond words again—
I wait for him day after day.

BUCKNELL BROWNIES' THANKSGIVING MEETING.

Mr. Cox has entirely overlooked the Brownies that live at Bucknell. You never have seen them, you say? Why! they are everywhere, though invisible. They eat wherever mind is superior to matter; they drink filtered water, and when there is no filtered water, why they don't drink, that's all. They sleep generally in the literary halls; it's so dry and jolly sleepy there. The baby Brownies dress in a delicate bright green. Everybody knows that, and they kick at everything, and fight; why! sometimes their heads are so swelled that even their hats fly off on a tangent. Two-year old Brownies always carry canes; they seem to think that if they look old and decrepit, wisdom will take up her abode with them. Ah, me! "What fools these mortals be!" Three-year old Brownies are things of beauty and a joy forever. They are not meteors shooting into the sky and staying only long enough to gobble a banquet or have a scrap and then go out into everlasting nothingness. Ah, no. They are like the ever-shining, beneficent sun.

Four-year old Brownies! Parbleu! Have you ever seen a painting such that, as you stood before it, it seemed but a daub of all colors, red, brown and blue, violet and white, and orange and white; but when you looked at it from a distance, a great distance, however, it "wasn't so bad". Well, something of the same effect is seen in the Brownies of four years' standing. Occasionally the Bucknell Brownies live to be posts, but not often, not often. Then there are the little heathen Brownies, some of whom live on the hill and some in the vale below.

The first time I saw the Bucknell Brownies was at a mass meeting last Thanksgiving night. The committee appointed to make arrangements decided on Bucknell Hall as the place of meeting, because they could have all the gas lighted, and yet no one know that anything was going on. At eight o'clock the little heathen Brownies, and the one-year olds, and the two-year olds, and the three-year olds, and the four-year olds, and the posts came rushing and tumbling into the hall. They perched everywhere, on the backs of the chairs, on the clock, on the pictures, on the windows, here, there, everywhere.

The meeting was called to order by a post, who had been unanimously chosen chairman. There was instant silence when he rose to speak. He was a post. "Dear friends," he said,—the one-year olds and the two-year olds glared at each other—"Dear friends, this is a thanksgiving meeting. Let us hear from every Brownie here." Then the post sat down and there was silence. It was at length broken by a Brownie sitting on a gas jet. "I'm so thankful I'm a Sophomore."

"Ah!" said the post.

"Oi-oi-oi-oil," said the rest.

"And I'm so thankful I don't seem green," said a baby.

"Rock-a-bye baby" was then feelingly sung.

"I'm glad I know Psychology," came from a Brownie perched in a front seat.

"Hobby,canoo, canoo, canix, Bucknell, Bucknell, Ninety-six!"

"Ah, didn't you hear it? I did." The little four-year olds shouted it until the campus rang, and the little Brownies from the valley faintly echoed, "Bucknell Sem!"

"Say, fellows," said an emaciated little Brownie perched on the clock, "do you know what I'm so glad about? Why, I can have pumpkin pie all my life. All you need is seeds," and the little fellow in sheer delight tumbled head over heels, only saving himself by grabbing at the hands of the clock. Next day the clock had to be regulated, but nobody ever knew why.

"Well, I know what I'm glad about," said a discouraged looking Brownie from the top of a hymn book, "I'm glad those girls won't have a chance to beat us this year in declamation. The faculty has found out at last that we can't hope to ever beat them."

"I'm so thankful that 'the cat came back,' " said a little French Brownie.

"Let us all rejoice in basketball and the glee-club," came from a stately little Brownie.

Up jumped a two-year old! "Mr. Post, I'm so thankful I didn't have to watch that game of basketball all through; I couldn't stand it to see so many fair forms prostrate."

"Hurrah for 1895 football scores !" shouted a band of stuffy-looking Brownies. "Yah! Yah! Yoo! Bucknell, B. U.! Wah! Hoo! Hoo! Wah! Bang!!!" Surely you heard that triumphant response from every Brownie there!

"I'm so glad my love has given up calling me out in the midnight watches," said a fair two-year old Brownie. "Its inconvenient not to find her, when I have heard her call."

"And I" said his oratorical brother, "am glad I have been able to go the way of all flesh this year."

"Dear friends," here interrupted the post, "We must close. We have all made progress this year, I see. Sometime I hope you will all be posts. We will now close with a song, for, dear friends, 'song is a great thing' as our poet of three-years' standing tells us." The meeting then closed with "Good-night my love." After the song was ended the Brownies tumbled out. They lingered long at the bridge and gazed at the rushing water, but they had to leave at last because the little valley heathen were afraid the door would be shut. Sure enough, when they got to their home, the valley Brownies had time only to murmur softly "Bucknell Sem," and hear the assuring "she's all right," and the great door shut them from my sight. The other Brownies ran into that horrid green fence, and I have never seen them since, though people do say that sometimes they sing out there in the moonlight. I don't know, I haven't seen them there. I know, though, that there are Brownies at Bucknell for I've seen them.

NEW YEAR'S EVE.

An Illusion.

It was December 31st, 189–, and a more delightful day could not be desired. It had been snowing for several days, but the clouds broke during the morning and at noon the sunbeams were dancing over the broad expanse of white, and soon the merry tinkling of sleigh-bells was heard on the streets. The young people were jubilant; for Mrs. H—— had promised them that they might "watch the old year out" at "The Oaks", and the thoughts of a sleigh ride to the country in the bright moonlight caused many a joyful shout.

It was a jolly crowd of twenty that met at my home early in the evening. My college friend, M—, who had camped with me in the summer and who had visited at my home, was one of the impatient company. But we had not long to wait. Our conveance was soon at hand and we were hurrying toward the country.

As we passed out of the town the beauties of a winter's night burst upon us in all their splendor. Above, the brilliant moon was just in a position to drop to rest with the dying year. The merry moonbeams, dancing and glimmering on the crust, made each frosty crystal a beautiful gem. The air was so clear that every star out-lined a brilliant track across the undulating expanse of shimmering white, and the myriads of glittering points dazzled us with their splendor. But we were hurried from the brilliant scene and soon the merry laughter of many happy hearts was heard echoing through the spacious rooms of the old palatial home.

My friend, for some reason, seemed strangely reticent. He did not enter into the games with his usual spirit and seemed more interested in watching the sparkling moonbeams from the window than in the dancing and music I tried many times to draw him into the circle, but every effort was in vain. He had been at the "Oaks" in the summer and was a welcomed guest. He was well acquainted with the company and why he should persist in sitting apart from them and shun their games, was a mystery to me.

At length, unperceived, he left the parlors. Passing quietly along the hall, he opened the door, stepped out on the piazza and stood regarding the glittering night. From the brilliantly lighted room he had just left came merrily the sound of women's laughter and the rythmical beat of feet as the dancers glided through the waltz; before him the night wind sghed through the leafless trees and from the distance came the sound of rushing water as it coursed its broken way through the gorge. And he, standing there between the merry company and the beautiful night, leaned against a pillar in deep thought.

Why was he not content to laugh and dance with the others; and why had he come out into the cold moonlight and wind? Surely it was a jolly company within, and the music was delightful. He could not explain his restlessness; the beautiful night seemed to call him without and he had gone. He looked again across the white fields and his eye followed, with renewed pleasure, the beams of light as they slipped and glanced from the drifts which had collected before the house. They seemed to beckon him to slip and slide with them; and with irresistible power draw him from his position. He descended the steps, coasted down the swell of a drift and his reverie was broken. Even before his gliding advance had ceased, he realized why he was so restless. He was a grand noble fellow, popular with all, but at times very sentimental; to-night he was in a good mood to welcome the suggestion that flashed through his brain——the suggestion to revisit, this snow-clad December night, all the old haunts of his summer flirtations and loves; for at this house he had met that conquering spirit which had opened his heart to a higher and nobler life. Could he be expected to find pleasure amid such scenes when that being was not present? He turned his back upon the merry-makers within, and, buttoning his coat tightly, walked toward the spot where the summer moon had seen him so often, but never alone.

He turned up the road and hurried to the little stream just beyond the house and the old log where, under the kindly protection of the over-hanging willows, she used to sit beside him and with her eyes tell again and again what her lips dared not speak. He soon reached the old trysting place. Brushing the cold snow from the log, he sat down and leaned against the friendly trunk of the willow.

As he sat in meditation, there came softly drifting from the far music room the notes of a dreamy waltz song he knew of old. How many times had she been with him at this spot and sung to him those beautiful love-ladened words while he looked into her earnest face and admired her more for every word she sang. The little brook, now almost hidden in the banks of snow, seemed to take up the strain. He sang the words as the brook danced on in its merry glee, then suddenly stopped.

"Surely," he thought, "I hear her voice." "She is singing the old song down in the grove under the bluff." "But she cannot be there; I am laboring under an illusion." ——"But I do hear her voice."

Thus he sat and argued. He could not banish the thought that he had heard her voice; it grew upon him till he could sit there no longer. He must go and see if she were really there.

As he rose hurriedly from his seat, the low limbs brushed his hat from his head; but he did not heed that. He must hurry ere the gliding voices die away. Ah! he will go to the old moss-covered rock in the wood; she will go there, he thinks.

He hurries through the gate, crosses the road, and, vaulting the fence, hastens toward the seeming source of the sound. He crossed the meadow, once a sea of gleaming dasies and fragrant clover-heads, but now a shining stretch of white. Every glimmering flake seems a summer flower; for he thinks only of the last time he crossed that way when she was with him. He reaches the bluff; a clump of evergreens obstructs his view; he moves to one side, stops and looks toward the spot he had frequented so often. The song rings clearer in his ears; he hurries down the slope, slipping and sliding. Almost breathless, he leans against a tree before making a final effort.

Under the bluff everything is quiet; the moon has dropped nearly behind the western hills and the lengthening shadows from the trees on the farther side of the stream, cast a gloom over the gorge and objects are not well defined. Cautiously, breathlessly, he peers down the cliff and across the stream, sure that he will see her—fearing lest he should not.

As he gazes he thinks he sees some object seated on the well-known rock; at the same moment the notes of a song come through the quiet night, wafted on the gentle breeze. He is doubly sure she is there.

"It is she," he cried excitedly. "There she sits in the very same gown she wore the last time we were here."

With a bound he would leap to the projecting rocks below and then he would soon be with her. But he did not think of the ice. His foot slipped and he fell.

It was nearly midnight before M— was missed by the company. His overcoat was found in the dressing room but his hat was gone. A search was immediately instituted, but no trace could be found for some time.

A call from one of the ladies brought us to the front of the house and she pointed out marks which were apparently made by a man as he slid down the side of a drift. This gave us the direction he had taken and soon his hat was found and the place where he had brushed the snow from the log.

In a short time we discovered where he had vaulted the fence and it was not difficult to trace him across the meadow and to the bluff. He was picked up insensible and taken to my home where he was nursed through a lingering fever. From his broken sentences during his sickness, I learned the secret of his wanderings that beautiful New Year's Eve.

NANON.

Athletics.

Bucknell ended the football season of '95 by a victory over Dickinson, at Sunbury, by a score of 28 to 0. It was an easy victory and a much larger score could have been made if Bucknell had played a kicking game. A large crowd saw the contest, a conservative estimate placed the number at sixteen hundred. The police were unable to handle the people and as a result the field was obstructed most of the time. It was an ideal football day, cold and crisp, but part of the field was soft which interfered materially with long runs. Sunbury, as usual, cheered for our opponents, but we managed to win the game in good style, with plenty to spare. A delegation from Bloomsburg was loyal to the orange and blue. A large crowd of Bucknell supporters went down on the Pennsylvania at 1.15 and cheered heartily for "our own." First half; Bucknell won the toss and took the western goal. Hering caught the kick-off on our 30 yard line and ran for 10 yards. Cober made 5 yards, Thomas 5, Devall 10 and Gilchrist 7 and then 10 more. Cober made a short gain. Thomas advanced it 10 yards. Cober and Collins brought it to Dickinson's 5 yard line. Elliott grabbed the ball on a fumble and made the first touch down after 6 minutes' play. Goal. Score, 6–0. Cober caught the kick-off. A number of small gains followed. Thomas made 10 and Collins 25 yards and a touch-down. Goal. Score, 12–0. Hering

Lauther made 20 yards and a foul tackle gave them 15 more. Firth replaced Gilchrist and the game went on. Firth made 7 yards and shortly afterwards Thomas made the fifth touch-down. Goal. Score, 28–0. Very slow playing followed the kick-off, caused by numerous "kicks" on both sides. Time called with ball in possession of Bucknell.

Line-up and officials:

DICKINSON.	POSITIONS.	BUCKNELL.
Craver	right end	Gilchrist, Firth.
Sheets	right tackle	Cober.
Codington	right guard	Lesher.
Troxel	center	Jennings.
Stiles	left tackle	Devall.
Vale, (Capt.)	quarter-back	Hering,
Lauther	right half-back	Thomas, Bunnell.
Lest	left half-back	Collins.
Wert, Pendlow	full-back	Elliott, Thomas.

Umpire, Hulley, Bucknell. Referee, Bassett, U. of P. Linesmen, Eveland, Dickinson and Smith, U. of P. Timekeeper, Smith, U. of P. Touch-downs: Collins, Bunnell, Gilchrist, Elliott, Thomas. Goals, Catterall 3; and Bunnell 1. 25 minute halfs.

The Bucknell second team was defeated at Williamsport on Thanksgiving day by the High School team at that place by the score of 4–0. The field was in bad shape which prevented much scoring. The High School team had been under the coaching of Will Young for some time. Our team's line was superior but High School ends could not be run. The game was a financial success.

Y. M. C. A.

H. L. Hastings, of Boston, the well known anti-infidel lecturer, delivered his lecture, The Mistakes of Moses, last Tuesday evening, in Bucknell Hall, before an appreciative audience of students and town people. Mr. Hastings spoke nearly an hour and a half and held the attention of his audience throughout. The lecture was given under the auspices of the Association. It was the purpose of the Association to make this service the opening meeting of the Week of Prayer, but, as noted elsewhere in this issue, the observance of the Week of Prayer has been postponed.

We believe the writer of the editorials will pardon us, if we trespass on his privilege and give to this item the character of an editorial comment. The Week of Prayer should properly have been observed during the first part of November. Out of consideration for the multitude of things claiming the attention of the student body at that time the Executive Committee of the Association thought it wise to postpone the meetings (as was noted in the MIRROR of November 9) "until the early part of December." When arrangements were later made for its observance the meetings were literally crowded out, i.e., so far as conducting them successfully was concerned. When any department wishes to arrange for a concert, lecture, or entertainment of any character, the calendar is consulted in order to discover if any other similar entertainment is arranged for the dates in mind. But there are few who stop to inquire if any christian work is planned, or, if it is incidentally learned that such work is planned, it is treated as of secondary importance. We feel that the Christian element, at least, having charge of concerts, lectures, etc., ought to be enough interested in these matters to recognize their importance. The Young Men's Christian Association stands for the highest good of the students and is one of the strongest factors aiding in the best and truest development of the University. The officers of the Association greatly appreciate the courtesy of those having in charge the Shakesperean recital in voluntarily coming to them and consulting with reference to conflicting dates and interests. We have been forced to forego the Week of Prayer and feel that the responsibility is not with the Association.

Local.

Mr. Hering has been appointed gymnasium instructor. He will also coach the baseball team next spring.

At a meeting of the football team on Saturday, December 7, Mr. E. W. Cober was elected captain for the coming year.

The Bucknell Band, assisted by talent from the Seminary and from town, gave a concert in Bucknell Hall, Friday night, December 6.

The term examinations will occur Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, Dec. 16–18. The second term will begin Tuesday, January 7, 1896.

The annual oratorical contest under the auspices of the Pennsylvania Inter-Collegiate Prohibition Association will be held in Harrisburg, January 17 or 18, 1896.

It is reported that a new fraternity is about to organize, to be known as the "Poor Todd Crowd." Six are pledged, and more to follow. Good luck to them!

A number of students spent a delightful evening with Miss Emily Hanna at Thanksgiving time. Miss Hanna thinks of pursuing work at Bucknell next term.

The preliminary Junior debate occurred on Friday evening, Dec. 6. The question was "Resolved: That The United States should recognize the Cuban insurgents as belligerents."

At a recent meeting of the Athletic Association it was decided to annul the season tickets issued under the old constitution, and the Finance Committee was instructed to redeem the same.

The advisability of giving a minstreal show some time next term is being discussed by quite a number of the boys. There is no reason why such an undertaking should not be a splendid success.

One of the Juniors: "I am good at guessing; have lots of practice, you know. In class the other day I had a chance; had two points in mind; guessed at the right one and gave it, and —it was the wrong one."

Miss Ella McLaurin, of Boston, spoke in the Baptist Church, Thursday evening, Dec. 5. Quite a number of students were present, and were strongly impressed with her arguments and strong appeals in behalf of foreign missions.

Miss B— had come to the door of the French room just as the recitation was ended. Noting her appearance the Prof. said, "Why, you look surprised!" "Yes, I just got up." Every one laughing, she hastily said, "I mean up from Sunbury."

In Psychology, Hall, reporting several cases of sight restored to those born blind, was relating the inability at the first to recognize objects without feeling them, and stated that a certain boy whose sight was thus restored "was overheard feeling the cat"

The next issue of the Mirror will be edited and published by the young ladies of the College. They have organized their editorial staff and are busily planning how to make this issue a brilliant success. The Mirror is to be much larger than usual and will doubtless present many original features.

Among the students there is no happier man these days than Mr. Chas. Firth, Manager of the Football Team. At the beginning of the season the Athletic Association was in debt about $350. Through Mr. Firth's skillful management enough money has been made to meet the running expenses of the team and to pay off nearly all of the old debts.

Miss S. Carson, who has charge of the Harlem Mission in New York, will conduct a series of evangelistic meetings with the assistance of the Y. W. C. A. The meetings will begin on the 12th and continue to the close of school. Miss Carson is one of the strongest workers in the Association, and it is hoped much good will result from her coming.

The following editors for the Woman's Edition of the Mirror have been elected: Miss Harris, Editor-in-Chief; Associate Editors, Misses Rohrer, Goddard, Hanna, Hartley, Rodgers, Gilchrist, Lillibridge and Thomas. Miss Wolfe was elected Business Manager. The College girls are full of enthusiasm in the enterprise and the first issue of the New Year will be a good one.

The funeral of Mrs. G. M. Spratt, wife of Dr. G. M. Spratt, Secretary of the Pennsylvania Baptist Board of Education, took place from the First Baptist church of this city on the afternoon of December 3. Dr. Spratt is honored and esteemed in Lewisburg and the University and the sympathy of his many friends is extended to him in his berevement. The MIRROR joins with them in their expressions of condolence.

Mr. J. W. C. Shamp, who prints the MIRROR, has, by press of work, been obliged to secure assistance during the past few months. Dutton and Flint of the College, and Wenck of the Academy have been assisting him during the rush. The courtesy of Mr. Shamp in thus recognizing the students will be appreciated by the student body. A return of favors, by taking work to his office, will be a practical recognition of his courtesy.

The annual meeting of the Bucknell Athletic Association will be held Saturday, December 14, at 10 o'clock. The following officers and committees will be elected for a term of one year: President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, Manager of Baseball, Manager of Football, Manager of General Athletics, Executive Board and Finance Committee. Any student, professor, or alumnus may become a member of the Association upon the payment of one dollar.

The Zeta Literary Society gave abundant evidence of its life and energy at their open meeting on Thanksgiving night. The College girls have always shown themselves to be possessed of great vitality and their new departure fully sustains the reputation they have made for themselves. To speak of only one feature of the program would, by the mere mention, disparage the rest, for all were par excellent. Zeta Literary Society is to be congratulated on its life and energy and for the high tone of its literary work.

"It never rains, but it pours." Three new literary societies have been organized this year: Zeta, Kalomathia and Athina, and now comes a fourth, the Owls and Eagles. All the members are officers except two, and one of those two refused office. The president of the Owls and Eagles is Mr. John Wood. The society has the usual officers and a chaplain and librarian, though no library, as yet. They have met every day since organization. Their meetings are interesting in the extreme. At a recent meeting they fiercely discussed the question, "Have the Indians received harsher treatment than the Negroes?" We are told that they impose fines for making faces at the president, and at a recent meeting one of the members was instructed to kick another member out and then fined for doing it. Long live the Owls and Eagles!

The annual meeting of the Bucknell University Club of Philadelphia was held on Monday evening, Dec. 2, 1895, at the Colonade Hotel, Philadelphia. Dr. J. K. Weaver of Norristown, Class of 1861, presided. The following new members were elected:—

Rev. A. L. Moore,'91, Rev. W. M. Courson,'90, Rev. R. M. Hunsicker,'82, Prof. F. R. Strayer,'94, Samuel Bolton, M. D.,'85, Prof. J. E. Perry, Ph. D., '78, Rev. C. G. Langford, '91, Rev. Leroy Stephens, D. D., '68, Rev. Chas. M. Reed, '82 and Mr. Howard Bucknell of Philadelphia.

Officers for the ensuing year were elected as follows:—

President, J. K. Weaver, M. D., of Norristown, '61; Vice President, Rev. M. G. Evans, D. D., of Crozer Seminary, '82; Secretary, Rev. R. B. McDanel, of Philadelphia, '88; Treasurer, C. B. Lowe, M. D., of Philadelphia, '65; Chairman of Executive Committee, Rev. B. MacMackin of Philadelphia, '74.

On motion of Mr. O. W. Spratt, '61, the Executive Committee was instructed to arrange for a joint meeting of the Alumni and Alumnae at an early date.

On motion of Rev. J. G. Walker, D. D., '62, the Club placed on record its sense of the loss sustained by the University in the death of Mr. James Irving, a member of the Board of Trustees; and its sympathy for Rev. G. M. Spratt, D. D., in the loss occasioned by the death of his wife.

The company repaired to the dining room which was gracefully decorated with palms, and the table resplendent with lamps and candelabra. At each plate was a bontonniere of yellow chrysanthemum and purple violets, and the menu cards were tied with the Bucknell Colors. At the table, Rev. J. S. James, D. D., '68, returned thanks, after which the following courses were served:

Blue Points.
Green Turtle a'l'Anglaise.
Salted Almonds. Celery. Olives.
Broiled Salmon–Lobster Sauce.
Potatoes Parisienne.
Tenderloin of Beef with Mushrooms.
String Beans. Sweet Potatoes.
Hearts of Lettuce–French Dressing.
Ices. Assorted Cakes.
Fruit. Coffee.

After the dinner, President J. H. Harris, who was greeted with applause, spoke of the present prosperous condition of all the departments of the University, and outlined a very suggestive plan for certain new buildings which are even now demanded by the remarkable growth of the school. Rev. A. J. Rowland, D. D., '62, Secretary of the American Baptist Publication Society spoke of Bucknell being the growth of years, and expressed his delight in coming back to Philadelphia and renewing old associations.

Rev. Geo. A. Beltz, D. D., '57, indulged in reminiscences of his student days, and suggested a reunion of the "old boys" at the next Commencement.

Prof. Philips, '71, of the West Chester Normal School spoke of the relation of the high schools to the colleges, and of the College and University Council organized in Pennsylvania by act of the last Legislature. He also suggested the abandonment of the term "University" by our Alma Mater.

Prof. Perry, '78, Principal of Peddie Institute, N. J., spoke in behalf of the Academies.

W. J. Coxey, '54, who has made very liberal gifts to the Bucknell Library, referred tenderly to his student days.

Rev. Leroy Stephens, D. D., '68, spoke about the increased endowments of American Colleges, and referred particularly to the value of co-education at Bucknell, and the influence of the College Women on the school life.

The last speaker was Rev. H. L. Wayland, D. D., of the "Examiner," who in his usual happy manner expressed his deep interest in Bucknell, and congratulations on her success.

The evening closed with the singing of "Auld Lang Syne" and the College yell.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Mrs. Lewis Schaeffer spent Thanksgiving with her daughter Alice.

Miss Wheeler spent Saturday and Sunday, November 23 and 24, with friends in Sunbury.

The Y. W. C. A. is making an effort to secure Miss Sara Carson, Assistant Secretary of the Harlem Association of New York, to conduct a series of evangelistic services in the Institute during the month of December.

An extract from a letter received from Mr. Broadnax: "Give my regards to the boys at Bucknell, if they ever come to Princeton—." Miss McIlwain shall have the pleasure of entertaining them down at Evelyn College.

The Y. W. C. A. gave a very interesting program meeting, Sunday afternoon, December 1, the program consisting of some of the most famous of our popular hymns with sketches of the lives of their authors and the circumstances under which they were composed.

Miss Armitage and Miss Bell gave a very pleasant and informal reception Thursday evening, November 21st, in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Hering. The Institute faculty, Dr. and Mrs. Hulley, Rev. S. S. Merriman, Miss Merriman, Miss Harris, Miss Gilchrist and several college students were the guests invited. All present regarded it as one of the most enjoyable social events of the season.

The following is the pragram of Dr. Aviragnet's second Musicale given in Bucknell Hall:

The pupils in the School of Music are to be congratulated, not only on the talent they evidently possess, but upon the opportunity they have of receiving thorough instruction from Dr. Aviragnet and his very able corps of assistants.

Personals.

'67. Rev. J. J. Kane, Chaplain U. S. N., is in England.

'70. Rev. C. T. Hallowell is at Park Rapids, Minn.

'72. W. O. Shaffer, Esq., was re-elected for the fourth time as Prothonotary of Union County on the Republican ticket. His last majority, 1106, was the largest he has ever received.

'79. E. M. Purdy is in Atlanta, Ga.

'87. Myron J. Sherwood, of Marquette, Mich., brought the body of his wife on to Northumberland, where she was buried. Mr. Sherwood later spent a few days in and around the University.

'88. Rev. R. B. McDanel has been re-elected Secretary and Treasurer of the Philadelphia Conference of Baptist Ministers.

'89. W. E. Williams has been promoted to City Engineer of Huntington, W. Va.

'89. Prof. Milton G. Evans, of Crozer Seminary, has been invited to become a member of the Victoria Institute, or Philosophical Society, of Great Britian.

'91. Mr. George Shorkley, second lieutenant of company A, has gone to Long Island, where he has secured a position in the capacity of civil engineer.

'92. John U. Wagner was recently elected an assistant in the Scranton High School.

'93. Mr. John B. Cressinger has been elected President of this year's graduating class of the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania.

'93. A gradual improvement is apparent in the work of the football team at Ursinus. A greater amount of team work is emphasized and less of individual playing. The interference is formed quicker, and less fumbling is noticeable. The team has steadily improved in offensive playing, but lacks in defensive. All the men, both on the line and the backs, have shown a marked improvement. Coach Cressinger still comes several times each week to keep the men earnestly at work. Arthur Knipe has been unable to come and coach the team, as was expected. —Pheonixville Republican.

'94. Rev. Chas. F. McMan, in connection with his pastorate at Lancaster, Pa., is pursuing theological studies in the Reformed Theological Seminary in that city.

Ex-'95. Married, at Moore's, Delaware Co., Pa., Mr. W. C. Scotney, Ex-'95, and Miss Alice Black.

Ex-'95. Rev. P. E. Weithaase is now assistant pastor of the North Baptist Church of Camden, N. J. His address is 508 Pine St., Camden, N.J.

Ex-'95. Rev. C. F. Hall, pastor at Lehman, Pa., now rejoices over the birth of a son. The future student of Bucknell, who is called William Franklin Hall, was born November 13, 1895.

Ex-'97. F. L. Camp is studying law at the University of Michigan.

Rev. Isaac Bagley, at one time a student at Bucknell, now pastor of the First Baptist Church of Harrisburg, has been holding men's meetings in the Eden Musee for the past year and giving practical, straight from the shoulder talks to "his boys," as he calls his auditors. Recently these "boys" presented him with a handsome gold watch and chain, besides paying him a high tribute as a useful worker in the cause of the Master. These meetings have been the talk of the capital city and are largely attended.

"Life in a Lumber Camp," in the Bowdoin Orient, is a very interesting and instructive article. It describes a crew of Yankee lumbermen. While the main features are the same, yet there is much difference between a Maine and a Pennsylvania crew of lumbermen.

Don't fail to read the "Scotch Irish In American History" in The Western University Courant. Of "The Fathers," Henry, Jefferson, Hamilton, and John Wilson were Scotch Irish patriots. Of the early generals, were "Mad Anthony," Starke and Morgan, all of Scotch Irish blood. The Scotch Irish have furnished seven of our United States presidents and three of our great statesmen; Calhoun, Blaine and Webster, Chief Justice Marshall and Jeremiah S. Black were also of this illustrious stock.

Says the Exchange Editor of The Antiochian: "The human mind is educated by its environments solely; the mind wills according to its educated conceptions; therefore the mind wills as influenced by its environment: Will determins action; therefore a person can be no better than the best that he alone is capable of perceiving in his environment." If there be a God, who enlightens and inspires man, then the above conclusion is false. We are inclined to think that it is false.

In The Normal Echoes is an article on "Free Trade vs. Protection." The characteristic feature is a lack of logic. The article states that there were no monopolies before the Civil War. We all know better. In discussing the question for America, one should not draw conclusions from effects of English, French and Italian systems since the conditions are entirely different. On that point Blaine defeated Gladstone. Gladstone argued for England. Blaine argued for the United States. It states that wool fell in price under the McKinley tariff; it does not prove it. The fact that the Diston saw, which has been protected, is competing with the foreign in foreign markets is an argument in favor of protection in the United States.

The present session of Peirce School, 917 Chestnut street, Philadelphia, ushers in the thirty-first year under the management of its principal and founder, Dr. Thomas May Peirce. This long record has been one of progress and success. Thirty years ago there were seven colleges for business, and of these the Peirce School alone survives. Its roll to-day contains the names of students who are the sons and daughters of the pupils of thirty years ago. The School not only has secured a commanding position in the educational world, but its eminently practical curriculum has won the highest approval of the most distinguished men of this country. It affords a complete equipment for the manifold requirements of active business, and starts students in life with the capital of qualification, and that's everything.—Ex.

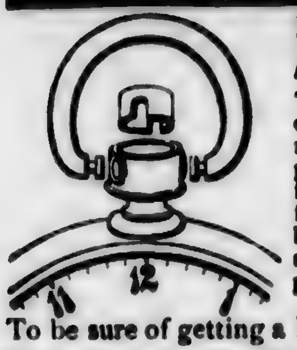
Going to Buy a Watch?

If so, buy one that cannot be stolen. The only thief-proof Watches are those with

Non-pull-out

BOWS.

Here's the Idea:



The bow has a groove on each end. A collar runs down inside the pendent (stem) and fits into the grooves, firmly locking the bow to the pendent, so that it cannot be pulled or twisted off.

To be sure of getting a Non-pull-out, see that the case is stamped with this trade mark. It cannot be had with any other kind.

Editorial.

THE editors of the Woman's Edition wish to express their appreciation of the thoughtfulness and courtesy of the MIRROR Board. Through their kindness, too, we were permitted to peep into the sanctum sanctorum. Finding it too small, however, to accommodate the expansiveness of the Woman's Edition, the President's Office is being used in that capacity.

THERE has been an innovation at Cornell and Miss Smith of Bryn Mawr will henceforth be privileged to attend the Trustee meetings. Now that the Bucknell Alumni are considering members to represent them on the Board, the women who wear the blue ribbon are thinking of the time not far hence when their number will warrant representation in the same assembly.

But why wait for that time? Why can not some woman noted for interest in Bucknell affairs and support of Bucknell enterprises be made Trustee now? Surely such an one can be found. That would be one way of celebrating our Jubilee.

WHY do not the Literary Societies at the Hill change the time of their meetings, if, as was recently stated in this paper, "half of the meetings are broken up by entertainments and socials connected with the school." Friday is the evening par excellence for socials and receptions: there is but one class the following day and the gayety can be prolonged without infringing the Sabbath. It is not a question of precedence with the societies, for they once met Saturday morning after class; so the argument "It has always been so" can not be used against a change. Friday was appointed as the evening for literary work before social life had become so prominent here, before the myriad college organizations had come into existence. Let the Literary Societies adjust themselves to the developing conditions of the College. The youngest College Literary Society has done so; and, though it is rather early to speak too confidently of its future success, the suitability of the time has been proved. Zeta meets Thursday evening at half past six, thus allowing time to hold the meeting and yet attend any subsequent entertainment; or to prolong the society at the will of the members.

DID you observe the faculty bulletin-board last term? The board to the right as you enter the College is reserved for them, and no one but officials is supposed to use it. Notices of every character appeared there last term; foot-ball cartoons, pictures of the Swedish quartet, Lucia May Priest's Photos, College Girls' "N. Bs." etc. The faculty are in such a minority that they dare not protest, but the rights of even the minority ought to be regarded.

Speaking of bulletin-boards,—why do not more organizations imitate the good example of the Band, which supports a separate board? The athletic notices (e. g.) are numerous enough to deserve a spot that they may call their own. The crowd that gathers about the bulletin-boards would thus be dispersed. As it is now, there is such a crush about the stairs, that those who come from the library have to resort to foot-ball tactics to reach the class-rooms: even then, their hats are knocked askew, books jostled from their hands, not to mention the inconvenience caused by some bulletin-board-fiend backing unconciously on their toes, or projecting his own for a stumbling-block to all would-be passers-by.

ONE criticism on College papers that is frequently heard, is that the literary department is too prominent. "No one," they say, "ever reads or cares to read essays and orations;" What the public wants is news. This may be partially true. But let it be remembered that the majority of the readers of College publications are the students then attending the college. They are interested in seeing their class-mates' ability in the literary line. By all means, have a literary department and let it be prominent, provided, of course, it does not crowd out the local news. But have the name of the writer signed to every literary contribution: interest in the department will thus be doubled. We shall then know to whom we may safely confide our criticisms and also whom to praise. Indiscriminate praise given in the hope of hitting the one who deserves it, is wearing: blind criticism is dangerous. Give us the safe guard of having the writer's name attached to every article in the Literary Department.

THE tendency of colleges is toward conservatism. In them reason rules and the fitful changes of the times are scarcely perceptible. Not until a new order of things has given evidence that it is to be permanent and that it is an exponent of enlightened popular feeling, is it adopted by the colleges. College publications partake of the character of the institutions they represent, and are conservative also.

Far different the daily press: its function is to register instantly every change in moral, social, political and intellectual temperature.

So the first "Woman's Editions" were editions of the daily newspapers. The plan was given careful trial and its success was assured before it was publicly approved by the colleges.

What will be the result? Will it make women more proud and boastful of their prowess? Far be it! Rather, they will appreciate more highly the efforts expended in the editing of even a small paper; have more sympathy with attempts and be less severe in criticism of short-comings. The movement is a commendable one. Bucknell is to be congratulated on being one of the first institutions to take it up.

A SONG OF THE SEASON.

A song for hoary Winter, his icicles and snow,
A song for North Wind, bluffest of all the winds that blow.
A song for Father Christmas, with Yule-log at his back,
A song for old Kris Kingle, with well-nigh bursting pack.

A song for happy New Year, its prospects fresh and bright,
Of hopes that throng upon us, as dawns its first faint light,
A song of resolution, of good to do and be,
A song of ringing purpose, yet musical with glee.

A song of glad thanksgiving for blessings of the year,
Of praise for all the beauty, that comes our lives to cheer,
In song we'll join with angels, adoring Heaven's King;
For in His Word we read it, "Let all the people sing."

WOMAN AT BUCKNELL.

"Well, you girls have got push." These words were addressed to me in parting by one of my class-brothers to whom I had been talking of the various organizations, etc., which the college girls were supporting; and, as I turned away, the words rose to my lips, "Yes, the college girls have got push, and always have had." Then the thought came to me of the various conditions of the college women at Bucknell, and, as I walked slowly homeward, my mind took a reminiscent trend, I thought of the awe with which I, a "little Sem prep," had regarded those creatures so far above us Sem girls; that sometimes they were allowed to chaperon us in lieu of a teacher. I recalled the angry looks and words of these girls, which we ever present "enfants terribles" saw and heard at times when they returned from their classes at the hill. Then we did not understand them; but we have since found the cause to be the refusal of the college faculty to put the names of these women in the catalogue of the University as college students; and the signing of a petition by most of the college boys requesting that women should not be admitted to college; and the ungallant behavior of the students in forming two lines of men before the college door for the purpose of making the girls run a gauntlet of jibes and hisses, which act was frustrated by the girls in their turn taking their places in the line with the young men.

My mind then turned to the college woman of Bucknell to-day; to the equal treatment she receives with the boys; to the fact that not only does her name appear in the catalogue as a college student, but this year, for the first time, the college girls will have their literary society placed in the catalogue on the same footing as those of the young men. I wondered how many men in college now would sign a petition requesting that the doors of the college be closed to women. I thought, lastly, of the gallant Bucknell boys who two years ago formed two lines before the college door, not to greet the girls with jibes and hisses, but, with bared heads, to allow them with honor to pass through their ranks; because they had that morning donned the college cap. Does not this change speak well for co-education at Bucknell, and the "push" of the college girls?

The advent of woman at Bucknell is of comparatively recent origin,—the first woman graduated here being Mrs. John R. Beale, (nee Scott) Scranton, Pa., who received her degree in 1885. From the time of her graduation until 1887 no women received degrees here; but in 1887 not only did two women graduate but woman had her first triumph at Bucknell, in that two prizes were won by her;—the one a Senior prize in Psychology, the other a Sophomore prize in Mathematics. From 1887 until 1890 there was another interval in which no women were graduated; but since 1890 every year has seen at least one woman given a degree. The Class of '94 has the honor of having graduated with the largest number of women;—five having been graduated in that year; but, unless the ten girls of the present Freshman class dwindle wofully in numbers, '94 will be able to hold that distinction but a few years.

To-day there are in College over thirty women, most of whom are taking the classical course. Of these thirty women at least one-half stand in the first ten, or honor rank, of each of the various classes. They are good students; but with all that, there is not a more ready and willing set of girls any where when some frolic or social time is proposed, provided of course it does not infring on study time. Nor is their energy all expended on their mental and social education; their physical and moral natures are both well cared for; so that, at the present time, if a Bucknell woman is not an all round woman, it is her own fault.

Next we come to the honors of the women of Bucknell. These are not few. To-day Bucknell has eighteen women graduates and of these eighteen six took prizes at some time during their college course. In college now we have women also who have taken prizes, the ratio being about equal with that of the graduates. These honors have been won not only in the fields of writing, literature, and those branches in which woman is supposed to be equal with man; all branches—Psychology, Chemistry, Mathematics, Oratory, Essay and Declamation,—have given way to her power. One prize, so far, she has not been able to reach;—the gold watch given as a prize to the one who pronounces the best oration at the time of graduation; but there is still hope that one of these days some woman may win that prize, also.

When I look over the old Bucknell girls, my heart swells with pride to find so many true and noble women among them. Bucknell, up to the present time, has women graduates of whom she may be proud. Girls, let the good work go on.

BUCKNELL ALUMNAE CLUB OF PHILADELPHIA.

The modern philosopher who, when asked what he thought of the New Woman, replied, "Woman is always new, that's her greatest attraction," expressed himself just as we would have done if asked what we thought of the present day Bucknell woman. What new things she has done during the term that has just closed! We have heard with surprise of a College Women's Glee Club, of a Literary Society, of a Basket-ball Team, and with still greater surprise of the proposed Woman's Edition of the MIRROR. Realizing that the object of the edition has been to give a fair representation of the work that occupies and interests Bucknell Women, we are glad to have been given an opportunity for a sketch of the Philadelphia Bucknell Alumnae Club.

This club has been in existence for about five years. During this time we have grown in numbers, though not so rapidly as would have liked, until now our list of regular active members numbers twenty with, the additional names of three honorary members. Two of these have just joined the club, and if the interest which our first honorary member, Mrs. M. E. R. Cobb, has manifested in us is any criterion, we are hoping for greater activity than ever. Not only are we indebted to Mrs. Cobb for the large share of herself which she has brought into our meetings, but also for the beautiful rooms in which we now meet. During the first two years of the Club's history, the ladies were entertained most royally on several occasions by, members of the Club. There was a strong desire on the part of the members that we should have a regular place of meeting and that the "feasts of good things" should be provided for by the Club. Consequently we met for two years at the Woman's Exchange. The rooms were scarcely large enough to accomodate us comfortably and we began to wish for some more desirable place. We were helped out of our difficulty in a most unexpected way. The fact that we have been enjoying the spacious rooms at the Foulke and Long Institute for the past year, is due entirely to the courtesy of Mrs. Cobb.

The last meeting of the Club in November was one of the best that we have had during the present year. The New Woman and The Old Time Lady were there in their happiest moods, and made the occasion an interesting one. When the invitations to this meeting announced that there would be a discussion of the question—"Is The New Woman any improvement over the Old Time Lady?"—it was natural to have expected differences of opinion in the matter. With marvellous unanimity, however, all agreed that the New Woman and The Old Time Lady are practically one. The wise, kindly Old Time Lady yielded to the New Woman the right to redeem the hours that she, herself, had lost in earlier days when opportunities were not so numerous. The strong, active, sensible New Woman acknowledged with pride that "she's just the Old Time Lady with a little larger sphere."

At the close of the year as we take a retrospect of our work as a Club, we feel that, in point of interest, at least, it has been one of the most successful of our existence.

If with this success there has come greater devotion to our Alma Mater, and an earnest desire for her advancement in coming days and years, then our aim has been accomplished, and we will still have bright hopes for the Bucknell Alumnae Club in Philadelphia.

COLLEGE LIFE.

Round the meadows, on the campus,
The kids romp and play.
When I was a college Freshman,
I played e'en as they.
But when I became a Soph'more
I grew more sedate;
I then learned a cane to carry,
And to walk with state.

Now that I am called a Junior,
Play I lay aside;
Intellect I've now developed,
Vision keen and wide.
When I shall, as solemn Senior,
Wear a cap and gown,
All will turn with awe, to watch me
As I go through town.

If I should grow very aged,
And become a "Post,"
I should always be lamenting
Pristine vigor lost.
And should such ill fate befall me,
Into life to go,
I would pass my time in weeping
Tears of bitt'rest woe.

THE NEW YEAR ON THE THRESHOLD.

'98. "What will the New Year bring to me, I wonder. O lovely New Year with thy fair, sweet face, you will be good and send to me a chaperon for skating!"

"Yes, child, yes."

"He must be handsome."

"Well!"

"And tall."

"Ye-es."

"And smart."

"Um!"

"And—and—good, and—and a Sophomore."

"Ah, childie, you ask too hard a thing. I will see what I can do, though."

'97. "Tell us, oh tell us, dear New Year, is there a balm within thy hidden treasures for the giggles?"

bers, though not so rapidly as would have liked, until now our list of regular active members numbers twenty with, the additional names of three honorary members. Not only are we indebted to Mrs. Cobb for the large share of herself which she has brought into our meetings, but also for the beautiful rooms in which we now meet. During the first two years of the Club's history, the ladies were entertained most royally on several occasions by, members of the Club. There was a strong desire on the part of the members that we should have a regular place of meeting and that the "feasts of good things" should be provided for by the Club. Consequently we met for two years at the Woman's Exchange. The rooms were scarcely large enough to accomodate us comfortably and we began to wish for some more desirable place. We were helped out of our difficulty in a most unexpected way. The fact that we have been enjoying the spacious rooms at the Foulke and Long Institute for the past year, is due entirely to the courtesy of Mrs. Cobb.

The last meeting of the Club in November was one of the best that we have had during the present year. The New Woman and The Old Time Lady were there in their happiest moods, and made the occasion an interesting one. When the invitations to this meeting announced that there would be a discussion of the question—"Is The New Woman any improvement over the Old Time Lady ?"—it was natural to have expected differences of opinion in the matter. With marvellous unanimity, however, all agreed that the New Woman and The Old Time Lady are practically one. The wise, kindly Old Time Lady yielded to the New Woman the right to redeem the hours that she, herself, had lost in earlier days when opportunities were not so numerous. The strong, active, sensible New Woman acknowledged with pride that "she's just the Old Time Lady with a little larger sphere."

At the close of the year as we take a retrospect of our work as a Club, we feel that, in point of interest, at least, it has been one of the most successful of our existence.

If with this success there has come greater votion to our Alma Mater, and an earnest des for her advancement in coming days and yea
then our aim has been accomplished, and we w still have bright hopes for the Bucknell Alumn Club in Philadelphia.

COLLEGE LIFE.

Round the meadows, on the campus,
  The kids romp and play.
When I was a college Freshman,
  I played e'en as they.
But when I became a Soph'more
  I grew more sedate ;
I then learned a cane to carry,
  And to walk with state.

Now that I am called a Junior,
  Play I lay aside ;
Intellect I've now developed,
  Vision keen and wide.
When I shall, as solemn Senior,
  Wear a cap and gown,
All will turn with awe, to watch me
  As I go through town.

If I should grow very aged,
  And become a "Post,"
I should always be lamenting
  Pristine vigor lost.
And should such ill fate befall me,
  Into life to go,
I would pass my time in weeping
  Tears of bitt'rest woe.

THE NEW YEAR ON THE THRESHOLD.

'98. "What will the New Year bring to me wonder. O lovely New Year with thy fair, sw face, you will be good and send to me a chaper for skating!"

"Yes, child, yes."

"He must be handsome."

"Well!"

"And tall."

"Ye-es."

"And smart."

"Um!"

"And—and—good, and—and a Sophomore.

"Ah, childie, you ask too hard a thing. I w see what I can do, though."

'97. "Tell us, oh tell us, dear New Year, there a balm within thy hidden treasures for giggles ?"

"Yes, dear girls, yes. But wait! Not yet, not yet! When I bring the golden autumn I will bring to you an elixir that will cure all giggles."

"What is it called, dear Year?"

"It begins with a Psy, my children."

Seranaders: "Pitying New Year, look upon our bruised and bleeding hands. We sang of love and other things below the Seminary Windows, and they stoned us with rocks."

"I am heart sorry for you. The lover's road is a stony one at times. I will see if the powers that be cannot be more kind. Till then, my boys, behind the tennis nets 'meekly wait and murmur not.' "

'96. "Three Marys come to you, New Year. We want you to give us a summa cum laude. It is a very little thing for you to give, dear Year."

"Have you faithfully worked, children?"

1st Mary: "Well, I don't think nit! I've nearly worked my head off."

2nd Mary: "Well, I think so. I'm sure—I don't know—in fact, I'm afraid—others deserve it more; give it to them."

3rd Mary: "Well, I want a summa cum laude anyhow. It won't be fair if I don't get it."

'97. "Dear New Year, we are at your foot pleading for time. The old year has hurried us so. We have been behind him so long. He always got to chapel first; he always scurried up the hill to German and to French, and we never caught up. Dear Year, we're so tired of never 'getting there.' "

"Well, tired girlies, try and see if you cannot be less lackadaisical. I fly up the hill; you ramble over it. I take the wings of the morning to chapel; you wait for evening shadows. Try, my Junior girls to curl your hair and wash your faces less. Let a little dust stay on your coats, that less may be on your class-room chairs."

Mirror Subscribers: "Kindly New Year, '95 has made us wait for our news from dawn to dusk and dusk to dawn for many a weary day. We get so tired of waiting."

"Well, have you paid your subscriptions? Do you help the poor, overworked editors? Or, must they labor in thankless toil till day breaks to get the Mirror out at all? Do you ever say encouraging words to its editors? Tell me."

"No."

"You make me tired. Ask '95 to forgive you, and feel ashamed forevermore."

'98. "We're awful sorry we said we wouldn't fight, New Year. We want some fights."

'99. "And we are sorry, too, we said we wouldn't fight, New Year. Take away all else, love, Ex. and everything, but give, oh give us, a chance to fight."

New Year: "I will see what I can do. Fights are in great demand this year in the East and in the West. But you must have some spirit, children, and when I bring to you the great Birthday, for pity's sake, do something."

'99 Sextette: "Bring us freedom, dear, sweet New Year. Our hearts beat with painful longing to roam the fields and woods together. O New Year, please do not separate us."

"Children, 'does your mother know you're out?' "

Institute: "Surely you will open for us our prison house, you beautiful, bright New Year. The boys want to see us, and we, yes, we must see them."

"Poor little ones. I will see what I can do, but, ah, times are hard nowadays. Perhaps when Commencement comes you can sit on the porch a little while after tea. I will see."

Library: "Kindly New Year, bring me books, books of any kind. I am so hungry."

"Surely you can have books. I will have many, many thousands of books new and old."

Library: "But people are so selfish. They don't know what to do with their many books, still they keep them."

"Let us hope people will be less selfish and see and satisfy your need, dear old friend."

Athletic Association: "Dear New Year, please give to us money to buy votes. We need it so."

"Buy for you votes! Buy votes, children!"

Yes, oh we need them so!"
New Year, pressing her hands on her fair temples;
"Where, oh, where am I at?"

'98. "Dear New Year,—let us whisper it close in your ear—we want you to give us some more brains. We feel we must have them for our Literature and Physiology."

"I don't know, children. Would you mind if they were borrowed?"

"Oh, no; only that we can have them."

"Well, I'll ask '99. They may have some a little later on."

College Girls: "Gracious New Year, we're 'not in it;' we have no spot that is our own; we are so tired of our 'pillar to post' existence. We want a college girls' hall. If you cannot give this to us quite yet, surely you can give to us one little room that we can call our own."

"Oh, children, men's hearts are hard, hard, hard. But keep on pleading. It is the driblets that wear away the rock. Maybe the Board will thaw out soon, when the winter snows are over. There, I'm mixed in my metaphors, but never mind. I will try and bring you what you want."

Bells, interrupting: "We come to ring you in, New Year. Everything new, new, new! Bully for you! Bully for you ! A happy New Year to old B. U.!" ANON.

THE COLLEGE GIRLS' ORGANIZATIONS.

Probably at no time since her entrance to Bucknell, has the College girl been so engaged in organized effort as at present. During the first years of her residence here, the fact that she was admitted to these classic halls seems to have been all-absorbing, and a large share of her ability was expended in maintaining her position in a College hitherto adverse to co-education.

Gradually, however, this barrier to her advancement was removed, until the college girl of today, quite untrammeled by former prejudices, is free to act in accordance with the promptings of higher education in all its departments.

For the purpose of promoting and fostering the spirit of sympathy and mutual understanding, no better means may be employed than that of definite organization. In this way the girls are brought into a relation one with another, which is well nigh impossible to be obtained, when no bond serves to unite the several segments of our girlish circle into one complete whole.

That the girls of Bucknell have become fully awakened to this fact, is clearly shown by the number of organizations now in existence among them.

Of these, the College Girls' Association may first be mentioned, which, as the oldest of our institutions, is able to boast a history of some years. The office of this body, sad to relate, has been gravely maligned. It is but a short time since the posting of a notice for a meeting called forth a knowing smile, while dame Rumor facetiously whispered "a reception." But in the light of the developments of last term surely the Association may be credited with broader aims, than simply to expend its entire effort upon an annual event, long designated as "the college girls' reception!"

The real duties of this organization are to transact all matters of business pertaining to the college girls as a body; such as the adoption of the scholastic style of head-dress now in vogue, the publication of the present edition of "THE MIRROR," and other matters of like importance.

The offices are usually held with reference to class precedence, that of president being filled by a Senior,of vice president by a Junior, of secretary by a Sophomore, and of treasurer by a Freshman. The present incumbents are Miss Wolfe, Miss Hanna, Miss Rodgers and Miss Fowler.

Following the College Girls' Association after the lapse of some years, the Beta Chapter of the Pi Beta Phi fraternity was formed at Bucknell in the early part of the year just closed, the Alpha Chapter having been established some time previous to this at Swarthmore. Many of our most energetic college girls have become affiliated with this organization, and find it a source of great pleasure and help in their college life. The appreciation with which the members of the fraternity are regarded by Mrs. Larison, was shown in a delightful manner, at the reception given by her in their honor in the early fall.

A few months later Zeta Literary Society was formed. Although the idea has so recently materialized it is by no means a new one, as an organization of this character had been a mooted question for some time. In May the preliminary steps were taken, and Misses Hartley and Hanna were appointed a committee to draft the constitution.

Upon the opening of school in September the report of the committee was adopted, subject to the approval of the faculty of the University, while Misses Gilchrist and Lillibridge were requested to formulate the by-laws of the society. The result of the first election of officers was: president, Miss Harris; vice president, Miss Hanna; Secretary, Miss Cotton; treasurer, Miss Gilchrist.

The name "Zeta" means, "seekers," which united with the motto "utile dulci" "the useful with agreeable," signifies that the purpose of the society consists of the search for that which shall benefit, together with that which shall please.

The results of the effort so far expended have been most gratifying. Nearly all the college girls are now members, and evince the heartiest interest in executing the various plans adopted. Four meetings have been held, one of these being an open session, in response to the interest manifested in the society by some of its masculine friends. Wishing to combine a feast of material blessings with one of reason, the "seekers" dispensed to their appreciative guests viands suggestive of Thanksgiving hospitalities.

The final meeting of last term was made especially interesting by the reading of a paper, prepared by several members, entitled the "Blue and Gold," from the colors of the society.

The reception of Zeta Literary Society among the faculty and students of the University has been fully equal to the most sanguine expectations, all of whom by their kindly interest have spurred the girls to greater undertakings.

The College Girls' Glee Club was organized in October, the result largely of an inspiration of Miss Hartley. Her suggestion was willingly adopted by several other members of the College Girls' Association, and after the formation of the club, Miss Harris and Miss Hartley were unanimously elected to the respective positions of leader and business manager. At present the part of first soprano is assigned to Misses Harris, Mary Stephens, Laura Allen and Hanna; that of second soprano to Misses Rodgers, Slifer, Gertrude Stephens and Henrietta Allen; of first alto to Misses Goddard and Fowler; of second alto to Misses Hartley and Taylor. Since the debût of the club on November first the members have faithfully continued their rehersals, and although far from satisfied with their attainments, the kind encouragement of friends lends inspiration to press on to the desired goal, even though it be far distant.

Nor has the enterprise of the Bucknell college girl been wholly directed in mental lines; the physical has also had its share of attention. Owing to a desire for a fully rounded college life, an Athletic Association was formed with Miss Rohrer, president, Miss Davenport, secretary, and Miss Chambers, treasurer. The privilege of voting is accorded in proportion to the amount of stock held, the shares being sold at fifty cents each. From this organization the basket-ball team emanated, of which Miss Wolfe is captain and Miss Gilchrist business manager, to whom the credit of forming the team is doubtless due.

The year eighteen hundred and ninety-five has surely been one of innovation in the world of the college girls of Bucknell! On every side the throb of increased life is manifest, while a feeling of the utmost cordiality exists between all the members of our college circle. As the present is full of energy and activity, so we trust that the future may reap lasting benefit from these initial efforts of the college girls of Bucknell.

RUMOR.

O she said that you said that he said
That she was a perfect fright,
And he said that they said that we said
That he was never polite.
Though neither speech was ever made,
And names are muddled quite,
There're no two ways—they're both big jays—
And now its come to light !

O. M. W.

TIME'S CHANGES.

'Twas while we were at College
I met the maiden fair,
And straightway I admired
Her sweet and gentle air.

I thought her blue eyes heavenly,
My eyes are dark, you see:
And when I learned she liked brunettes,
I was happy as could be.

We took long walks together
Those happy, happy days;
I know not whose joy was greater,—
Whether 'twas mine or May's.

When we came, then, to the class-room,
Eager each the first to be,
I confess I thought of May oft,
And I hoped she thought of me.

How I struggled with mathematics,—
Hard for me they always were:
Yet I worked and tugged the harder,
Not to seem so dull to her.

The devotion that began there,
Is far, far deeper now:
For when we left the college-halls,
We left them with a vow,

Always to love each other,
As long as life should last;
That promise still doth bind us
And hold us, each one, fast.

But that was years ago, my son;
Bless me, how time does fly!
And May is now a woman,
And so, my boy, am I.

GROWTH OF COLLEGE SPIRIT.

Those who were acquainted with College life a decade ago detect a marked improvement in the spirit of to-day. The students seem to guard more jealously than before the honor of their Alma Mater and to expend the thought and time for her benefit purely, which was consumed in former days in the pursuit of private study or pleasure.

We naturally inquire immediately the reasons for this growth of College Spirit. The chief one is, perhaps, the growth and prosperity of the school itself. No man cares to own himself a graduate of an institution without repute; for his own mental acquirements are ranked accordingly. It is evident that the wider the name of his Alma Mater is spread, the greater pride will he take in being known as her son—the more interest will he have in the life of the school.

The satisfaction of our student with the course offered by his college, will have its influence personally upon other youth, while a year of peculiar prosperity in the school will draw many to its halls for the succeeding year.

Within the last ten years have arisen many organizations for the student body in which upper and lower classmen meet together on the same footing, whereas a Freshmen used to be regarded as quite below the recognition of the stately Senior.

The work which the Young Men's Christian Association has done in this line is inestimable, while the gentle power of music in the College Glee and Banjo Clubs has spanned the chasm between the classes. But perhaps the influence most potent to unite the students of the four years is that of athletics. The exhibition of Field Day compels the Senior, revered for his intellectual attainments, to admit with awe the superiority of a Freshmen, it may be, in physical prowess. And all the students, from whatever class, unite in giving a hearty welcome to the victorious foot-ball team as it returns from the game.

The elective courses form another bond of union among the student body, for they bring together members of the different classes and give them an interest in common; and they also cause greater contentment in the school, since they allow each student to follow, to a certain extent, his own bent.

We can trace a circle of influence bearing upon the students and their College. Her prosperity inspires them with enthusiasm. which soon extends to the alumni and friends; and when these become interested in her, there is at once insured to her an increase of prosperity.

WAITING.

Scene, room in Seminary.

Four College girls: Minnie Henry and Mabel Graham, Seniors; Flossie Miles, a Sophomore, and Celia Thornton, a Freshman.

MARY: "Do you really think, then. Mabel, that all things come to those who wait ?"

MABEL: "Indeed I do. For instance, we have all seen how vacations and—"

MINNIE: "Vacations! Of course they come. Question is, do the people who don't wait get vacations. Say Mabel, what finally becomes of the people who don't wait ?"

MABEL: "I don't know. Let me finish what I was going to say. I will repeat—"

All in chorus: "Oh, don't!"

MABEL: "I will say what I was going to say. Besides, this is my room, and guests are supposed to have some manners, though the majority don't."

FLOSSIE: "Hush up, you girls there! Our hostess, august personage, wishes to discourse of the surety with which you get things if you wait and don't get them if you don't wait."

MINNIE: "I believe it. I waited two whole seasons for big sleeves and now I've got 'em whereas, if I hadn't waited—"

FLOSSIE: "I should think you had. We are simply 'out of sight' and so are you."

MABEL, (calmly): "And its true in other things besides vacations—"

FLOSSIE: "What is?"

MABEL: "You're an awful bother. Don't you know that children should be seen and not heard? And as for interrupting me—"

FLOSSIE: "Great Scott! I'm squelched!"

CELIA, (irrelevantly): "Do you know, girls, I think it must be perfectly lovely to be engaged while you're in college?"

MINNIE: "Preserve me!"

CELIA: "Well, I do now. I don't care if I do say it. Engaged people have lots better times!"

MINNIE: "Well, all I can say is that people's ideas of a good time differ, and if it is a good time to go to that graveyard every night after school and read epitaphs, I'd rather be excused, if you please."

CELIA: "Wait till you get in love, Min. Gee whiz! wouldn't I like to be around!"

MINNIE: "Oh, would you? Well, you will never have the chance, I can tell you that, though you wait till the Day of Doom."

CELIA: "But really, girls, I'm desperate. I've been here four months, and I'm not engaged yet. I think its awful mean."

MINNIE, (half sneeringly): "This is Leap-year. Why don't you help yourself?"

CELIA, (jumping up): "The very thing! What a darling you are, Min! Say, Mabel, won't it be a lark? And we won't have to wait."

MABEL: "Celia Thornton, I'm surprised at you."

MINNIE: "And I am more than surprised."

CELIA: "You're two old prigs! Of course I only mean some fun. You are in for it. aren't you Floss?"

FLOSSIE: "Yes indeed; it will be stacks of fun."

MABEL: "You foolish girls you'll be sorry."

MINNIE: "Yes, indeed; you had better wait a while."

CELIA: "Come on Floss; we're in for fun. Let them wait if they want to. We won't."

II

Scene, Celia's room.

Celia and Flossie.

CELIA: "There! I think that will do. Listen, Floss." (Reading), "Misses Flossie Miles and Celia Thornton will be pleased to have Messrs. Robert Blake and Daniel Morris call upon them on Saturday evening, the 24th, at the Seminary."

FLOSSIE: "Yes; I think that will do. You don't think its perfectly awful for us to do this, do you, Celia?"

CELIA: "No, of course not; its only a lark. And sending the invitation from both of us, you see, makes a difference."

FLOSSIE: "Well, let it go. There's the bell, and I don't know one word of this Greek."

CELIA: "The gods go with us both!"

III

Scene, Reception Room.

Celia and Flossie, Morris and Blake.

Celia and Flossie rise as Morris and Blake enter.

CELIA, shaking hands gushingly: "So delighted to see you, Mr. Morris, and you, too, Mr. Blake."

FLOSSIE: "Delighted, I'm sure. It is a very great pleasure."

MORRIS: "Well, really—"

FLOSSIE: "I suppose you had a delightful vacation?

MORRIS: "Why—a—"

FLOSSIE; Of course you did. Did you pass the time in skating?

MORRIS: "Well—a, the fact is—"

FLOSSIE: "And what did you get for Christmas? I got a box of elegant writing paper, and a ring—not a diamond, though, but it was perfectly dear—and some skates—I'm sure you skate, Mr. Morris, don't you? and a tennis racquet. Don't you perfectly adore tennis, Mr. Morris?"

CELIA, (interrupting): "Flossie, I have just asked Mr. Blake if he wouldn't like to walk out to Turtle Creek with me and get some chestnut burrs. I think they are the dearest things. Won't you and Mr. Morris go, too? We will go Tuesday night after school."

FLOSSIE: "Oh, charming! What a delightful thought! You will surely go. Mr. Morris."

MORRIS, (aside): "Great Heavens! what are they up to?" (Aloud): "I should be delighted."

CELIA, rising: "Flossie, dear, I think we must go. The hour is late."

FLOSSIE: "Yes, we are sorry to go, but will hope to meet you again on Tuesday night. We will wait at the bridge."

IV.

Scene, path up the hill.

Morris and Blake.

Blake. "Say, Dan, what do you suppose they mean?"

Morris: "Hang it! I don't know. I suppose its some 'new woman' dodge, and I don't half like it."

Blake: "Neither do I, but I'm curious about the thing, and I believe I'll stick it out, and see what they are up to."

Morris: "Well, if you do, I will too. Is it a bargain?"

Blake: "Yes; lets see it out."

V.

Scene, College hall.

Blake and Morris, then Celia and Flossie.

Blake, at bulletin board: "Say, Dan, wouldn't it be a joke if those girls offered to take us to this lecture? They've taken us everywhere now that they could without paying for us?"

Morris: "I don't know about the joke of this thing, Blake. It isn't that I don't like the girls well enough, but I'd like to have the privilege of sending a note of invitation once in a while, and once in a while making a 'date' with them myself."

Blake: "Well, all I can say is that its awkward business for us, but—Great Jupiter! Here they come."

(Celia and Flossie approach.)

Celia: "O, Mr. Blake and Mr. Morris, you are just the ones we want to see! There is a lecture Friday night, which is to be given for the benefit of the Y. W. C. A., and we bought two extra tickets, just to 'help the cause along,' you know. Won't you please use them?"

Morris, (stammering): Why, of course, you must know, surely—you must know how—you must know surely our position in—a—"

Flossie: "We will not take 'no' for an answer. You must go with us."

Blake, (bowing low): "We shall be most delighted."

Celia: "Thank you. I know we shall all enjoy it. Good-bye for the present. We would linger, but duty calls in yonder class-room. Good-bye."

VI.

Scene, Mabel's room.

Mabel, Minnie, Celia and Flossie.

Celia, (with face buried in her handkerchief): "Oh, Mabel, I never can live through it! I never can!"

Flossie: "Oh, I wish, I wish we hadn't done it. What were we thinking of?"

Mabel: "I never dreamed you would carry the thing so far as really to ask for their hands."

Celia, "O Mabel! O Mabel! don't put it that way. Its horrible, horrible!"

Mabel, (soothingly): "Well, let that pass; but what did they say?"

Celia, (handing her note:) "Its there! The wretched thing is all there."

Flossie, (smiling a little): "You see we did it together, and they answered together. Horrid things!"

Celia, (moaning:) "Oh, I shall die! I shall die!"

Mabel, (beginning to read): "Messrs. Blake and Morris—"

Flossie: "That is what we said."

Mabel, (going on): "Regret they must decline—"

Celia: Oh, I can't bear it!"

Mebel: "Must decline the offer so kindly made to them, and trust their action will not bring great sorrow—"

Flossie: "Oh! Oh! Oh! Don't read any more. Its terrible."

Mabel: "There, there, girls! Don't feel so wretched. I really think they think of it as a joke. You have acted foolishly, and so have they. I think the only thing you can do now is to write a full explanation of the whole thing. how it began and everything about it. Maybe that will help."

Celia, (brightening): "Well, we will do that. They must surely see that it has all been a joke. Anyway we will write the note."

VII.

Scene, Mabel's room.

The four girls.

Celia, (twisting ring on finger): "Girls, its perfectly glorious to be engaged, and Dan is so lovely. Oh, to think those boys were so lovely, Floss, when we were so foolish!"

Flossie: "Yes, indeed; I thought we had disgraced ourselves forever."

Mabel: "What did they say?"

Celia: "Well, in the first place, they sent individual notes. I can't tell anything more. Let Flossie tell her part."

Flossie: "No, indeed; only this: Mr. Blake said he would wait. And that's all I am going to tell, so there!"

Mabel: "Well, I am glad you are out of that dreadful muddle; but neither of you girls know the most wonderful thing of all, and that is Min."

Celia: "Why, what about Min?"

Mabel: Why, only this: that while you have been paddling your own canoe, some one has taken hold of Minnie's and brought it safe to shore."

Flossie: "Why, Min! You Spinx!"

Celia: "But tell us all about it, and when did the epitaph walks begin?"

Minnie: "Never mind when they began. At any rate, we don't spend the time in reading epitaphs."

Mabel: "Well girls, doesn't it prove that all things come to those who wait?"

Celia, (archly): "But what about those who don't wait?"

Mabel: "Thank you, I think I prefer to wait."

R. L. H., '97.

THE KNIGHT OF TOGGENBURG.

"Gallant one, accept devotion
From a sister's heart;
Crave no other deep emotion,
For 'twill grief impart.
Calmly may my presence greet thee,
Calmly see thee go;
For thy gently falling tear-drop,
Moves no chord of woe."

This he hears in silent sorrow,
Flushed he urges speed;
Lingers one embrace to borrow
Then he mounts his steed.
Sends to all his strong adorers,
Dwelling 'mid the Swiss;
Bids he holy tomb explorers,
Nor the red cross miss.

Mighty deeds of valor vying,
By their prowess strong,
While their helmet crests are flying
'Mid the hostile throng;
And the Togg'nburg name of terror
Daunts the Musselman.
Still the grief of love's sad error
Haunts like spectre wan.

For a year he bore the anguish,
Then his proud thoughts yield;
Cares he not the foe to vanquish,
Nor his good sword wield.
Joppa's vessel rides the billow,
Spreading all her sail;
Bears him swift to seek his pillow,
In his true love's vale.

Eager at her portal waiting,
Knocks the pilgrim swain;
Warder's voice like thunder grating
Answers him again—
"Thou art seeking not a maiden,
But a deep-veiled bride;
Ever unto God and Heaven,
Married to abide."

Then he leaves his hall forever,
Bids to arms adieu;
Bids good-bye to steed, which never
Proved to him untrue.
From the Togg'nburg heights descending,
Leaps he all unknown,
Wolf skins thick disguise are lending,
Round his shoulders thrown.

And he built himself a bower
In the sacred gloom,
Where the cloister turrets tower,
And the lindens bloom.
Waiting there from blush of morning,
Till the evening glow;
Quiet hope his face adorning,
Lone, but not in woe.

Mutely gazed he on that gable,
Sheltering her he loved,
Gazed upon her casement sable,
Till the window moved,
Till his darling's form appearing,
Till her image dear,
Bowing low and ever nearing
Seemed an angel's peer.

Then he gladly sought sweet comfort,
In the balm of sleep;
Yet rejoiced when morning's consort,
Chased the darkness deep.
Thus he sat for many a morrow,
Dead to love's sweet pang;
Waiting without pain or sorrow
Till the window clang,

Till his darling's form appearing,
Till her image dear,
Bending low and ever nearing
Seemed an angel's peer.
Daily thus his vigil kept he,
Till one fatal morn,
Cold in death's embraces slept he,
Slain by love forlorn.

Y. W. C. A.

The closing days of school life at the Institute in 'Ninety-five, were made pleasant by a visit from Miss Sara Carson of New York. Miss Carson was until of late the Secretary of the Y. W. C. A. of the Harlem "Annex," New York, but is now engaged in evangelistic work in New Jersey, New York and Pennsylvania.

Although her stay at Bucknell was short, she endeared herself to all the girls, making the influence of her christian life felt by every one with whom she came in contact. Two gospel meetings were held in the parlors, but most of the time was devoted to receiving the girls informally in Miss Carson's own suite. Gathered here in little groups, they listened with riveted attention as she told them of her experiences in Association work in New York, and then applied the story to the opportunities of school life. Miss Carson's methods are simple and quiet, appealing directly to the heart, which, combined with her own pleasing personality, are sure to secure her a same welcome, should she ever visit us again.

Just before the holidays the Association sent Miss Eastman of Utah, a number of dolls tastefully dressed by the yonng ladies, to delight the heart of her pupils at the Xmas tide.

Athletics.

On December 7, at a meeting of the foot-ball team Cober, '99, was elected captain for next year.

The College Girl's Basket ball Team is quite an innovation at Bucknell, and one which so far has proved successful. Up to the present time, the team, a picture of which appears in this issue, has played but one match game,—that with the Institute girls; they hope to play more in the Spring when they are able to resume practice. It would be advantageous for the team if they were permitted to use the Tustin Gymnasium certain hours during the winter, as the Institute Gymnasium is too small for practice. The Team is as follows:—Mary Wolfe, (Capt.), Mary Harris, Nellie Taylor, Alice Thomas, Mary Chambers, Henrietta Allen, Alice Lillibridge, and Nan Gilchrist.

The election of the Athletic Association on December 14, brought to light the great interest felt by the Bucknell students in athletics. Up to that date there were but thirty or forty members of the Association; but that day over one hundred dollars was taken in in payment for membership tickets, at one dollar each. The large increase in members made the election rather unwieldy; so that it was not possible to finish electing the officers, though the meeting lasted three hours. After electing Hollinshead, '97, President of the Athletic Association; Grim, '97, Vice President; Lesher, '97, Secretary; Wilson, '97, Manager of foot ball team; and Eicholtz, '97, Manager of the base ball team, they adjourned to meet in January.

The work in the Gymnasium this term under the direction of Mr. Bunnell will be of exceptional interest. Upon entrance each student will undergo a physical examination, measurements will be taken and a graphic chart, such as used in the Yale Gymnasium, will be employed. The work will consist of progressive exercises aiming at the systematic development of the body, and is so arranged that it will be most advantageous for all to start with the first drill of the term. The light work will consist of class drills with wands, dumb-bells and clubs; the classes will also be drilled in plain and figure marching, attention being paid especially to form in all the drills. The heavy work will be mainly on the bar, buck-horse, parallel bars, and combinations of these. At the end of the term an exhibition will be given which, we have no doubt, will surpass all former ones. The student showing himself the most proficient gymnast at this exhibition will be granted a regulation B.

CHEMICAL ROMANCE.

Said Atom to Molly Cule,
  "Will you unite with me?"
And Molly Cule did quick retort,
  "There's no affinity."
Beneath electric light plants' shad,
  Poor Atom hoped he'd meet her,
But she eloped with a rascal Base,
  Her name is now Saltpetre.—Ex.

Local.

Ask the Anderson Club who Judas is.

Prof. Rockwood recently laughed in class!

Question in recent examinations: "Did you sign the pledge?"

J. T. Anderson, '98, recently addressed the Milton Y. M. C. A.

Messrs. Sheddan and Schuyler, both of '95, were at Bucknell during the holidays.

Heard in Livy Class: "The Saguntines used a spear with a fir handle." What fur?

The Pi Beta Phi's have secured a fraternity hall in the old Miller Mansion on Second Street.

A happy New Year to one and all, large and small, short and tall, and now, we're "all!"

A trade-last for the Freshman girls, recently heard on College Hill: "My! how fresh they look!"

The Greek Instructor received recently an invitation addressed to himself and wife. Congratulations!

Dr. Aviragnet assisted in a grand musical recital given at Carlisle under the direction of Father Ganss.

Bucknell will have a large Basket-ball team during the winter term. Hering will have charge of the players.

A '97 maiden is giving instructions in Chinese nursery rhymes. Miss Alice Lillibridge is her most apt pupil.

The most joyous Christmas music at Bucknell was the silence of the bells. "That's where the paradox comes in."

We were glad Dave Elliott, who was injured in the Thanksgiving game, was able to be among us before school closed.

"Actions speak louder than words." So do Mr. McKay's shoes as they crackle into German every bright morning.

A problem in Freshman Mathematics: The square root of 9, plus the cube root of 27, equals the square root of 36; but the answer may be found by the Rule of Three.

Prof. G. E. Fisher, S. R. Wood and T. L. Josephs were among the speakers at the Hartleton C. E. Convention.

Among familiar faces at Bucknell during the holidays were those of Misses Mary Bartol, Ruth Sprague and Alice Hartley.

W. T. Chase, Jr., who entered this year as Freshman, has gone to Haverford. He can get home more easily from there.

Dr. Perrine lectured recently before the Lycoming County Teachers' Institute on the subject, "What is an English Classic?"

Mr. Harvey Marsh, a former student of Bucknell, now of U. of P. Dental School, spent the Holidays with the President's family.

Dr. Groff delivered a course of lectures before the Wyoming County Teacher's Institute at Tunkhannock the early part of vacation.

Reasons given as to why Brady wasn't in class: he was having his hair cut, and was under the influence of ether. Who was the barber?

Dr. and Mrs. Harris spent part of the vacation at the Atlanta Exposition. They also visited Chatanooga and its neighboring battlefields.

Did "Doc" Brown oversleep that he had to declare so pathetically in Psychology, "I have just wokened up?" "Where were you, owl, last night?"

The University sermon for December was preached on December 15, by J. Sexton James, D. D., editor of the new Baptist paper, The Commonwealth, and a member of the Class of '68.

Miss Mary M. Wolfe has written a series of very interesting articles on "Women's College Fraternities," which appeared in the Philadelphia Press during the month of December.

From Rhetoric Class: "The beautiful and forcible sometimes clash: the fist of a burglar thrust at you at midnight might be forcible, but not beautiful,—unless lighted up by electric light."

A feature at the musicale given by Dr. Aviragnet on December 12, was the singing of the college song, the words of which were composed by Miss Mary Bartol, '94, and the music by Dr. Aviragnet. The music is infectious in its ring and "go," and well suits the spirited words.

Lost! A 5-cent pencil pad. Same had owner's name engraved thereon. It is thought that Mr. Rivenburg took it. Finder will be liberally rewarded and no questions asked, upon returning same to Johnnie Sinton.

Messrs. Judson and Arthur Hanna expected to spend their holidays with their brother Tom Hanna, '95, at Plantsville, Conn. Whether they did so or not we cannot tell, as they declined to be interviewed.

Dr. and Mrs. Hulley spent Christmas with Mrs. Hulley's parents, at Stamford, New York. Mrs. Hulley remained during the entire vacation, but Dr. Hulley spent the latter part of the time in filling his lecture engagements.

Among former Bucknellites who spent the vacation in Lewisburg were Charles Gundy, of U. of P.; Prof Joseph Wolfe of State College; Rev. Wm. Corson, pastor at Eagleville, Pa.; Dr. Elmer E. Wolfe of Fort Edward Collegiate Institute.

Misses Anna Rodgers and Mary Chambers have punctured their tires again! They have accordingly stored their wheels in the attic, and will give no further instruction in "biking" until the authorities clear the pebbles from the roads.

Though every young man when he starts for college is impressed with the fact that "Life hath quicksands, life hath snares," he has doubtless not been put on his guard against the "snare of the Fowler," into which he is most liable to fall.

The first preliminary debate of the Junior Class took place on December 6. All the debaters were appointed for the second preliminary. Those who took part in the debate were, Messrs. Rivenburg, Fisk, Collins, Kunkle, Grim, Barner, Sprague and Nelson.

Professor, showing how literature influences our conception of historical characters: "Our idea of Cleopatra we get from Shakespeare. Shakespeare has also given us Julius Caesar, Coriolanus;—Milton has given us the Devil.—" He wonders why the class laughs.

A number of Bucknell students have received a copy of "The Young Men of India," of which Mr. Raymond Davis, '94, is contributing editor. The issue contains an article by Mr. Davis on "The American Student." Though our University is not mentioned by name, Mr. Davis has done high honor to his Alma Mater in this article.

A case of sentiment, not meter:

"If you give it to Mr. Ware,
He will never, never care;
But will quick make bold to dare
This black mitten e'en to wear."

ANSWER.

"If I give it to Mr. Ware,
He will rave and tear his hair,
To think his love presumed to dare
Give him one mitten when he needs a pair."

Harold Perrine on December 10, cut his leg very severely with a penknife, and narrowly escaped severing an artery. This is only one of a series of mishaps. His previous record is as follows: fell from a loft and broke his arm; twice narrowly escaped drowning; ran a pair of scissors into his cheek, and a knife into his throat. These are all that come to mind now. There are others.

Seventeen electives are offered this term to the Seniors and Juniors. The choice of the two or three from these has been a perplexing thing to many a one who "wants them all." A Junior who was looking at the list of electives on the bulletin board was heard to say, with a despairing sigh: "Oh, I'm glad they don't give us electives earlier in our course; we don't even know our own minds now."

One fond mother, in attempting to tell her friends what a safe nest she had found for her daughter at Bucknell, said: "Why, you know its perfectly lovely! The boys never see the girls except at church. You know the Institute is at least a mile from the college building, and of course the boys and girls can have nothing whatever to do with one another." Surely a case of far-sightedness!

Apropos of the recent marriage of Dr. Leroy Stephens to Miss Nana Wilson, Bucknell Institute Class '87, it is interesting to note that four members of this class are married and settled in Lewisburg. They are: Mary Stoner Gretzinger, Anna Kaler Dreisbach, the Senior Scholarship prize; Mary Sober Grove and Nana Wilson Stephens a fifth member of the class, Mrs. Harriet Spratt Hulley, made her home in Lewisburg pervious to her death.

The following is quoted from one of our town papers: "While duck hunting along Long Island Sound the boat occupied by Lieutenant George Shorkley and companion, was carried out to sea, and information reached Lewisburg that they had been run down by a steamer during a heavy fog. A telegram from the Lieutenant to his mother, however, Tuesday evening, stating that he had reached the shore in safety, greatly relieved his friends. He has been working on a railroad on Long Island and was having a little Sunday sport when the tide headed him for Europe." We are indeed glad that the accident did not result fatally, and were glad, too, to see George back with us safe and sound.

The Band and Orchestra gave a delightful concert on the evening of December 6, under the leadership of Messrs. Bunnell and Martin. The selections were spirited, and evinced careful preliminary practice, the last one being particularly fine. In it the hunt was represented very vividly, and the frequent pistol reports added the finishing touch to its realty. The concert was enhanced by vocal solos, a duet and a quartette. Miss Irene Walls' exquisite rendering of "Madrienne" received a well-deserved, hearty encore. The young men are to be highly congratulated on the entertainment of the evening. The attendance was larger than Bucknell Hall has seen for some time at an affair of this kind.

The Athletic Association had a wild, enthusiastic time at their election on Dec. 14th. They also had a wild and enthusiastic time the night previous. The meeting was called to order at 10.30 o'clock Saturday morning, and lasted until half-past one. As numerous dinner bells rang, here and there, a starving athlete disappeared to return almost instantly with his dinner in his mouth and hands. The hill was flecked with "bread and butter boys" racing up and down between the balloting times. The Association was intensely athletic in more ways than one for three hours, but yet had to adjourn to finish the election this year. The fraternal spirit which prevailed was the cause of the Association's lingering so long together.

The Sophomore Declamation Contest held in Bucknell Hall on December 14, was a decided success, and though only one of the contestants can gain the prize, still all may have the satisfaction of work well done. The declamations showed study and honest effort, and the result was an enjoyable entertainment. The contestants were J. G. Lauderbaugh, Robert G. Slifer, Edward Flint, Harry C. Fithian, Benj. F. Thomas, Andrew H. Forrester, E. Herbert Dutton, James P. Stober, Rutlidge T. Wiltbank, Jr. and G. Morgan Davis. The music, which was exquisite, consisted of a vocal duet by Miss Gould and Mr. Bunnell, two selections by the String Quartette Club, a piano solo by Miss Aikin, and a violin duet by Miss Louise Lawshe and Mr. Brown Martin.

Those who attended Mr. Steck's reading of Bulwer Lytton's "Richelieu" in Bucknell Hall on the evening of December 9, heard a good thing. In his prefatory remarks, Dr. Steck sought to correct the popular and erroneous opinion that Richelieu was, at the time of this play, decrepit and bowed with age. Assuming that Richelieu retained his erect carriage to the end of his life, Mr. Steck's impersonation of the character was excellent. Especially effective was the scene where the cardinal, opposing the emissaries of Louis, draws the circle of the church about his ward, whom he is defending. The chief criticisms on the performance were on Dr. Steck's treatment of his audience: the small size of an audience is no excuse for a speaker's antagonizing it, as was done on this occasion. The explanations, too, were of things that, for the most part, needed no explanation, and in the course of the evening became tedious.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Without:—the merry skaters fly
All gracefully to and fro.
Within:—the Institute maidens cry:
Their hearts are filled with woe.
With tear-dimmed eyes and blanched cheek
They scan the mail from home:
Above the wailing comes the shriek,
"Why don't my permit come?"

Miss M. Jones is very fond of "Honey".

How is it that Miss Raike is so charmed by Miller.

It seems that Mr. Gilchrist's favorite animal is the camel.

How about Miss O'Donnell's cutting stars on the ice?

The Senior class in Music now write an essay every month upon some musical subject.

We hope there will be no more bats in the main building for Miss Church's sake.

Miss Marguerite O'Donnell spent the Christmas vacation with Miss Mabel Williams at Ridgeway.

Miss Mabel Lovegrove left school before the term closed in order to visit New York with her parents.

The Misses Kate and Maud Goddard were at the home of their uncle, Rev. Wm. H. R. Corlies of West Philadelphia during the vacation.

Dr. Aviragnet gives a prize each term for excellence of work in Harmony and Theory. This term the prize was awarded to Miss Olivia Silvers.

Miss Laura Angle spent part of her vacation in Washington. She could probably tell us much about the Capitol as she visited very near it, on New Jersey Avenue.

About six new girls entered the Institute at the beginning of the winter term. The building is very full, and it is hard to find places for all the girls who wish to room there.

We are pleased to have with us Miss Grace Wales, class of '69. She spent a part of last term, and expects to spend the remainder of the school year at the Institute working in the Studio.

A little seven year old visitor at the Institute when asked why he liked to visit the Institute so well replied, "I don't know any reason unless its because I'm a boy." Could a philosopher have answered better!

Miss Armitage went to the city during vacation to have an operation performed on her eyes. On the way she visited Miss Angle at Stafford. While in the city she was entertained at the home of Rev. David P. Leas, Treasurer of the Board of Trustees.

We wonder why Miss Madden, the night of the Institute fire, hurriedly took off her shoes to throw them into the fire; and why Miss Grant stood on the bed, fanning the flames with a sheet; and why Miss Folmer threw an empty pitcher at the mirror. And yet they say, only the girls' presence of mind prevented the fire from being a serious one!

The work of the Music department of the University is becomming better and broader every year. The piano, pipe organ and vocal courses have been advanced, while the band with Mr. Bunnel as leader and the orchestra and mandolin club conducted by Mr. Brown Martin are watched over with great care by Dr. Aviragnet. Mr. Herbert Moyer has trained a large class of guitar students this term.

Tuesday evening, December 10, the Institute Alumnae held their annual banquet in the Institute parlors. A goodly number of guests were present as usual. The intellectual feast consisted of musical and literary features. The music was furnished by Dr. Aviragnet and was unusually fine. The quartette of violins rendered selections from Mendelsshon and Beethoven. The duets by Messrs. Moyer and Martin were warmly applauded as usual. Miss VanDyke gave the current news in a very spicy manner and Mrs. Larison's Christmas story was enjoyed by every one. Miss Mary Wilson gave a partial account of her summer's outing. After spending by no means the least enjoyable part of the evening in the dining room the members felt the annual banquet to be one of the most enjoyable events of the school year.

ACADEMY NEWS.

Prof. Fisher spent his vacation at his home in Salem.

We regret that Anthony had to return home recently on account of illness.

Shuhart has recently developed into a singer. Listen for his warbling voice in chapel.

The Academy was never of so much importantance as in the recent Athletic Association election.

B. H. Giffin, a member of the 'Cad in 93, is at present in the hospital corps at Washington, D. C.

Mitchell and Thomas Bower have both broken through the ice into deep water. There is nothing like keeping up with the times.

The Academy reading room has thus far proved a success, being well patronized by the 'preps.' Principal Edwards has the knack of supplying the wants of the boys.

Registrar W. C. Gretzinger and family spent Christmas in Sunbury, the guests of Mrs. Gretzinger's father, Dr. W. B. Stoner.

Once again has examination work justified the wisdom of two saws with sharp teeth, viz: "Work wins;" and "The race is not to the fast."

Prof. and Mrs. Stewart entertained Principal Edwards' family and Mrs. Humphrey and son on Christmas Day at their cozy home on Sixth Street.

Prof. Phillips delivered a Christmas address before the Y. M. C. A. of Milton on Sunday afternoon December 22, He spent the rest of his vacation with his parents, at Plymouth.

A telegram received from John Jordon announces the sad news that Joe Jordon died of pneumonia at Meadeville Hospital, December 16. He was attending school at Allegheny College.

Principal Edwards and family, and Mrs. Black and daughter, remained at the Academy during the holidays. Mrs. M. A. Humphrey and son, of New York, were the guests of Mrs. Edwards for a part of the time.

Charles J. Pearse, Fourth Form, is to be congratulated on the timely gift which enabled him to make a two week's visit in Philadelphia, and to receive there needed treatment for his eyes. The assistance is most worthily given.

Our hearts were made glad on Thanksgiving eve. On being summoned into our neighbor's room, our eyes fell upon a real "Blair county" turkey, roasted to a pretty brown and delicately set on the table in the midst of other good things. Messrs. Bell were the hosts.

The evening reading hour and chapel services have become permanent features of the Academy routine. They give a wholeness to the Academy life that was wanting before Their influence upon the student body has been good, and hence they have won their place among the permanent institutions.

The Fourth Form Sunday School class spent a very enjoyable evening recently at the home of their teacher, Mrs. Hulley. The event of the evening was the review of the quarter's lessons, after which a social time was enjoyed. The boys say that Mrs. Hulley understands the art of entertaining.

The maximum enrollment of Academy students during the fall term was eighty-seven. Of these two withdrew early in the term. Of the eighty-four who took the regular work of the various forms, a fraction over 58% made an average grade, in each and all subjects taken, of above 8.5. A fraction over 14% of the whole number made an average grade in all subjects taken of above 9.5. A trifling fraction less than 24% of the whole made a general average in all subjects taken of 9.0—9.4. May their number speadily increase.

Professor Perrine's lecture, "The College Days of Daniel Webster," furnished a rare treat to the students of the Academy. So thoroughly and sympathetically has the Professor investigated the early years of the great stateman's life, that he is able to bring out with exceeding vividness, the leading events in Webster's early career, and also to show the formative influence which lay back of those events. By his graceful yet forceful expression, by his evident sympathy with every event portrayed, by his thorough appreciation of the worth of Webster, both as boy and man, Professor Perrine succeeded in bringing Daniel Webster very near to the hearts of the boys, nearer than he had ever been brought; and more than one went out from the room with a new courage to do and to perform. At the close of the lecture, the lecturer was given an enthusiastic vote of thanks. Professor Perrine will always be sure of a cordial welcome at the Academy.

The Spectator for December contains an interesting article entitled "The Celestial World, as viewed from the Moon." The writer describes the appearance of the earth and of the heavenly bodies as seen from the moon, and in so doing opens up a line of thought which is at once pleasing and suggestive.

The Bryn Mawr Lantern is an excellent magazine and should be read by every one. Literature, science, and topics of the day, have all found their way into its pages. Among the most interesting articles is one entitled "Must the Entrance Examination Go?" The question is discussed from different standpoints and in a concise and logical manner. The writer evidently believes that the entrance examination should not go, but that certain changes should be made in the conditions now existing. The article cannot fail to interest all students.

The exchange journals for this month are especially bright and interesting. They are well written and arranged and show the high literary standard existing in the different colleges. Among those most worthy of mention are The College Student, The Sibyl, The Pharetra, The Red and Blue, and The Smith College Monthly.

CHEW, CHEW, CHEW!

Chew, chew, chew!
On your gum behind a book!
And I would that a mirror could show you
How silly your faces look.

Oh, well for the lovers of gum,
That they're blessed with tireless jaws!
Oh, well for the looks of our school
If we had some restrictive laws!

So a ceaseless trade goes on
At the stores down under the hill;
But oh, for the sight of a face in repose
Or the glimpse of a jaw that is still.

Chew, chew, chew!
Till your muscles are tired and sore,
But the tender grace of a rosebud mouth
Will be yours, ah, never more!—Ex.

MEN AS THEY PASS.

Inquirer '99. Yes, Kilts will still be worn by little boys; green plasds will be especially fashionable this year.

H. R. W. It is very ill-bred to neglect to recognize an acquaintance in passing. No gentleman would be guilty of such gross impoliteness.

Professor of Freshman Class: I have been unable to find the answer to your question. Probably if you would consult the book "Hints on Child Training," you would find some suggestions.

Tom. A lounging attitude in class is not considered the most charming.

'97. Boys and other folks who know what is proper ought always to walk in front of people, unless it is absolutely impossible. In that case, they may ignominiously bring up the rear.

Teddy 99. We cannot tell you when the Sophomore banquet will be held. We should judge, however, it would be some time this year.

Ned '97. Give your friend a shoe-polishing outfit for his birthday present, as it is a most needed as well as neglected article.

D. E. '98. We beg leave to decline giving advice in such a serious matter as getting your hair cut. Probably if you should consult a barber he could help you.

J. T. Bashfulness may be overcome by daily practice in turning somersaults.

Editorial.

THE Woman's Edition of the MIRROR came out on scheduled time. The young ladies had but a limited time in which to prepare the material, and coming as it did during the examinations and vacation they were considerably handicapped. The subscribers have judged of its literary merits. As to the business side, in numbers the edition was increased one-half, and eight pages in size. The edition was quickly exhausted and some were unable to secure them. It has been proposed that the Woman's Edition be made an annual affair and that they be given ample time for its preparation.

BOOKS alone cannot furnish a competent education. They may bring to the student the principles of philosophy, the laws of science and the beauties of classic literature; they may even give him a feeling of acquaintance and kinship with the authors who penned them. But they cannot furnish the development and inspiration which alone comes from vital association with one's fellows. This is an essential to a well-rounded education which is found only in the book of life—human life. Books are one of the mightiest factors in education, but of themselves they are not all-sufficient.

THE Holiday Number reopened the Literary Society Question. Whether the boys will follow the lead of Zeta or not matters little. But something should be done. Anything that promotes the practice of speaking at Bucknell ought to prosper. The chief vocations entered from these halls are preaching, teaching, law and medicine. To the three former, ability to speak effectively is indispensable. A sort of languor, however, has come over the students in their attitude toward the societies and like Turks in a rain-storm, we sit calmly down murmuring—it is fate. The underclassmen exhibit the greatest unconcern imaginable. The Juniors show some interest because of the Junior Debate Prize. There is a remedy. Theta Alpha has possession of the old Literary Society Cup which has not been debated for within seven years. Let this be brought out and contested for by the underclassmen on the basis of excellence in debate. The cup, which is now only a source of comfort, would become an object of honor and emulation.

MANY colleges have dispensed with the commencement orations of the graduating class, and have some famous speaker in their places. The advisability of this turns on the object of the orations. If it is a reward for close application during the course it is unnecessary. For the graduations summa cum laude, magna, etc., are sufficient and founded on a fairer basis. If the object is entertainment the famous speaker would certainly be more acceptable to all except the friends and relations of those graduating. Of this small group, two-thirds will feel disappointed because their favorites were not among the ten speakers. Nine-tenths of the remainder will be disappointed because their favorites failed to receive the gold watch. Seven years of toil rewarded in the end by a seat at graduation day on high, before an audience that is saying at every glance "you belong to the second rank" is rather bitter. Two-thirds of the class each year have this to undergo. If, however, the senior classes choose an orator, then the graduations, "summa cum laude," etc., would assume more prominence, and all would be honored according to actual standing.

THE Library is for the benefit of all the students; it is intended to be a common blessing. Through the efficient labors of Prof. Martin and the kindness of many friends it is in a better position now than ever before to prove thus helpful to the student body. But it must fail to accomplish in the fullest measure the purpose for which it has been established so long as so large a number of students are forgetful of the claims of others. When a class, consisting of thirty-five or more members, is referred to a line of books, of which there is a limited number in the Library, the wisdom usually credited to a college student should dictate that some members of the class must be compromised, if the book be taken out instead of being read in the room. This is so often true that mention of it here seems almost imperative. The members of no one class are alone culpable, but some of every class are guilty of thoughtlessness in this respect. Let us recognize more clearly our mutual obligation and dependence.

THE VOICE OF THE CALENDAR.

My work is simple, only this,
To mark for you the passing days.
But yet 'tis all I'm giv'n to do;
In doing this I merit praise.

For you it is to use the days,
Employ the weeks, and months, and years,
And build of them a monument,
Approv'd of Him—above earth's seers.

'Twas yesterday, it is to day;
The morrow ever 'scapes our grasp.
I mark them all; you have but one;
Then sieze to day with firmest clasp.

THE RIOT IN CHINA.

Our subject is one which needs no apology and no explanation. Those who became accustomed to watch with interest for fresh intelligence of the late war between China and Japan, have found that interest continued by the wide-spread riots dealing death and destruction throughout the "Middle Kingdom." "But," you say, "these are a mere outgrowth of the unsettled condition of the country, and will die out of themselves. Why, then need we give them our attention?" Why need we? Our own citizens are among those slain by the reckless mobs; people of our sister nations have been murdered in cold blood. Is this not reason enough to arouse our solicitious interest?

Do you know the story of the massacre at Wha-seng? Five unsuspecting missionaries at this sanitarium were suddenly seized, one morning, by a destructive band and hurried without. While the captives were standing in the broiling sun, a brave native undertook to plead for their release, but the ring leader of the ruffians rushed up flaunting his red flag and shouting "Remember the orders—Kill outright." Vain were prayers and entreaties! The cruel steel did its work, and the lifeless bodies were left strewn about the grounds.

Time fails me to tell of the further slaughters. Men, women, and children were hacked with demoniac pleasure, houses were burned before the inmates could escape, and not till the wretches were satisfied that they had slain every foreigner, did they depart. Two however had escaped, almost miraculously, to tell the sad tale.

As the mournful company stands about that one long grave containing the remains of those ten massacre victims, can we not feel the thick clouds of darkness and ignorance and superstition hanging like a pall above us? A mission buried in a day!

You know already how they mobbed the hospital in Sze-chwen, setting fire to that new expensive building, and compelling the foreigners to flee. You know how the officials feigned support, but in reality allowed the mob to carry out all its dread designs;—how the Yamen offered as protection, two small, vile rooms into which a dozen or more missionaries, were crowded;—how some died in the foul air and close confinement; how boats were finally granted the now destitute refugers for escape, but boats—with no boatmen, no provisions, no necessities, no money even, with which to hire help.

In war, we may count the number slain or wounded, the battles fought, the victories won, but we cannot reckon the long sad years which must drag by until the country recovers from the ravages of an army on the march,—until the great stream of life, disturbed as it were by a volcanic eruption, assumes again its original course. So in the case of these riots, we may count the number slain and the refugees, we may read of the hardships undergone, but who can estimate the shattered nerves, the weakened vitality which will cause many to leave the field?

Consider the action of the Chinese in this matter and the impulse which led to such dire results. Why is it they have thus risen with one accord against the foreigners of whatever nationality. Rumor has it that they take this means to wipe out the humiliation of defeat in the late war. What cowardice! Vainly hoping that an exhibition, now, of brute force, will win for them the respect which they lost before. O cowardly method and false! O civilization so uncivilized! In the face of such a people shall we flinch and flee? Shall we withdraw our entire force and confess ourselves vanquished? Ah no! Let us reinforce the men already there with fresh recruits. Let us stand ready to fill the gap when one brave comrade falls. Let us exhibit a bravery equal to that of the Spartans who counted it a disgrace to return from the battle unless with their shields or on them—victorious or slain!

THE CHARACTER OF LINCOLN.

It is well known who Lincoln was and what he did. There has been but one great Lincoln. He was the savior of our Republic and the emancipator of four millions of slaves. For this he stands with the great men of the world.

But it is not the intention here to describe what he did or what he was; these are purely historical questions. The question of most interest to us all is, "What was he?"—What were those elements which made Lincoln that powerful ruler of men, which enabled him to conquer all and yet be in peace with all?" This is the important question, in search for the answer of which we shall all become better men. We shall therefore take for our theme, The traits of Lincoln's character.

His style of expression was pure and simple, and his logic almost infallible. His speeches are like Bacon's essays; the more attentively they are read, the more striking do they appear. The London Times, a bitter enemy of Lincoln, said that Lincoln's Gettysburg speech was equal to the best ever delivered, while parts of his Second Inaugural have been compared to the lofty portions of the Old Testament. In his composition, the work is done with clear precision and no waste. He once said to a friend, "I do not seek applause, nor to amuse the people, but to convince." In no speech was there fervor or rhetoric as it is commonly used; he talked to the reason and conscience of his hearers.

He was not a quick thinker but a sure and almost infallible one. This faculty enabled him to grasp the great, main fact in every problem; he knew where the greatest fact lay and always took it and held to it. When slavery was rending the Union he opposed slavery, but when the states seceded he shifted to the new and greater issue, the preservation of the Union. Douglass said, "I found no man in the Senate whom I would not rather meet in debate than Lincoln." But above all he did his own thinking, nor did he tell anyone what that thinking was until he had reached what he considered the truth. When Greely was abusing him for not abolishing slavery, he already had the Emancipation Proclamation lying in his drawer. He had not yet reached his conclusion. He was looking at both sides of the question, and getting the greatest fact.

Born in the lowest state of society and elevated through his own worth to the highest, he was in close touch with all the people. And he trusted the people. He was never afraid to stake his chance upon the faith that what was intrinsically right would prove in the long run to be politically safe. So one of his most distinguished traits was his humanness of character or nature; he was the expression of his people. For this trait some people have called him the greatest man that ever lived. It was this trait which made him a real ruler—the real democratic president.

Lincoln had firmness of resolution. When his iron logic had once brought him to a conclusion, he held that conclusion with unyielding tenacity. Schuyler Colfax said that Lincoln's judgment, when once settled, was almost as immovable as the eternal hills. In those times which tried men's souls, his government was strong and his will made him a real ruler. But that will, through which the divine Spirit breathed, made him a virtuous ruler. When he entered upon the duties of the presidency people of all nations wondered who the back woodsman was. They were soon compelled to feel that he was a master and that it was as useless to attempt to resist him as a French Emperor or a Russian Czar.

It seems right at this point to note a fact concerning Mr. Lincoln which ought not to be overlooked and which can not be denied. This was his entire political unselfishness, the rarest moral quality among men in public life. While he was president there was one great idea in his mind, viz, not that he should save the Union but that the Union should be saved. He declined to give General Schurz leave of absecence to speak in his behalf. After his second election he said, "If I know my heart, my gratitude is free from any taint of personal triumph. It is no pleasure to me to triumph over any man. But I give thanks to the Almighty for this evidence of the people's resolution to stand by free government and the rights of humanity."

This distinguishing trait made Lincoln very liberal. This is shown by such examples as appointing Mr. Chase, his personal enemy, Chief Justice of the United States. He did not abuse his political opponents, but on the other hand he often appointed them to responsible positions. He had the faculty of estimating the abilities of men and his unselfishness and liberality caused him to put these men where they belonged. This he did, uninfluenced by party affiliations.

Now we have to mention his most familiar and abiding trait. This was his honesty. We all know Lincoln as "Honest Abe." This was the trait of his identity, which was with him from beginning to end. While other traits seemed changing, all the while the universal honesty was there. When he thought, he thought to get truth, not to follow the steps of another's logic and reproduce it like a machine. When he was once sure that he had truth he would tell the truth and all of it just as he found it. He was pre-eminently the honest lawyer, the one best fitted to defend him who justly deserved defense. In debate he never misstated his opponent. His honesty led him to choose the right "as God gave him to see the right," not as some instinctive evolution, or hereditary trait gave him to see the right but "as God gave him to see the right," to use his own words. His action was right action. He opposed slavery because he thought slavery wrong; and he abolished slavery because he thought it was right to do so. He was true to himself and his Maker.

Yet with all these attributes and without courage, Lincoln could not have become such a great leader of men. He possessed both physical and moral courage. His walking openly through the streets of Richmond shortly after its fall when the city was filled with drunken rebels was an example of the former, his maintaining his policy through the entire war without the least change in the face of almost overwhelming opposition was an example of the latter.

Lincoln was lonely and solitary. So have been all great men. Carlyle, "The great prose poet," Cromwell, "The martyr of English liberty," Milton, "The glory of English literature," were all lonely. It could not have been otherwise. They had more of what Emerson called "The divine inspiration." They had more of that divine spirit than their fellows. Hence they had few companions, few who could appreciate the glory of their undertakings. Lincoln was lonely because he alone arose to the sublimity of his undertaking; he alone seemed to bear the burden of the human race. "Silent as to matters of deep import, self sustained, facing alone all grave duties, solving alone all difficult problems, and enduring alone all consequences, he appears a man so isolated from his fellows amid such tests and trials that one is filled with a sense of awe almost beyond contemplation." At last the face and the form of the solitary man showed the wear of the times. "The eyes went deeper into their caverns, the furrows sank deeper into the sallow face, a stoop bent the shoulders as if the burden of the soul had a physical weight," yet he sought from no one, either counsel, or strength, or sympathy.

Such was the character of Lincoln; such was the nature of America's greatest statesman. But he was more than America's statesman, he was the statesman of all nations. His lofty character is a model for all men, his sayings are laws for all peoples, his deeds were done for humanity. He was a mighty man. I believe that the divine Spirit breathed into his intellect and he became a genius; into his will and he became truly virtuous; into his feelings and he became love. He stands with the great men of the world, with Moses, Alfred, Cromwell and Washington.

Athletics.

Attendance at gymnaseum drills this term has been good, taking into account the quality of the skating. Physical examinations will be commenced this week. It is important that every man secure his measurements.

Few of the upper classmen who are not required to take physical culture, prefer the indoor work to skating. The second class numbers about forty and is being systematically drilled in light gymnastics and work on the bar by Hering. The heavy work is led by Bunnell.

Candidates for the baseball team will be coached alternate evenings with basket-ball candidates. Men capable of filling the various positions appear to be numerous, and the prospects are certainly good for a winning team. Captain Geary will soon take charge of the men and desires the hearty co-operation of every one.

Syracuse University wants to play us football next season at some neutral point. Their eleven is chosen from twelve hundred students but many candidates are excluded for low class standing. During the past season, Syracuse won the intercollegiate championship of New York state by defeating Colgate, 4–0, at Syracuse. By winning such a game, Bucknell would increase her splendid record, and we surely ought to win.

Arrangements are being made for the second annual indoor meet of the College athletes to be held in the gymnasium on February 22. A small admission fee will be asked from all who do not compete in the contests. The program will consist of running, pole-vaulting, high dive, wrestling, boxing, etc. Director Cober will be at the Gym. daily to instruct those who wish to contest. Other information can be had from Manager Dillon.

Our light-weight and agile athletes are now chasing the basket ball around the Gym. under the directions of Hering. The notice says, "Men of ability and merit will get on the team. Several trips are contemplated." This is the proper spirit. For small injuries this indoor game is more dangerous than football. It would be of the greatest local interest if, outside the regular team work, a series of inter-class games for the championship of the College were arranged, five players to be on each team. It is likely that an association will be formed independent of the Athletic Association. Games will be played with Williamsport, Danville and Bloomsburg. Quite an interest is being shown in this branch of sport.

The Danville District Convention will be held at Milton, Friday, Saturday and Sunday, February 14, 15, 16. Dr. Lincoln Hulley, S. R. Wood, '96, and C. W. Harvey, '99, are on the program. E. C. Kunkle, '97, is the University member of the Danville District Committee. Bucknell should send a large delegation to the Convention.

We desire to repeat an announcement made and invitation given in the issue of November 25 relative to the course of study now being pursued by the Volunteer Band. The text book used is The Cross in the Land of the Trident. The meetings are held in the Association rooms on alternate Thursday evenings. All are invited.

Dr. Harris addressed the meeting last Tuesday evening, giving a plain, practical talk bearing specifically upon the coming meetings under the charge of Rev. J W. Weddel. The meeting was very helpful to all present and formed a fitting preliminary to the meetings which are to follow.

The sermon on the Day of Prayer for Colleges, Thursday, January 30, will be preached by Rev. J. W. Weddell, of Phila. Mr. Weddell will come to Bucknell Monday, January 27, and will conduct special services in the Chapel on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday evenings and Thursday afternoon, in addition to the regular sermon Thursday morning in the First Baptist Church. Special quartette music will be provided for these meetings under the direction of W. M. Bunnell, chairman of the Music Committee of the Association.

Local.

What pledges did you make for 1896?

Barner thinks there's brevity in a short sentence.

The new catalogues have arrived. A total enrollment of 428 is shown.

A translation: "And he fell from the water up to the bridge, but was not injured."

A question that has been occupying the minds of all the thinkers; "Where did Garner get that hat?"

Harry Chapman, of Union City, had a pleasant visit with his Bucknell friends on Monday, the 20th inst.

Tom Cooper, who was taking work with the Freshmen, has gone to Ohio Wesleyan, Delaware, Ohio.

Conclusion drawn from the Merchant of Venice: "Marriage is a serious affair, preceded by tragic circumstances."

Bucknell students unanimously agree in thanking the "old weather man" for so long a season of fine skating.

Purdy has a good position as assistant instructor in Sophomoric Physiology. My little man, what is an artificial skeleton?

NOTICE. All parties securing Mr. Fisk to act as chaperon will do well to give him full instructions. Signed—several who were campused.

Mr. Clement A. Wild, '99, has left Bucknell to continue his studies at Haverford. He made many friends while here, and will be greatly missed.

Several new students are enrolled this term. Let us welcome them to this bee hive of industry and learning with a true Bucknell feeling for their welfare.

The directors are trying to get the University to put electric lights in the Gym., a much needed improvement on the main floor, especially in basket-ball season.

A few Sophomores, who got only "V. G." in Chemistry but deserved (?) more, sat and raged in silence. Before June '98, they will learn that this world is full of unrealized expectations even for the wise.

Monday, January 13, Dr. Harris gave a lecture before the students of the College and Academy on "Habit." His stirring words of advice and caution have left an impression not to be forgotten by those who heard him.

Heard recently in the Physiology lecture room—

Mr. Katherman: What animals contain chlorophyl, Mr. Diggs?

Mr. Diggs: Frogs and Freshmen.

> When Sparta's youth went forth to fight,
> His mother yelled with all her might:
> "Don't forget to bring that shield,
> When you leave the battle-field!
> If they've sung your funeral sonnet,
> Tell the men to bring you on it."

The following are the new officers of Euepia Literary Society:—President, H. H. Bower, '96; Vice President, J. V. Lesher, '97; Secretary, L. B. Sinnette, '97; Treasurer, J. D. Frederick, '99; Critic, H. F. Harris, '96; Librarian, E. R. Powell, '96.

December 28 was Sigma Alpha Epsilon day at the Atlanta Exposition. The fraternity was represented on the board of managers by the President, Vice President. and eight others, including the Governor of Georgia. At the banquet in the evening toasts were responded to by eminent Sigma Alpha Epsilons from all over the country.

A long distance telephone has been added to the equipment of the Registrar's office. This will greatly facilitate the work of the office.

Two new scholarships have been established by Eben C. Jayne, Esq., of Philadelphia, for the benefit of young women in the College, the award to depend upon the standing and character of the students receiving them.

In Logic Class—after Sprague has just finished reciting.

Baker, slowly rising, "The next point is the one that has just been given, isn't it, Professor?" (aubible laugh by class).

Once upon a time, a Sem. girl went home for a vacation but too willingly took the advice of a noble college man and got off at ———well, it wasn't her destination. Space forbids further details but Miss Church will explain to interested parties.

A cut of the football team, which represented Bucknell on the gridiron last season, appears in this edition of the Mirror. This same team, with few exceptions, will defend the Bucknell goal next season, and we predict that they will guard well the sacred ground.

"Bob" Burdette recently revisited Lewisburg and many students went to hear him. All were pleased with the interesting and humorous "Story of Rollo" and we only await his next lecture to turn out en masse in order to show Bucknell's appreciation of a good attraction.

Only six or seven students remained in the college building during the long holiday vacation. The principal attraction for them was the Union County Teachers' Institute, held in the opera house, where Prof. Hulley delivered several interesting and instructive lectures on education.

The annual meeting of the Student's Publishing Association will be held Saturday, February 8, at 10 A. M. The following officers and editors will be elected: President, Vice President, Secretary, Business Manager, two Senior Editors, two Junior Editors, one Sophomore Editor, and one Freshman Editor.

On all sides, we hear approval of the excellent edition of the Mirror edited by the young ladies. Even those staid old thunderers of the editorial "we" down town appreciate feminine ability in their profession. Truly, the board did not make a mistake when they allowed the girls to pilot the Mirror into the new year.

Our printer, Mr. J. W. C. Shamp, has recently had a Shipman Oil Engine placed in his office, with which to run his presses.. This will greatly facilitate the work of printing the Mirror, as it was hard work to run the press by foot power, as formerly. Mr. Shamp invites the students and others to call and see it.

Theta Alpha Literary Society recently elected the following officers for the current term:—President, A. W. Johnson, '96; Vice President, R. B. McCay, '96; Secretary, A. M. Forrester, '98; Treasurer, B. F. Thomas, '98; Critic, S. R. Wood, '96; Censor, D. K. Laudenslager, '98; Curator, J. R. L. Diggs, '98.

Now that we are deprived of the presence of the fair Semites in Chapel it is said that several of the boys have lost interest in prayers. Perhaps it would be well to grant these an opportunity to attend the exercises at the Institute. We are certain they would be glad and perhaps there would be satisfaction all around.

Several thoughtless students who have lately destroyed property in trying to effect an entrance to the gymnasium outside of hours, have been notified to settle damages and obey the rules which are now more rigidly enforced. On Saturdays, the new hours are 9:30 to 12 o'clock and 1 to 6 p. m; other days as usual.

We are proud of our college girls, especially the Glee Club, whose charming selections were rendered several times last term. The young ladies ought to give a local entertainment and then appear in some neighboring cities during the next vacation. Success would surely attend the efforts of a properly managed club.

A lamp exploded in room number 12, East Wing of the College building, last Tuesday evening, causing considerable damage to the contents of the room and a large amount of excitement. Owing to the prompt action of a number of students the fire was extinguished before it spread outside the room. The room is occupied by Morris and Bevan.

Professor in Physics class:—"The reason that Mr. Collins heard the echo on the lake, while persons on the bank failed to hear the sound, is explained by the fact that the echo may have been caused by objects above the bank, such as trees, etc."

Sinton:—"In that case Mr. Collins was evidently talking over their heads."

The fiscal year of the BUCKNELL MIRROR will close Feb. 8. Allow us to call the attention of our friends to the fact that many subscriptions remain unpaid which should be paid before that date. A prompt settlement will materially aid the Business Manager in settling the liabilities of the MIRROR and in presenting an acceptable report to the Publishing Association at their next meeting.

A recent issue of The Commonwealth, edited by one of our college graduates of '68, Dr James, contains an excellent picture of President Harris and an interesting biographical sketch of his life and work done for Keyston Academy and Bucknell. The high esteem in which we all hold our President and the merit of the article will insure its preservation for many days in the hands of Bucknell's friends.

The Athletic Association completed its annual election, continued from last term, on Saturday morning, January 18. The following officers were elected:

Baseball Manager,
R. V. Rex, '98.

Manager of General Athletics,
F. W. Dillon, '98.

Finance Committee,
J. V. Lesher, '97,
B. F. Thomas, '98,
J. C. Hazen, '99.

Executive Committee,
Hon. H. M. McClure, '77,
Dr. W. L. Gerhart, Ex-'86,
Prof. F. E. Rockwood,
Dr. Lincoln Hulley.

This is the term for indoor sociability; but where are Bucknell's organizations? The Press Association is just living, and Natural History and Science is seldom heard of. Law ceased to exist before the organization was perfected, and both literary societies have managed to elect officers. The girls are infusing new life into such organizations by their recently displayed activity. Wake up Bucknell boys; drop your studies sometimes; and become more sociable.

This is nothing but a local
As it were a written vocal,
Just to tell you—well—to tell you—
To tell you we are plunged in deep despair;
For the printer calls for copy;
Oh, he calls and calls for copy,
And we've naught but naught to give him, spite our care.

There is nothing literary
In this extraordinary
And peculiar composition,
That should give it rank with essays rich in art.
That is why you find it here,
With the locals over her,
Where all items strange and funny have a part.

Has'nt something happened to you,
Something strange? or if not, do you
Know some great and wondrous fellow,
Who'll make copy out of nothing?—shed no gore?
Then for goodness sake do tell us!
For our own dear sake do tell us!
And we'll bless you and extol you evermore.

W., '96.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Dr. Aviragnet will give the first musical of this term, Friday evening, January 31.

The Institute has welcomed eight new students this term, five boarders and three day pupils.

We are glad to enroll, as a boarder at the Institute, Miss Edith Bastress, of Sunbury, who was last term a day student.

The presence of a "Ouija board" in the Annex, is a cause of great wonderment to the young ladies. The truths it tells are to some "stranger than fiction."

A copy of the beautiful holiday edition of "Christmas Week at Bigler's Mill" has been presented to the Institute library by its author, Mrs. Dora E. W. Spratt, of the class of '78. A review of the book will appear in our next issue.

Owing to the crowded condition of Bucknell Hall last term, it has been thought best for the members of the Institute to hold their chapel exercises in the Institute school room during this term. In our last edition many requests were made of New Year. We would like to add, "May '96 bring to us a larger chapel building."

The Kalomathia Literary Society held the first meeting of this term on Friday, January 10, and elected the following officers: President, Miss Bertha Watkins; Vice President, Miss Gertrude Kase; Secretary, Miss Mary Youngman; Treasurer, Miss Maud Goddard; First Critic, Miss Mame Williamson; Second Critic, Miss Minnie Morris. The girls are taking up the work with added interest, and since we have such a good staff of officers, we feel confident that the society will prove very entertaining and helpful this term.

Several of the girls are deprived, for three days, of the privilege of skating, because the poor little dears did not say "Good night" to their gentlemen friends and walk home by themselves, according to the code of laws duly made and prescribed for skating. The "gentlemen friends" will please take notice and in future keep at a respectful distance when the girls are leaving the ice.

The regular meeting of the Alumnae Club was held Tuesday evening, January 14. The general topic of discussion was "The Inaccuracies of Common Speech." Miss Grace Slifer read a thoroughly practical paper on "Incorrect Expressions in Common Use." In the absence of Miss Mary Baker, who was to have read a paper on "Incorrect Pronunciations," an open parliment was held, the various members giving instances of the incorrect expressions which they had either heard or been conscious of using themselves.

Miss Hattie Lewis opened a discussion of the "Use of Slang" by giving Professor Brander Matthew's classification of the various slang phrases of to-day. An animated discussion followed, in which many of the members cited their own pet phrases, which they would be loath to relinquish. It was decided by common consent that it was permissible to use slang when by its use the thought could more forcibly and tersely expressed and at the same time not inelegantly. Mrs. Hulley read, as an example of pure English style, a selection from Lowell's essay, entitled "A Certain Condescension in Foreigners."

Miss Alice Lillibridge in a most interesting manner recounted some of her father's reminiscences of his experiences in the Army of the Potomac. The program was closed by the reading of the current events,—political, educational and literary,—by Miss Mary Butler.

The skating season has returned and with it all the dangers attendant upon an unwelcome plunge in the chill waters of the Susquehanna. In order to avoid so dire a catastrophe among the maidens at Bucknell, a new style of life preserver has been provided, warranted not to fail. Unlike the regulation life preserver, these will not only prevent the fair one from sinking, but will draw her safely from the watery abyss and see that wise measures are taken for resuscitation. In other words, four young gentlemen, wise and brave, connected with the University, have been appointed to take turns in acting as "life guards" when the girls are skating.

ACADEMY NEWS.

Pearse visits Northumberland quite frequently since his mode of travel has been facilitated by skating.

Mr. Edward Bell received a severely sprained ankle in the gymnasium while going through the class drill.

Sherman says, "I tell you, fellows, it is a good thing that, under the Civil Service, Government officials do not lose their position on account of a change of administration."

Many of the boys are well pleased with the location of the water filter, one especially, whose brother is at present suffering with a sprained ankle. The boys say he engages in flirtation with one of the fair sex who partakes of her evening meal at the second table.

We do not doubt that the last edition of the MIRROR, namely the Woman's Edition, will call forth many words of appreciation for those who so ably displayed their ability, and so we will add for ourselves that the edition was eagerly sought for, and highly appreciated.

Is it not strange that young men while attending our school will praise another which does not compare with our school in any point? We think that in a free land no one ought to confine himself to any one place that is not agreeable to him. Don't you think so, R. H. K ?

"Main Hall Roomers," as one of the Prof's styles those who live in the above mentioned hall, were treated to an operatic performance on account of one of aforesaid roomers making a sad mistake, in that he did not know that his water pitcher was empty before he disrobed, including his absent-mindedness, for when he went for water he thoughtlessly closed the door. We might give a hint as to who the performer was by saying it was Shorty.

Exchange.

The Athenatum, published by the students of Virginia University is one of our best exchange papers.

The Lewisburg Chronicle contains an article by Judge Cramer on Our "National Credit." This will be of some interest to students of Economy.

Brown and Wellesley Universities will debate this month: "Resolved that the Powers of Europe should unite in the control of the Turkish Empire."

"The Revolutionists of Cuba have said," says The Skirmisher, "that they will never yield until the last cent is gone and the last regiment conquered."

The Messenger contains an article on Oratory: It is good. The author says the Orator is both borne and made. We remember our worthy President has told us the same thing.

Pierse School Alumni tells us something about "The Country Boy in The City," which may interest those studying political economy and sociology.

The American Association for the Advance of Science has located its library with the University of Cincinnati. There are over 9,000 volumes in the library, and the current exchange list numbers 248.—Ex.

The Princeton Gun Club won the triangular intercollegiate shoot at Monmouth Junction recently. Harvard was a close second, scoring only four birds behind Princeton. Yale came last with a score of eighteen birds less than Harvard—Ex.

A new course has been started at Yale, and will be carried on the first year as an experiment. It is the course in modern novels, the object of which is to teach students to read standard novels in a way to strengthen their mental powers instead of a mental debauch. At the end of the week each student is required to write a short review of the book.—Ex.

The Temple Magazine for Dec. 26 contains a sermon by Dr. Conwell on the strike in Philadelphia. Let every student of Bucknell read it. In it there is sound political and christian doctrine. It is the glory and salvation of our county, that we have men like Dr. Conwell, who have the manhood to defend the right as "God gives them to see the right."

The Antiochian contains an article on the subject: "Why I am opposed to woman's suffrage." The four following reasons are given: First, it simply means that the present vote cast will be doubled, the wife voting as her husband does; secondly, it has been tried in Kansas and pronounced a failure; thirdly, the majority of the women do not want it; and fourthly, the questionable methods by which this privilege has been obtained.

Here is a song from Wellesley which is sung with a right good will to the tune of "Comin' Through the Rye:"

Never broke a regulation,
  Never told a lie;
Never want to have vacation,
  When I don't know why.
Always love to go to sections,
  Love to go to bed;
Never nibble sweet confections—
  When I am not fed.

Never want to run or whistle,
  For 'tis not polite;
Never make a wretched fizzle—
  When I don't recite.
When I meet a Harvard student,
  Never stop to talk;
Never take a step imprudent—
  When I do not walk.

To my brothers once was tender,
  Will not be again.
Never name the other gender,
  Save to say, Amen.
You may gather from these data
  Just how good I be;
I'm as proud of Alma Mater
  As she is of me.

Editorial.

WITH this issue, the present management of the MIRROR takes its leave of the public. One would scarcely recognize us now as the fair young staff with which the paper set out on its yearly pilgrimage. Scarred, bruised and rough-looking generally, our only conslation is that our pilgrim did not entirely fall by the wayside. Another support will soon be chosen and we trust that the MIRROR may then start off on a pace rapid enough to make up for lost time.

THE Day of Prayer for Colleges was observed this year with special interest. Under the charge of Rev. J. W. Weddell, meetings continued throughout the week. The result was electrical and the effect of them will be felt for many years. The pressure of studies tends to make one selfish and ill-tempered and dull to spiritual things. If we learn to overcome that tendency in college there will be some hope for us amid the rush of business life. As an institution the Day of Prayer for Colleges is certainly productive of much good.

COLLEGIATE education in America is a growth. A growth according to the nature and progress of our other institutions. Most of our colleges started low in requirements for admission and standards of graduation. The rise has been steady, and just as the German University is unlike that of either France or England, so ours is a new species. Let us hope that we shall incorporate what in them is best. Professional schools have doubled the length of their courses and give opportunities for special advanced work. Theological Seminaries are closing their courses to those who have not taken a college course, and Harvard has announced in her last Medical Bulletin that after the year 1897 a college degree from approved schools will be required of students entering that department. Evidently, people are awakening to the fact that a liberal training is the best foundation for special efficiency.

BUCKNELL, in some sections, has the reputation of being a college of one game. Our football teams have always stood high in public estimation but our other athletics have attracted less favorable comment. This year we have a chance to redeem ourselves. Financially, the association, thanks to careful management in the Fall, is in good shape. A basket-ball team has been organized and some dates have been arranged in neighboring towns. Cober, trainer in track athleticsis ,drilling his men. After the inter-class indoor contest every man in college should offer his services. No one can tell who will prove an athlete. Using the argument of Captain Coats of Pennsylvania, men can be developed in remarkably short time. "Captain Brewer, champion low hurdler of the world, never had on a running shoe until he entered college." What is needed most, however, is a contest with some college in track athletics. How did we learn football? By playing colleges better than ourselves. The same must be done in track athletics. If a neighboring team is brought here the Brook Park Track would be as good a place as is needed, and in a few years we could secure a reputation in that line.

In baseball the material was never more plentiful. What is wanted is team-work. Individual players. we have had, and of a high class, but on account of dissensions of a petty nature our baseball for many years has been a disgrace.

Some years ago we had a contest in tennis with State and Franklin & Marshall. Tennis received a great impulse as a result of it. We were victorious, it happened, in both singles and doubles. But we have better players now than we had then, though not so many. The point is not in the winning. That has been the curse of American Athletics "If you can't win don't play" has been too long the motto. Let our motto this year be "Bucknell no longer the one-game college."

We wish to call attention to a typographical error in one of the contributed articles of the last issue. In the second paragraph of the article, The Character of Lincoln, the word "who" should be substituted for the word "what" as indicated by the following italicism: "But it is not the intention here to describe what he did or who he was; these are purely historical questions. The question of most interest to us all is, What was he?" We apologize to the writer for the confusion of thought occasioned by the error.

The foregoing correction leads us to comment on a few other minor typographical errors, which, however, did not affect the sense of sentences in which they occurred. It may not be the duty of the Editor-in-Chief to excuse himself for errors in his own department; but it is unquestionably his privilege to vindicate himself from charges of carelessness that may possibly have a place in the minds of the readers of the Mirror. Had he but his own editorial work to do, there would be, at the most, but little excuse for typographical errors; but when in addition to that work he has been obliged to supply much of the material of two, three, and even four other departments in almost every issue, he feels that some explanation is demanded. In this issue, the last to receive his oversight, he wishes to express his regret for any dissatisfaction he may have caused under the stress of added burdens. [Ed.-in-Ch.]

HONORE.

Tell me not that she is gone,
She the one hope of this barren life,
She it was who led me through this world
And could have led me heavenward too.
Nevermore shall my fond glance receive
Her smile divine--nevermore Honore.
Nevermore when sad and weary shall I
Rest upon her gentle breast and sleep.
Oh, that I should ever see this day!
Me she could have spared, but not I her.
O Honore! that I had passed before!
Then no one worse might be, but better all.
Alone, bereft, forlorn a piteous
Object I to wander through this earth.
Nevermore when sore and wounded by
The world's reproaches bitter shall I
Fly to her and in her shadow scoff
The world, the jeering, mocking world—
Take her not away! I will abide
By her, even now she may come back
And turn my sorrow into joy. Honore,
Return, oh, return, 'tis not too late.
Ope now thine eyes that I may truly
Know thou hast left me not, ah cruel,
Cruel thing; thrice cursed thing—forgive
The words, oh, I knew not what I said.
Thy hand is cold, thy brow is cold, yet
Scarcely colder can it be than mine.
Answer me, Honore, comest thou again?
If so in forcéd patience will I
Await thee. Have I done aught
That I deserve this grevious suffering?
Leave me not without one more embrace.
Again draw down my face and kiss me
On the lips, as thou hast done so oft.
No farewell word, no parting look thou
Gavest me—thing of marble. Perchance
Thou lovest me still. If so, take me
To thee. Methinks I see thee beckon.
The shadows close around me. The earth
Is dark about me. Naught see I but Thine open arms. Ah! the mist is on My eyes. Once more I kiss the clay and Go to join the spirit. Honore! Honore!
Queen of my soul, I come, I come.

A MOUNTAIN TROLLEY RIDE.

In the anthracite coal regions of Pennsylvania, the trolley car has superceded the stage and, in many parts, even the steam car for short distance travel. These thickly-populated districts, viewed from one of the dreary, grassless mountain ridges, exhibit little towns dotting each barren valley, the intervening distances spanned by the trolley wires. Every valley from its narrow, lofty beginning to its union with the broad lowlands, thus becomes the site of a long city,—a linear aggregation of houses.

The cars run thro the main streets of the towns, stopping at almost any point to let on passengers, then scurry by devious ways and circuitous winding under the black coal-breakers, over streams whose waters are as deeply dyed as those of the river Styx, wildly down hills, thro swamps wherein great leafless and often branchless tree-trunks stand knee-deep in black, oozy coal-mud and culm, reminding one of Doré's floors in the "Inferno," then with whiz and whir and jolt around a sudden curve, only to speed on again up a steep incline until we plunge into a dark wood; thence we dart unexpectedly upon another village, frightening numberless children and myriads of goats with our loud dong! ding! dong! On a cool summer morning the variety of scenery, the occasional really beautiful woodland dells standing out in exquisite relief because of the prevailing unloveliness, now and then far-distance glimpses thro a cleft in some ridge, inspire with each deep breath of the pure mountain air fresh thought and bright imaginings such as do not come in every-day routine.

A ride in winter affords experiences of another order, but none the less varied. Let us plan to leave one of the coal towns before daylight on a Monday morning in November. Unfortunately it is a little rainy, and we stand under our umbrellas and shiver in the cold air, waiting for the car. The darkness is lighted here and there by a flickering lamp on a miner's cap as he goes to the daily task. One up the street is flitting toward us like a gigantic fire-fly. Only the light is visible. As it comes nearer we discern dimly the outlines of a man, whose dark clothes and shaded face make the wierd effect more wierd. He passes by on the other side to join the number of Will-o'-the-wisps constantly reinforced by additions from unseen lanes and by-ways, and the fairy scene is rudely broken by the bright head-light and rumbling wheels of the car.

At first we are the only passengers save one miner, and we notice that his "fire-fly" is a miniature garden-sprinkler attached to the front of his cloth cap. The wick is inserted in the spout and burns like a torch. The safety-lamp, he informs us, is used in only a few mines in Pennsylvania, now-a-days, and is a triangular lantern which the workman holds in his teeth by the cain fastened on top of the frame.

Outside all is darkness, and we ride wrapped in our own meditations upon the incoming people, until the conductor announces, "All change!" We step out to the next car, which has drawn up close to ours, but on the platform halt because of the cloud of dust that meets us. The conductor is sweeping. A fellow passenger remarks:

"Why didn't you do that on Sunday ?"

The conductor replies between sweeps, with a somewhat tired color in the tone, not quite tinged with bitterness:

"Hadn't time; had to give the people a good time."

"Why don't you change your job?"

"Like some other people, I don't like it but have to keep it. If the company would give me what I make, I'd give them my wages."

By this time we are standing in one end of the car while he sweeps out the other, and quite a few passengers are interested listeners. The motor-man, round-faced and round-bodied, with the geniality that seems to accompany adipose tissue, has entered and volunteers a story, as he catches the last remark of the conductor. "That reminds me of the man who asked a conductor if he collected fares every five minutes. 'I go 'round only when it's necessary,' the conductor said sharply. To this the passenger replied: 'I thought it was necessary every five minutes.' "

The story-teller, encouraged by the laugh, is reminded of another conductor, who refused a Canadian piece of money. The passenger insisted on it, and the conductor finally said: "I don't want it." The passenger said: "If you don't want it, give it to the company."

The motor-man during the laugh that follows, plants his feet in a new position, slaps one fat leg, and is about to entertain us with another story, when the conductor spoils further treats by crying out: "It's time to start!" With a parting laugh and smile, the motor-man steps to the platform, and soon we are on our way again. A little conversation is started, but the influence of the motor-man's fun is soon exhausted, and after the conductor has pocketed and rung up our fares, we lapse into silence.

Daylight has cleared away the darkness so that we can see outside. Now we slip by a little hut, again skirt a wagon road, a terror to horse and driver alike, then, as the wagon road makes a long, deep curve, we cut straight thro the brush and meet again at the turn, cross and re-cross till we have descended the mountain and stop at the terminus of the trolley. The steam cars carry us back to green fields, fine farming acres, crystal streams and the broad waters of the Susquehanna. The contrast in physical features of the earth is marked in a very short distance, and the diversity of occupations because of external surroundings is equally noticeable. Yet one mankind operates each field. Man is the great unity. The farmer, the miner, the electrician and the capitalist are clasping hands because of mutual needs, and the power of God in the wires of Progress, caught by the arm of man, is steadily establishing better and better facilities for easy communication between all artisans. A BIT OF LIFE.

"Great Ned! Jack, what in the world am I going to do? I'm in the worst fix a fellow ever was in," said Dick Traveston, bursting into the room where Jack was studying Economics.

"What's up now, old man?" asked Jack, trying to be sympathetic; though he wanted to fire Dick for interrupting him twenty minutes before class time when he had not looked at his lesson and had flunked three times already that week. "What scrape have you tumbled into, and shall I pull you out by your heels or your ears?"

"I hope you will pull me out some way, I don't care how," answered Dick, settling himself on a trunk and elevating his feet to the book-case. "You know I told you that I've been engaged to Madge Moreland ever since I've been here, and—and—"

"Yes?"—from Jack in a not very encouraging tone,—he was thinking of his flunk.

"And—well, I'm engaged to another girl in Williamsport: I might as well out with it to you, old man, because we're chums, you know."

"Engaged to two girls at once? Well. I'll be hanged!" exclaimed Jack, shutting his Economics with a bang. He was interested now and did not care whether he failed or not.

"How did you ever happen to be such a fool? I'm surprised at you."

"Well, you see it was this way:—Madge and I were kids together and have always been with each other more or less; and I suppose I thought I loved her. At any rate I popped the qs. and she said "yes": so when I entered college I was a—"

"Doomed man," interrupted Jack.

"I was engaged," went on Dick, giving his chum a squelching look; "and all was lovely 'till I went to Williamsport this summer and became acquainted with Ruth Byron.—I tell you, Jack, she's a beauty; a little girl with the sweetest blue eyes, dimpled rosy cheeks and light wavy hair that looks like imprisoned sunbeams, and so shy and winsome that you—well, maybe you wouldn't want to, but I wanted to kiss her the first time I saw her." Dick paused a moment thinking of that sweet face, framed with sunbeams, and of the pretty, laughing eyes. He really loved the "little girl" and meant all he was saying.

"Well, to continue, after I had known Ruth better I forgot Madge except when I got her letters, and then I put them away thinking it would all come right someway, if I let it take care of itself, for I was so happy with Ruth. Before I came back to school, I had asked her to be my wife, and she had promised that she would. But since I've been here, I've had time to think what I've done. I tried by not writing, and in other ways, to show Madge that I did not love her any more, if I ever did. But she doesn't take it that way: she thinks I am "so busy" and I just received a letter from her saying I mustn't work so hard that I can't find time to write to her. Blame it! why can't she see what I'm trying to show her? Well, here I am, engaged to two girls at once, and what shall I do?" with a despairing sigh he stopped and looked at Jack, who after scratching his head said: "Deed, I'm sorry for you, chum: you are in a sticky place. Having had no experience in such things, though, I really don't know how to give you any advice."

"Don't laugh at me, Jack: honestly I'm worried about it. I hate to make Madge feel bad and I don't see how I can give up Ruth. But there's the bell, and I haven't opened my book since yesterday; so au revoir. Thanks for your sympathy."

The next morning Dick said goodbye to Jack: he was going to see Madge and ask for release from his engagement. He came back, feeling more at ease, and more in love with Ruth. "Its all right now, Jack," he said.

But alas! it is not all right: for a few days ago Dick received a letter from Ruth's father, telling of Ruth's brief illness, and how she had "slipped away" with her lover's name on her lips. Dick now goes around the college with a sad face; but no one there except Jack knows the reason.

PROFESSOR KAUFFMAN.

Not the least distinguished among the educators of Pennsylvania is Prof. Warren L. Kauffman, who, for the past two years, has been at the head of the Physical Laboratory department of the Harrisburg, Pa., High School.

PROF. WARREN L. KAUFFMAN.

Prof. Kauffman was born September 15, 1869 in Dauphin County, Pa., at Paxton, where his father, Mr. Levi Kauffman, conducted the business of a merchant. After spending some time in the public schools, where he developed a love for the sciences, he entered Freeburg Academy, and, in 1886, began the scientific course at the Bloomsburg State Normal School, continuing his studies at Missionary Institute, now Susquehanna University, Selins Grove, Pa., where he was prepared for college. He entered Bucknell University, and was graduated with the degree of Ph. B. June, 1892.

He was principal of the Friends' Normal Institute, Rising Sun, Md., 1892–'93, and '93–'94 was in charge of the Mathematical Department of East Stroudsburg State Normal School, East Stroudsburg, Pa. He was elected a member of the Harrisburg High School faculty in 1894, and has remained in that position since his appointment, showing marked ability as a teacher. Prof. Kauffman was chosen one of the lecturers of the Pennsylvania Chautauqua at Mount Gretna, Pa., summer session of 1895.

Prof. Kauffman became a teacher because he loves a teacher's work. He has a vigorous mind and a thirst for knowledge, and persists in adding to his own stores without neglecting the minds of those whom he is entrusted to teach. He may be described as a Christian, a gentleman, and a teacher who thoroughly understands boys and girls. His success as a disciplinarian is remarkable. He treats his students as ladies and gentlemen, and makes them respect themselves and others by the respect he exhibits towards them. Personally he is an agreeable gentleman, and is loved and respected by his pupils. He is courteous in manner, affable and kindly to all, and of course interested in everything that concerns education and the advancement of young people.

His labors in the important field that he has chosen are now thoroughly recognized, for Harrisburg, in common with the rest of the world, knows that there is no higher office than the directing of a good school, which in the words of Whittier, is:

> "Giving out year by year,
> Recruits of true manhood and womanhood dear."

Athletics.

Dr. Enoch Perrine, of the chair of English, will lecture Thursday evening, March 5, in Bucknell Hall, on "What is an English Classic?" Proceeds for the benefit of the Athletic Association.

The Executive Committee has decided that no man will be considered a candidate for the baseball team unless he takes some form of exercise in the gymnasium, either in the general classes or in the cage.

Interest in track athletics has been aroused by the invitation recently received from the University of Pennsylvania asking Bucknell to send a team to compete for the intercollegiate championship of America in a one mile relay race on Saturday, April 25, at Philadelphia. As soon as finances are subscribed the invitation will be accepted. Four colleges will be grouped, and prizes are offered for the winners of each group. Bucknell is classed with State, F. & M., and Dickinson. So far fourteen men have promised to train for the event. Out of this number, five will be chosen, four of whom will enter the race. This circumstance shows the necessity of a good cinder track on the campus to use for training and we hope that the Alumni will combine with the Athletic Association and students in putting in the track at an early date.

Entries for the second annual indoor meeting will be closed February 15. Academy students will be allowed to compete in the events of which the following is the program for the 22nd.

Twenty yards dash.
Running high jump. One-half mile run.
Boxing.
High-dive.
Bar vault (3 ways). One-quarter mile run.
Standing broad jump.
Fencing.
Climbing 18 foot pole. One-half mile walk.
High kick.
Wrestling.
Pole vault. One mile run.

The admission price will be fifteen cents and the proceeds will be used to outfit the field and track team. All students should turn out and encourage the young men who are training daily to give Bucknell a good team in general athletics.

A meeting was held January 29, to consider athletic plans for next year. Those present were Professors Rockwood and Hulley, of the Executive Board of the Athletic Association; Registrar Gretzinger, of the Finance Committee; F. H. Hollinshead, President; Football Manager Wilson, and Messrs. John V. Lesher and E. C. Kunkle, representing a special committee on a football league. The invitation from Washington and Jefferson to join a football league was very carefully discussed and action was deferred until more definite plans were presented by the promotors of the league. The football schedule for next year was laid out subject to the approval of the faculty, and Manager Rex, of the baseball team, was invited to sit with the Executive Board at its next meeting to map out the baseball schedule.

Y. M. C. A.

The two Associations (College and Academy) expect to send a large delegation to Milton to attend the District Convention, February 14-16. Many who cannot attend the entire session will be able to attend the sessions of Sunday, since the Convention is held so near.

A great increase in attendance and interest is observable in the weekly meetings of the Association. Every student should attend. Then we could secure the much needed Association building.

The meetings held during the Week of Prayer by Rev J. W. Weddell, of Philadelphia, were of great power and helpfulness. Much of their success was due to the earnest efforts of Dr. Harris. Ten or twelve services were held during the week and were attended by almost the entire student body of the University. They effected a great deepening of spiritual life while many conversions resulted. On Thursday, the Day of Prayer for Schools and Colleges, four services were held, three in Bucknell Hall and the regular morning servicein the First Baptist Church. The power of the meetings will be felt for a long time at Bucknell, and in every place where the students shall locate.

It is not too early to begin planning to go to Northfield. The sooner one decides to go the easier it will be to go. If the Association has been and is a power for good at Bucknell—and both faculty and students recognize its helpfulness—its effectiveness is largely a result of power received at the Students' Conference. The Conference has infused new and fuller life into the Association. If you do not see "Northfield" stamped visibly on the various efforts of the members who have been there, do not at once conclude that sending delegates has been unfruitful. Few men can go to Northfield and not be broadened, or come back and not be greater powers in the work of the Association.

Local.

"Z-z-z-z-z-z! Buffalo!!" Are you "on to" it?

Prof. Hulley made a trip to Delaware recently to deliver lectures.

The annual meeting and election of the Union City Club will be held Tuesday evening February 18.

Principal Edwards, of the Academy, occupied the pulpit of the Baptist Church last Sunday morning, in the absence of Pastor Judd, who was assisting Rev. W. H. Ellis in protracted meetings at Jersey Shore.

Messrs. Allen, Bunnell, Fisk and Sprague, conducted a series of five successful mission and song services at Catawissa last Sunday.

Mr. Frank Miller, '96, will give a supper to the Senior Classes of the College and Institute, Friday evening, February 21, at his residence.

Barner in Logic: "A man may have a collection without having a heap." Doubtless Barner recalls some of the collections his congregations have given him.

The editors of the Mirror are indebted to Mr. P. B. Gibson, of Harrisburg, for the excellent sketch of Prof. W. L. Kauffman which appears in this issue.

A lecture by Dr. Harris, "The Development of the Republic," in pamphlet form was distributed from the Registrar's office. Very many of the students availed themselves of the opportunity, and secured copies.

Rev. H. L. Wayland, D. D., of Philadelphia, will give lectures before the University on sociology in March. His topics will be "Compulsory Arbitration," "Organized Charity," and "The Armenian Question."

At the last meeting of the Chemical and Physical Society an interesting talk on Paper Manufacture was given by Mr. Enos. Baker. He illustrated his talk by a series of samples, representing the various stages of the process.

The officers of Zeta Literary Society for the present term are: President, Miss Harris; Vice President, Miss Wolfe; Secretary, Miss Rohrer; Treasurer, Miss Rodgers; Critics, Miss Goddard, Miss Hanna; Program Committee, Misses Cotton, Hartley, Sigel and Fowler; Executive Committee, Miss Lillibridge, Miss Sprague.

The Senior class has already taken definite steps toward Commencement arrangements. The contract for photographs has been closed. The class has decided to observe Class Day, and appointed a committee to arrange the exercises. The class is desirous of doing credit to the fiftieth anniversary of the University.

Orville Elias Bailey, of Washington, a former student at Bucknell, has established a prize in memory of his deceased brother, George Alexander Bailey, M. D., for the best work in the required Latin during the freshman year. Mr. Bailey thinks of making this memorial to his brother permanent by establishing a scholarship.

No Academy notes have been furnished the Editor for this issue.

The body for the use of the class in Human Anatomy (Laboratory Dissection) has arrived, and the class has begun its work.

Rev. Charles DeWoody, Ex-'91, Waverley N. Y., will lecture in Bucknell Hall, Thursday evening, February 27, on the subject, "Myself and that Other Man."

The game of basket-ball last Saturday evening between the Varsity and scrub team resulted in a score of 23–4, in favor of the Varsity. The receipts were sufficient to cover the cost of suits for the regular team.

The team of the Williamsport Y. M. C. A. cancelled the game scheduled for February 11.

At the last meeting of the Chemical and Physical Society a finely executed and nicely framed wood engraving of Pasteur, "the most eminent medical investigator of his time," was presented by Dr. Aviragnet. The picture will be hung in the main lecture room. It is hoped that pictures of other prominent men of science may be added to form a collection so well begun.

Under the efficient leadership of Mr. E. C. Kunkle, Editor-in-Chief, the board of editors of L'Agenda are busily engaged in preparing the material for the book. The Annual promises to be a most excellent one—one that will do credit not only to the class of '97, but to the University as well. The publication deserves the support of every student. Mr. Ernest Myers, Business Manager, is energetically pushing his department.

A. M. Devall, '99, has been appointed manager of the Basket-Ball Team. The following games have been scheduled:

Feb. 11. Williamsport Y. M. C. A., at Williamsport.

Feb. 21. Bloomsburg Normal, at Bloomsburg.

Feb. 22. Wilkesbarre Y. M. C. A., at Wilkesbarre.

Games will also be arranged with Lock Haven and Danville.

Last Saturday evening a breathless Freshman dashed up the hill, and excitedly imparted to every fellow-classman he met in a most heroic stage whisper: "The Sophs. have their banquet to-night," and then flew on to spread the interesting tidings. Soon groups of men gathered, all eagerly discussing the news. And even yet you can't convince some of them that the tale started in the fertile brain of a Prep.

But speaking of Sophomores, as one thing suggests another, we are led to wonder what has become of the famous class scrap. All is as quiet as—well, a funeral, for instance. Not that there's anything real in the funeral part, even though some of the upper classmen have been to the pains so to explain to the Freshmen, but we are really led to wonder whether this "innocuous dessuetude" of the higher class is a result of firm reliance in last year's laurels, or because they deem their opponents too insignificant, or that they are afraid. A kind friend, of Sophomore persuasion, tells us we will find out on Feb. 22. We pray we may.

We have heard your wail for copy.
Your insatiate greed for copy
Fills us all with sorrow and dispair.
Would that you might get your copy,
Have enough for once of copy;
Writing,—that's a different affair.

Still to those who furnish (?) copy,
Most of all the "Local" copy,
Comes a time when gladly copy they prepare.
That's when something haps for copy——
Makes a subject for the copy——
Of copy then we'd freely make our share.

But of subjects for the copy
Things that ought to go in copy
Our supply is often very spare,
While for what don't get in copy
Pardon, for our lack in copy,
Kind reader, pray bestow it at our prayer!

One who has "copied"

A universal topic of conversation is the recently organized "Pernicious Club" which has achieved an astounding popularity in the short space of a week or two. The club held a special meeting Monday evening, February 3, and proceeded to the room of one of the Freshmen who had gained admittance to the organization by trickery and fraud. The young man was so frightened by the incoming horde (nearly fifty in number) that he immediately paid up his dues. A Sophomore was next sent for, even being pulled out ot bed by the committee. His case was a similar one and received similar treatment. It is our impression that this will show to all who have been slandering the good name of the "Pernicious Club" that it is more than a mere empty name, and that candign punishment will be meted out to those who endeavor to evade the requirements for membership.

The Bucknell Publishing Association met Saturday morning, February 8, and elected the following editors:—President, E. C. Kunkle, '97; Vice President, J. T. Anderson, '98; Secretary, G. L. Bayard, '99; Business Manager, B. F. Thomas, '98; Senior editors, D. E. Lewis, B. Reynolds, Jr.; Junior editors, L. B. Sinnette, LeRoy Butler; Sophomore editor, F. W. Dillon; Freshman editor, Miss Alice Lillibridge. The Association voted twenty-five dollars to J. B. Suiter, '96, the retiring Business Manager for his faithful work. Mr. Suiter accepted the favor, but generously expressed himself as desirous of presenting the amount to the Association that the condition of the treasury might be strengthened by that amount. The matter of reducing the subscription price of the Mirror to one dollar was referred to a committee consisting of the Business Manager, the retiring Business Manager and the Editor-in-Chief.

Copies of the University catalogue for 1896, substantially bound in cloth, can be had from the Registrar for 20 cents each. This bound volume makes a handy reference catalogue, and should be in the hands of every student and graduate. The catalogue will be bound hereafter each year, and will be sold at a price to reach all.

Following are a few statements from the catalogue which show the advance of the present year: The total enrollment of students this year is 428 in the four departments. Of this number 202 are in the college, including 12 students in the graduate department recently established. The rolls contain 43 more students this year than last. New courses of study are offered in Higher Analytical Geometry, Advanced Algebra, Human Anatomy (Laboratory dissection), American Civics and nine new courses in the department of modern languages. The college now offers over 100 courses of study. Several changes in the instruction force have been made. L. G. C. Riemer, A. B., has been made instructor in Latin and German; Nelson F. Davis, Sc. B., is the new assistant in Organic Science and Ezra Allen, A. B., is proctor at the Academy. Misses Lidie Bell, Ph. B., and Jessie June Wheeler, A. B., are new teachers in the Institute for Young Ladies. In material equipment the University has received five hundred volumes for the W. J. Coxey Alcove in the Library, and the total number of volumes in the library was increased from 13,250 in 1894 to 16,000 volumes in 1895. Copies of the new catalogue may be had by addressing Registrar Wm. C. Gretzinger, Lewisburg, Pa.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Professor Aviragnet has been suffering from an attack of "Grippe," but we are glad to say that he is now able to resume his work.

Misses Nellie Suiter, Elizabeth Spettigue, Jennie Simpson and Marilla Jones, former students at the Institute, made visits during January.

We hear with delight, that Mrs. Lucia Mead Priest will be at Commencement and will read and recite at the Public Meeting of the Alumnae.

The time for holding the chapel exercises on Sunday, has been changed. The young ladies meet now in the school-room at 8 A. M. instead of the parlor at 4.30 P. M. as heretofore.

The ladies of the faculty attended the large and delightful reception given at the hospitable home of Professor Owens, Friday evening, January 24, by Professor and Mrs. Owens and Professor and Mrs. Stewart.

The Institute Seniors are well pleased with the addition of four "Fourth Formers" to their Literature Class; for the young men are enthusiastic students, and frequently give interesting and original criticisms.

Miss Jennie Jones had the misfortune to lose her watch recently on the walk between Lewisburg and the toll-gate. The watch was found by a Mr. Stahl, who, later, seeing notice of the loss in the Post Office, returned the watch to Miss Jones, much to her relief.

Some very interesting and helpful meetings were held in the Institute during the Week of Prayer. Tuesday evening, Rev. J. W. Weddell gave a talk on "What it means to be a Christian," and Wednesday evening Dr. Lincoln Hulley spoke on "The Hindrances to becoming a Christian."

The Athena Literary Society has elected the following officers for this term: President Miss Eliza Martin; Vice President, Miss Sarah Black; Secretary, Miss Mable Wells; Treasurer, Miss Annabel Hanna; First Critic, Miss Olivia Silvers; Second Critic, Miss Elizabeth Evans; Chaplain, Miss Emma Kunkle.

"Christmas Week at Bigler's Mill,"—is the latest, and by far the best work of our gifted Alumna, Mrs. Dora E. W. Spratt of '78. It belongs to that class of books written by Louise Alcott, Kate Douglas Wiggin and Laura E. Richards for young people, yet which are sure to entertain and instruct mature minds. This story in black and white is far more wholesome and natural than Laura E. Richards' "Nautilus," which was published about the same time. We hope that Mrs. Spratt will continue to use her pen to the delight and edification of all her readers.

Personals.

'71. Dr. George M. Phillips, Principal of the West Chester State Normal School, lectured in Millersburg, Pa., Saturday evening, February 1, to a large and appreciative audience, taking his hearers on a six weeks' trip across the continent and back.

'72. Dr. Aaron Eyer, late of Denver, Colorado, died December 21, in Toledo, Ohio, and was buried in Lewisburg, December 23. At the time of his death Dr. Eyer was 44 years old. He began the study of medicine immediately after his graduation from the University, afterward spent a year in Europe, and then practiced in Lewisburg with Dr. Wm. Leiser until 1878, when he left for the West.

The Sigma Chi fraternity adopted the following resolutions:

Whereas, On the 23rd day of December, 1895, the Almighty God did remove from us our esteemed friend and brother, Dr. Aaron Eyer; and

Whereas, We sustain by his death a heavy loss; be it

Resolved, That in his death the Sigma Chi fraternity has lost one of its best members and the Kappa Chapter a man of whom she was justly proud; be it

Resolved, That we tender our heartfelt sympathy to the family and relatives of the deceased; be it

Resolved, That we spread a copy of these resolutions on the minute book of the Chapter and that we send a copy to the bereaved family and publish them in the Sigma Chi Quarterly and BUCKNELL MIRROR.

F. W. WAGNER,

'90. Ralph C. H. Catterall has been appointed Tutor in History in the University of Chicago. Mr. Catterall received the degree of A. B. from both Bucknell University and Harvard; he was in 1892–'93 Instructor at Bucknell, and in 1894 Reader in History at Chicago.

'92. Homer Dowlin, Esq., a former Bucknellian, who read law with Hon. George P. Wilson, an old Lewisburger, but now a prominent lawyer in Minneapolis, Minn., has opened a law office in Warren, Minn.

Ex-'94, Acad. Abbott G. Bucher has accepted a position on the Engineer corps of the Sunbury division P. R. R. Co., with headquarters at Nanticoke, Pa. He left for the latter place Tuesday.

'94. Mr. Harvey Smith, well known here as the best all-round athlete who ever attended Bucknell, has been elected captain of Sunbury's baseball club for the coming season. At present Mr. Smith is in his third year at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania. Whether he will decide to play at Sunbury this summer is an open question. At present he is entertaining flattering offers from the Atlantic City club and a western league.

Ex-'97. Fred. L. Camp who was here last year and afterwards at University of Michigan is reported seriously ill at his home in Union City.

'—. Howard Bucknell, a son of the late William Bucknell, and formerly a student in the Academy, was married, in Philadelphia, on Tuesday evening, to Miss Marie Ethel Harlan.

A SUGGESTION FOR '98.

"When all my thoughts in vain are thunk,
When all my winks in vain are wunk,
What saves me from a rocky flunk?
My pony."

—Ex.

The discussion of "A Plea for Education" in The Reveille is well worth reading.

We have just received an edition of the School Gazette. It is teeming with current topics, which are written in a literary style. Among the topics discussed are: "The Monroe Doctrine Confirmed," "The Red Cross Not to Enter Armenia," "The Rules of the Senate and House."

The Harrisburg High School publishes a monthly journal that does honor to the capital city. It is bright, newsy and wide awake as its name would indicate. The December number of the Argus has a Christmas story that would not be out of place in a more pretentious paper than a school journal.

All the good things that can be said in favor of examinations are clearly and concisely put forth in an editorial in the December number of the Manitou Messenger. Among other good points the writer makes the following: "If the result of an examination turns out to be a poor one in a whole class, or if most of the pupils fail on some particular point, it may be due to deficient instruction. This will perhaps help the teacher to find out where he may have failed, and if he does find it out he will adopt some better way of teaching, and will succeed better afterward."

The Amulet, West Chester, Pa., put into execution a good plan when they wrote to prominent men asking: "What qualities, in your opinion, contribute most to the success of young men just at the starting point of life?" Answers were received from the well known writer, J. F. Trowbridge; Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler; Col. A. K. McClure, editor Phila. Times; Thomas A. Edison; Edward W. Bok; Nelson A. Miles; Merril E. Gates, President of Amherst; and others. The replies are all helpful and suggestive and decidedly characteristic of the men who wrote them. Some suggest many qualities which harmonized make success; others pick out one exceedingly strong quality which include others, and if gained make success. Nothing better could fall into the hands of students.

The College Mercury, in discussing the subject of student self-government, states the plan, which originated at Amherst and is in operation there, to be as follows: "In addition to the faculty there is a student senate selected by the students, and consisting of four Seniors, three Juniors, two Sophomores and one Freshman, to which matters of decorum, and all others pertaining to the students are referred. The decisions of the senate are passed upon by the faculty and of course may be reversed by it if considered expedient, but such reversals would undoubtedly be infrequent." It advocates the adoption of this system in Pennsylvania colleges.

The following suggestive clipping from the Youth's Companion we insert without further comment:

"Last month two men were killed and several injured by the wrecking of a passenger train on the New York Central Railroad near Rome. Investigation showed that the rails had been removed for the purpose of ditching the train, and a hat found near the track led to the arrest of four young men of respectable families in the neighborhood. The leader confessed that they wrecked the train with a view to robbery, and that they waited by the track, disguised by masks and armed with revolvers, until the crash came, when they were frightened and ran away. It appeared that they had been reading sensational novels, and a history of the exploits of the James brothers, the notorious train robbers, was found in the pocket of one of them. The effect of pernicious literature was never more clearly traceable."

Editorial.

THE mantle of our predecessors has fallen upon us. Will it fit? That question does not so greatly trouble us; we are more concerned to know whether there is in it enough material to enable us to "make it over" to better effect. This concern on our part does not arise from a feeling of superiority over the retiring Board of editors who have stepped aside for us; they had real and especially trying difficulties from which we believe we are free; and we rejoice, not in greater ability, but in our freedom from the difficulties which hampered them. We crave your sympathy, your forebearance, and your earnest coöperation.

THE MIRROR, by virtue of its birthright, is the representative of the student body, an expression of student thought, an epitome of student life. When it becomes the paper of the few it is through the fault of the many. It cannot well be made satisfactory to you without your aid. The editors are neither ubiquitous nor omniscient; their studies will not permit them to be the first, nor--notwithstanding popular opinion—do they make them the latter; some things necessarily escape them. They even stoop to employ the aid of the material, viz; the "MIRROR Box;" that is your editorial pigeon-hole; place in it items of interest to yourself and others, instead of complaining upon each issue that no mention was made of this item or that event. The MIRROR is your paper; it is our paper; let us not neglect our own.

THE newspapers are always bearers of news, but are not often so full of practical information as they are at present. It is true that they even now contain much that is far from edifying; but it is seldom they partake so much of the character of a text-book on topics of vital interest and value to the student. We shall do well to take "honor work" in current newspaper reading. Every number of our large city journals is teeming with questions of international relations and expositions of international law. Cuba, Venezuela, the Transvaal, with all their varied complications, furnish themes for most helpful study, substituting for the established history of the past, the unsettled and ever-changing conditions of the present day world. In the field of science the wonderful discovery of the Kathode, or "X ray" in photography, and the remarkable experiments with it now in progress are throwing new light upon existing theories of light. Do not neglect to familiarize yourself with these matters of so great importance and interest.

IF the MIRROR does not attain to a standard which shall satisfy both students and alumni, it is not because the editors do not wish it nor is its failure to do so proof positive of the inability of the editorial boards, chosen from time to time, to make it approach nearer that standard. That it often comes far short of what should be its character, we do not deny; none recognize the failure more than those upon whom the burden of its production rests. That it could be given a higher tone, we firmly believe; none desire such an advance more than we. It is true that it falls short of the desired standard, and likewise true that it can be improved upon; but there is lacking a condition which seems almost essential to the needed and desired improvement, viz., the acceptance of work done by the editors in lieu of required literary productions. We believe this to be the fundamental principle in the solution of the problem. The work done for the Mirror is entirely without compensation, except the immediate benefit of practice in writing, and is usually imposed upon those who are among the busiest of the students. Consequently, it must be done hastily, and sometimes, carelessly; whereas, if this work was credited as required work in composition, and the demand upon the student's time lessened, it would assume a higher intellectual tone, and the Mirror would reflect more truly the actual condition of our school.

THE BEAUTIFUL DAYS OF OLD.

Float the clouds in the west o'er the mountains,
Bathed in purple and crimson and gold,
Calling back by their rich fading splendor
Memories sweet of the fair days of old.
The beautiful forms that have perished,
The hopes that have withered away,
And visions more lovely than cloudland,
Than frost work more varied and gay.
The splendor will fade from the cloudland,
And the shadows will come over all;
But when morning returns in its beauty,
The night flees away with its pall:
The glory comes back to the cloudland,
And its wealth of purple and gold,
But never at man's call returneth
The beautiful days of old.

To open thy dim, voiceless mansions,
O Death, how oft our hearts burn,
But the Good that once cross thy dark portals,
Can never, O never return.
Spring comes in her eloquent beauty,
And calls in her passionate woe;
They sleep, all unheeding her music
Her beauty they never shall know.
The daisy comes back to the meadow,
And the primrose returns to the hill,
But dear hearts that once longed for their coming,
And rejoiced at the sight, are now still.
The buttercup answers the sunshine,
And opens its portals of gold,
But never at man's call returneth
The loved and the lost ones of old.

Float the clouds in the west o'er the mountains
As they call us to think of the day,
When cloud-dotted skies will not darken,
And the beautiful ever will stay.
When stilled will the voice be of mourning
And, past all of care and of strife,
Our eyes see the Sharon Rose blooming
On the banks of the River of Life.
Float, float, ye bright clouds o'er the mountains
In your wealth of purple and gold,
For soon will dawn days that are brighter
Than the beautiful days of old.

A PLEA FOR VIVISECTION.

There is, without a doubt as much of the fin de siecle sentimentalism seen in the attitude taken by some persons on the question of vivisection, as in any line in which this great over-tenderness of heart shows itself. Every little while one picks up a paper or a magazine containing a most pitiful article, pleading for the lives and comfort of the poor dumb-brutes; rehearsing all the wrongs of every form of animal life below man; and telling of the cruelties perpetrated upon these wretched animals by him who, being their master, should from the goodness of his heart leave them to live in peace to the end of their natural lives. When we read such a paper superficially, we admire the cream of the milk of human kindness that can, so easily, be skimmed from it; and, unless we give it thought, would agree that the author must be most humane; but, on mature consideration, other sides of the question arise which, if nothing else, make one feel the narrowness of the writer's horizon. One begins to compare the worth of the life of a man with that of one of the dumb brutes; to ponder in heart that saying of Christ, the source of our highest moral law, which estimates the value of men far above that of many sparrows ; and then one refuses to give full credence to the idea that vivisection is wrong.

In the case of a famine there is no one who would hesitate to kill any animal that he might satisfy his hunger. Nor are there many persons who would confine themselves to a purely vegetable diet in order that they might not be partakers in the murder of living things with that chief of executioners,—the butcher. They do not consider it wrong for themselves, or judge themselves harshly, for having these same dumb brutes killed for their every day sustenance. And yet, these very persons, who, to ward off the temporary and oft-recurring pain of hunger, slay numberless animals, would willingly spend a whole day in argument with you, trying to prove that vivisection is wrong.

Do you think that any amount of pain suffered or any number of soulless lives sacrificed—yea, even unto ten thousand—would be fruitlessly expended, if thereby one human being were in any way released from pain or freed from death? I contend that it would not; that man, is of so much more value in the sight of God than the soulless animals, that it is right that they should suffer, if thereby man may be benefited.

But take into consideration another side of the question. Should any one by the aid of vivisection make a discovery which would alleviate human suffering, would the good stop with one person? No; the knowledge thus gained, in the hands of a being endowed with reason and the power of articulate speech, whereby he could communicate with his fellows, would be disseminated over the earth; and handed from generation to generation, would have the power of aiding, not one human being, not a hundred, nor yet ten thousand, but many millions.

What do you consider the most important medical discoveries of this age? How were they made? How was the action of antitoxine on diphtheria discovered? How have some of the great cures among nervous and cerebral diseases been made? Ask yourselves these questions; and then answer as you undoubtedly must—vivisection. There is no one to-day that would not give praise to Pasteur for the great good he has done mankind by his marvelous discoveries; and there are many persons to rise up and call him blessed. Yet his very work was to a great extent accomplished by vivisection.

But there is an argument against vivisection and that not a groundless one. Some say that many times animals are made to suffer needlessly. Alas! this is true; and, for this reason, one agrees that vivisection should be, to a certain extent, limited. It is at the hands of the tyro in surgery that the animals are made to suffer; and so it is right that he should be deprived of the privilege of unskilfully butchering animate things, but that the master of the art should at the same time be deprived does not seem just.

Let us then have vivisection. Let us not consider it a human device brought to perfection through the machinations of the Evil One; but let us consider it as a providential way of alleviating the woes of the human race. Then let us act accordingly. Let us give this holy right into none but worthy hands; and, instead of having the evils of vivisection, we will reap the everlasting benefits of discoveries made through its agency.

USES OF NOVEL-READING.

A MOSAIC.

NOTE. The following essay was written by seven persons, none of whom knew what was being written by the other six, but knew merely the points in treatment of which the various paragraphs were written.

We are surprised every now and then with startling figures showing the increase in novel reading; and people are most apt to lay the blame for this increase upon an unhealthy mental condition. This is a wholesale condemnation of a valuable kind of literature. There are novels, and then again there are novels. It is not the poorer class of novels that we are to consider, for the effect of these is surely nothing but pernicious. But to what is the increase of the better class of novels due? Apart from mere relaxation and entertainment, there are other things which may be gained from a good novel. On looking into the matter, we may attribute the increase of novel-reading (taken in its good sense) to the fact that the novel possesses an intrinsic merit which relieves, influences, strengthens and informs its reader, stirs him to action and corrects his judgments. In fine, a good novel is an educator,—an educator which brings the reader into touch with life in many phases. Because men seek for knowledge given in an easily comprehended and interesting way, the novel has much of merit; and the increase of novel reading is doubtless due to this fact. R. L. H., '97.

Though perhaps not the highest purpose to which novel reading may be placed, yet certainly the most universal usage is for relaxing and entertaining the mind. It serves the same purpose that an hour of gossip and the theater does for a tired or frivolous person. When surrounded by real or imaginary trials, an easy escape is found in the pages of a book. Swiftly, as if on a magic carpet, the reader is borne into distant climes—there to live his or her ideal life;—the young boy fights Indians to his heart's content, the sentimental girl has suitors by the score, while the disappointed man or woman finds fulfillment of all they had hoped. Imagination is the element necessary for enjoying a novel. This, however, is about the only requirement, and as little mental exertion is called for, novel-reading affords a much needed relaxation.

A. M. G., '98.

Novel reading is also a valuable aid to the study of history and geography. A skillful writer will be accurate and minute in his descriptions of people and events. The times and customs of his characters will be faithfully portrayed. He will also be particular to truthfully represent the locality about which his story centers. Under the guise of pleasing language, customs, characters, localities and events grow in charms. Thus the reader develops a taste for the essential elements of history and geography.

V. B. F., '97.

Valuable as is the knowledge of history and geography derived from novel-reading, it is in many ways secondary to the information relative to the various classes of society which have been so large a factor in making this same history. Through the medium of a good novel, we are brought into a closer and more intimate relation with the forces which are dominating and moulding the world. Rich and poor, great and small, moral and immoral, wise and foolish, strong and weak, all are made to pass before us in the good novel, which must employ them all to be a true picture of human life. We are lifted out of our own actual world of associations and set down in a new world, which surrounds us with new and novel environment and thus broadens our sympathies. Sociological problems appeal to us with greater force as we are thus brought to see them from new points of view, and consequently in truer lights. We are too narrow if we live with only one class of society. Novel-reading lifts us out of our narrowness and gives us a feeling of kindness with all classes of society by giving us information concerning them. B. B. W., '96.

Through the medium of novels, many reforms have been brought about. Not a few novels have been written for a purpose, and are valued for their lessons in human nature as well as for their representations of actual life. These novels very often depict, in their characters, well known vices in such a way as to draw the attention of the authorities to them. Thus, novels arouse public sentiment against evils to a height that could not be reached in any other way. As a result of this, laws are passed, or—if the necessary laws exist—are enforced, and the evils are abolished. Most of Dickens' novels were written with such a purpose in view. J. Y. S , '97.

And furthermore, novels give the reader an insight into human character which enables him to better judge his fellow-men and his relations to them. The great trouble with many people is that they are independent and too apt to forget their obligations to society. The reading of novels will acquaint them with characters hitherto unknown to them,—characters which have the same trials and troubles, characters which have been trained under different environment, characters which will have a great part in the future destinies of man,—and all these will most likely produce in the reader a feeling of charity for sharing the grievances common both to himself and his fellow-men. L. C. W., '96.

Lastly, in conclusion, we will leave the reader to judge whether he has not derived great pleasure, besides an unknown amount of knowledge, from the novel, which he has stored away in his brain: whether he is not a better and a wiser man for having read the works of great thinkers: whether he has not had a few of the sealed and rusty burrs in his head unscrewed thereby allowing his brain to expand, to see more clearly that there are other and many things than the few that have entered his narrow brain. After all there is nothing that takes the place of books either among pursuits or men. W. F. E., '97.

THE COXEY ALCOVE OF THE UNIVERSITY LIBRARY.

At the last Commencement Mr. William J. Coxey, of Camden, N. J., a student of the University in the early Fifties, announced his purpose to establish an Alcove in the Library to bear his name. He chose two lines of books to fill this Alcove, viz: Biblical and Religious Literature, and Works of General Reference.

During the current school-year he has been sending his contributions to our shelves as he gathered them, until he has now passed the five hundred volume mark, and he is expecting to reach six hundred by June 1896. He proposes to continue this good work for several years to come.

For this useful gift to the resources of our Library, the student body returns hearty thanks to Mr. Coxey. Every student is the richer by every book added to the Library, and in like degree is debtor to the generous donor. Books are the student's tools. In his apprenticeship he can attain the highest efficiency only by the constant use of a varied and comparatively complete outfit of such tools. Such an outfit, in the limits he has chosen, Mr. Coxey is anxious to put at the service of the present and future students of his Alma Mater.

There is not space in our columns for a complete catalogue of the Coxey Alcove: but we append a list of some of the more important titles, for the information of our friends who cannot easily step in and see for themselves.

Standard Dictionary, International Cyclopædia, 15 Vols, McClintock and Strong's Cyclopædia, 12, Encyclopædic Dictionary, 4, Hackett's Smith's Bible Dict. 4, Schaff-Herzog Encyclopædia, 4, Schaff-Gilman Cycl. Religious Poetry, the Bibliotheca Sacra, complete 52, Homiletic Review, 30, Methodist Review, 78, Missionary Review of World, 8, Presbyterian Review, 21, American Commentary on N. T., 7, Parker's People's Bible, 27, Young's Concordance, Hoyt-Ward Quotations, and many of the works of Blake, Cowles, Edersheim, Edwards, Ely, Gordon, Lecky, Milman, Pierson, Rawlinson, Spurgeon, Taylor, Vincent, and others.

The suggestion of the like opportunity for others is upon the surface. Alcoves of Art, Classics, History, Literature and Science await similar generous patronage.

THE ROENTGEN RAYS.

By Prof. W. G. Owens.

No scientific discovery within the present century has demanded more attention than that announced by Prof. W. C. Roentgen of Wurtzburg, before the Berlin Physical Society at its semi-centennial meeting, January 4, 1896. This same interest is manifest here when I see almost half of the members of this University assembled to learn what experiments with these new rays we have been able to perform.

I will first show you a "Shadowgraph" which I have produced and then, as far as may be, explain it. Taking a dry plate, I placed above it this key, a cent and a silver quarter. They were then enclosed in a box in which dry plates had been packed and which, of cource, was light tight. Outside the box I placed this Geissler tube about two inches above the lid and then passed a current of electricity from a Ruhmkorff's coil through it for about one hour and a half. The plate was then developed in the usual manner, when this negative of the object appeared upon it. The key is especially distinct. Experiments with other objects and in different positions were tried but with less success. The failure was likely due to the inability to keep up the necessary atemation with the apparatus at hand.

Several have asked "Were not these rays known before?" It was known that there were rays given out from these tubes that were some longer and others shorter than those that affect the human eye; but it was not known that any would penetrate common objects and affect sensitive plates beyond them. Some of these rays have been carefully studied by Prof. Lenard of Bonn, and others; but the rays that are now being investigated seem to differ from any that have yet been studied. Many think they are longer than the light rays and for this reason can penetrate objects like ebonite, paper, wood, flesh, light metals: while they are more or less opaque to glass, bone, and heavy metals. Prof. Roentgen seems to incline to the opinion that they are shorter than light rays, and may produce the image by flourescence.

But a small part of the waves given off from the sun are visible. Those included between Red having 428,000,000,000,000 vibrations and Violet having 739,000,000,000,000 vibrations per second are all we can see; while the shortest that has been measured has 1,622,000,000,000,000 (Cornu) and the longest 10,000,000,000,000 vibrations per second. Many of those too short to see can be made visible by passing them through a solution of quinine, eosin, fluorescein or uranium glass, as I will show you. When these rays pass in the dark, the substances glow, or fluoresce as it is called. This fluorescence was what Dr. Roentgen thought produced the change in the plate.

A writer who would detract from Prof. Roentgen's discovery states that "It has long been known that these rays would pass thro' ebonite" and "they are all found in the sun." To try this, I exposed several plates behind ebonite and some behind paper to the direct rays of the sun but got no results; while when these rays were first shown the discoverer passed them through 1000 sheets of printed paper and they produced fluorescence on barium platino cyanide on the other side.

The rays proceed only from one end of the tube known as the kathode or the one connected with the negative end of the battery and therefore they are called "Kathode (cathode) Rays" Prof. Roentgen called them "X rays" since he was not sure what they were and other Kathode rays are well known; the world has called them "Roentgen Rays" after the name of their discoverer.

The discovery is already beginning to bear fruit. From all over this country and Europe we hear of bullets, cysts, tumors, &c., being located by having the hand, or part where they are contained, subjected to these rays and the negative, which is placed beneath, developed.

What will be the final result of the study of these rays it is too early to predict. Such men as Edison and Tessla, than whom none have better chance to learn the truth, are working night and day upon them. That these rays will be of inestimable value to surgery can scarcely be doubted. Edison is reported to have discovered that a great change is produced in aluminum by passing the rays through it, suggesting that it may be a compound and not an element. He also suggests the possibility of sending photographs over a telegraph wire.

But while the prospects at present are very bright we must remember that many of the newspaper accounts are from the reporter's fertile brain and must be taken with a "grain of salt."

Athletics.

The following basket-ball games have been scheduled:

Feb. 21, Bloomsburg Normal, at Bloomsburg.

Feb. 22, Wilkesbarre Y. M. C. A. at Wilkesbarre.

Feb. 28, Lock Haven at Lock Haven.

Bucknell has accepted Pennsylvania's invitation to compete in the relay races to be held in Philadelphia on April 25th. State College has also formally accepted and Franklin and Marshall and Dickinson are expected to accept in a few days. Bucknell will send five men to the meet and should make a good showing against the teams of her class. This ought to give fresh impetus to track athletics and a good field-day will be the result if our sprinters meet with that success which usually follows hard, steady training. So far,about fifteen men are training for the April meet.

Tennis will probably receive a great deal of attention in the spring. Already there is some talk of an intercollegiate tournament and perhaps arrangements will be made to have some of the Pennsylvania colleges compete on our courts. The local tournament last June was a decided success and it brought our several strong players. '99 has some good tennis material and a successful tournament is assured. An indoor court will be placed in the gymnasium where the "tennis-fiends" can get a chance to show their ability with ball and racquet.

Baseball is not being neglected. Captain Geary has a squad of men practicing daily in the cage and on the main floor of the gymnasium. There are several promising ball-tossers in the Freshman class and just at present everything looks bright for a winning baseball team. Of last year's team there are in college, Capt. Geary, Mulkie, Brady, Jenkinson, Cutler, Bunnell, Parker, Grim, Reynolds and Clement. Among the new men are Catterall, Conover, Devall, Garner, Griffith, McQuistion and Gilchrist. Great interest is being shown in the game and by careful management we can certainly develop a team that will reflect credit on a college which, by the way, has never been very widely known through its baseball.

The Lock Haven Normal basket-ball team came down on the 14th and were defeated by the Bucknell team, eight goals to seven. Our team showed up remarkably well, considering the fact that it was their first game, and clearly outplayed the Normal boys in passing and dodging. Elliott and Smith played well for Bucknell while Loveland and Haviland carried off the honors for Lock Haven.

The teams lined up as follows:

LOCK HAVEN.	POSITIONS.	BUCKNELL.
Fox	left forward	Mulkie.
Loveland	right forward	Devall.
Kintzing	center	Smith.
Worth	left guard	Catterall.
Love	right guard	Garner.
Weymouth	left center	Burge.

Goals: Fox, Haviland (3); Weymouth, Loveland (2); Mulkie (3); Devall (2); Elliott, Smith (2). Referee, Hering.

At the meeting on Tuesday evening, February 18, Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D. D., of New York City, was chosen to preach the Annual sermon before the Associations of the University on Sunday, March 12. The Rev. Russell H. Conwell, D. D., of Philadelphia, was chosen as alternate.

At this meeting, also, Douglas, Fithian and Thomas, were appointed as nominating committee to present to the Association names of members for election to the offices of the Association. The election will be held to-night, the 25 inst.

Local.

How about the annual Stag Dance?

Miss Laura Allen is a recently initiated member of Pi Beta Phi.

The student body is awaiting further announcements of the Junior ball decided to be held by '97.

Hall '99 is out with his camera again taking any and all kinds of photographs that the students may desire.

Professor Hulley will address the Pomona Grange of Union county on "Education," Saturday evening, February 29.

Prof. Hulley has been conducting a series of Bible Readings. The circle meets weekly at the homes of various members.

Sleigh-rides have lately been a source of enjoyment for those who managed to lay aside their studies for a few hours.

The Bucknell band had their annual photograph taken at Pross' gallery recently. Photographer still alive, but machine ruined.

A neat and convenient case for the magazines has been put in the library. This gives more room on the tables for daily and weekly papers.

A new basket-ball rule is suggested: after a minutes' continuous play without a foul being made, time shall be called and the contest ended.

The Pi Beta Phi's entertained their patronesses and friends at their rooms in the Miller Mansion on Second street on Saturday evening, February 15.

W. M. Bunnell '97 was visiting in Pittston on the 12th inst. During his absence, director Cober had charge of one of the gymnasium classes.

The basket-ball team presents a fitting appearance in their new suits. A photograph of the men was taken before the game with Lock Haven Normal.

Do not forget the meeting of the MIRROR association Saturday, February 29, to decide the matter of reducing the annual subscription price to one dollar.

A specimen of this year's baseball suits was on exhibition recently. The players think the new suits are right in style and all are anxious to wear one for Bucknell.

Ninety-six ahead! One of its members got his bachelor's degree from a western University at the end of the Junior year, by sending his reports and five dollars.

Our loyal friend, Joe Shultz, has now become a regular subscriber for the MIRROR with the understanding that his name shall frequently appear in the local column. This is a case where many would do well to follow Joe's example.

We are proud to introduce to our readers two of our boys who have lately proved themselves heroic by their manly services in assisting their college sisters to cross the sheet of glary ice at the main entrance. Warren and Slifer are the young men who kindly offered their services.

Overheard on the street: First little girl, "I have to read the Saturday News and the MIRROR, yet to-night. I do like the MIRROR, don't you?"

Second diminutive: "Yes, I like to read the—oh you know what I mean—the Y. M. C. A. items."

One of our popular young men seems to make little effort to get to chapel. He may be seen at about 8:15 coming up the hill past the Academy about the time several Institute girls go to classes in prepdom. He probably realizes that the young ladies need assistance in climbing the icy paths at this season of the year.

By changing the hour of meeting on Friday evenings from 8 to 6:45 o'clock, new life has been infused into the literary societies. If an arrangement were made by which those preparing for and participating in the programs could get credit for the time spent as in honor work, the halls would doubtless be crowded.

The Phi Kappa Psi sleighing party was the first of the season and accordingly enjoyed. A merry party, a ride to Mifflinburg, and a delicious supper made the evening one to be remembered. The only draw back was the wind but, that too had its advantages, as "It was so strong you could lean your back against it like a post."

The "Accidentals" composed of Messrs. Catterall, Collins, Davis, Hanna, Harris, Hutchinson, Jennings, McCay, and Miller, entertained some Seminary friends by a sleigh-ride to Vicksburg on Thursday evening, February 13. The fact that the rain accidentally poured down all the way out only added zest to the occasion.

The Philadelphia papers are giving attention to our rapidly developing athletic standing among Pennsylvania colleges. Since Bucknell accepted the proposition to enter the inter-collegiate relay race, the Press has requested its correspondent here to furnish a letter of several hundred words on athletics for each Sunday issue until the relay race.

In the February number of the University Magazine, the first production is contributed by Professor Perrine and is an article worthy of consideration on the part of all readers. The subject is "Denominational Colleges." These are viewed from the historical and ethical points of view, and compared in development with the colleges established and supported by the State.

On Monday afternoon, the 10th inst., the newly elected MIRROR board completed its organization by selecting for editor-in-chief, Herbert Harris, '96; editorials, B. B. Ware, '96; literary editors, Miss Rosa L. Hartley, '97 and D. E. Lewis, '96; athletics, Barclay Reynolds, Jr., '96; local editors, Miss A. J. Lillibridge, '99 and F. W. Dillon, '98; personal editors, L. T. Butler, '97 and L. B. Sinnette, '97; exchange editor, L. T. Fetzer, '98.

The literary societies are getting into a sphere of local and practical debating, if we may judge by the following questions recently discussed: In Zeta, Resolved that the system of marking should be abolished in college work; Theta Alpha, Resolved that there should be only one study required in the Freshman and Sophomore years; Euepia, Resolved that the Senate should be abolished and the House of Representatives assume its duties.

On Thursday afternoon, February 14, Professor Owens gave a very interesting lecture in the Laboratory, under the auspices of the Chemical and Physical Society, on the Roentgen Rays. That the students appreciated the Professor's explanation of this phenomena was shown by the close attention of the large audience during the whole of the discourse. Professor Owens has kindly contributed a synopsis of the lecture which can be seen in another column.

Some think the students ought to wear colors to indicate their class, but it is unnecessary. If you see a student reading Spencer's Synthetic Philosophy, or a kindred subject, for recreation, put him down as a Freshman. A Sophomore is the man who is always telling "How things used to be here." Not till a man is a Junior does he refer to "lower-classmen." The man who wears an ennuied air, wonders at nothing, laughs at nothing,—he is that essence of knowledge, a Senior.

A quadrangular contest has been waged this year for supremacy in the gymnasium between the athletes of the various teams and the directors. No traces of otherism were very plainly evident. The baseball men insisted on practising during the afternoon before four o'clock and also after four o'clock both on the main floor and in the cage. Men training for general athletics were satisfied to get an occasional hour's practice but when they were menaced by flying baseballs at these times, they kicked with good reason. Basket-ball players enjoyed many privileges unmolested until they appeared for practice every night regardless of regular class drills which are supposed to take the precedence of other athletics but have been carried on under the annoyance of noisy sprinters on the track and an atmosphere full of basket-balls. The three directors soon ought to make a satisfactory division of time and bring peace into the temple of Hercules.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Miss Jessie Birkbeck spent Sunday, February 9, with her parents in Freeland, Pa.

Miss Sara Lillibridge has been visiting her sister Miss Alice Lillibridge.

We are glad now to have a bulletin board on which to post notices, instead of having to use the school-room doors.

Mrs. Elizabeth A. O'Donnell, of Texarkana, Ark., arrived last week on a visit to her daughter, Miss Marguerite O'Donnell.

The members of the Athena Literary Society spent a very pleasant evening on Friday, February 14, with "The Adelphia" of the Academy.

The Class of '96 of the Institute were delighted to accept a kind invitation, for Friday evening, February 21, to a class supper with the college Seniors at the home of Mr. Frank Miller.

The Y. W. C. A. gave a very interesting program at the meeting Sunday afternoon, February 9. The subject was a study of the sacred paintings in the Institute, and their Artists.

The large picture at the end of the parlor which was given to the art department by Mrs. Harry S. Hopper represents a scene from the Apochryphal story of Tobit and the Angel. The life of Tobit was most interestingly narrated by Mrs. Larison.

The last meeting of the Kalomathia Literary Society, held February 7, was both interesting and profitable. The program rendered was in the form of a paper, read by Miss Youngman.

The contributions were as follows:—

Editorial - - - - - - - - Miss Williamson.
Criticism of a Late Piece of Fiction, Miss Morris.
General Information, Misses Shires and Bender.
Original Story - - - - - - - Miss Watkins.
Jokes - - - - - - - - Misses Kase and Noyes.
Personals - - - Misses Rossiter and J. Jones.
Advertisements - Misses Kline and M. Goddard.
Original Poem - - - - - Miss Miriam Hanna.

ACADEMY NEWS.

Mr. R. N. Brady, the athlete, is a recent initiate of the Phi Epsilons.

John and Cameron Packer are pledged members of the Phi Kappa Psi Fraternity.

A. D. Anstock, a former student at the "Cad," is pursuing a course in Pharmacy at Philadelphia.

Many of the Academy students attended the District Y. M. C. A. convention at Milton. A profitable time is reported.

The students of the Academy are taking more interest in indoor athletics since permission has been granted them to enter the meet on the twenty-second.

The Hermenia Literary society has decided to hold an open meeting and reception at Mrs. Helen C. Huth's parlors on Friday evening, February 28. A number of the Alumni members of the society will be present.

The Athena Literary Society of the Seminary and the Adelphia Literary Society held a joint meeting in the Adelphia Society rooms on Friday evening, February 14, which was enjoyable and profitable in every way. The musical part of the program was furnished by members of Athena and the literary part by members of Adelphia. We believe that this is the beginning of a new era for our literary societies, and that joint meetings will hereafter be of frequent occurrence.

Personals.

All Classes.—There is no doubt that the Alumni enjoy knowing what their classmates and college acquaintances are doing. If the Alumni will co-operate with the personal editor of the Mirror by sending items of interest, they will increase the mutual benefit of the paper.

Ex-'65. Mr. R. F. G. Kshinka is living near Berwick.

Ex-'69. Rev. D. R. Landis is chaplain of the State Senate, Dakotah.

'70. Hon. Lemuel Ammerman has been appointed trustee of the Judge Hanley estate valued at over $1,000,000 and will receive a fee of $25,000.

'71. Rev. John Humpstone, D. D., is delivering a course of lectures at Crozer on the following subjects: "The Preacher as a Man," "The Preacher as a Student," "The Preacher as a Man of Affairs," and "The Preacher as a Man of God."

'77. Hon. Eugene Emley of Passaic, N. J., has been appointed Prosecutor of the Pleas for Passaic county.

'78. Following the Week of Prayer for colleges, a series of meetings was conducted at Peddie Institute by the Prin., Rev. Joseph E. Perry, Ph. D., which resulted in profession of Christianity by all but two.

'78. Rev. James Fielding as financial agent of Keystone Academy has materially increased the endowment.

'79. Mr. A. J. Irey has returned to Pennsylvania.

'87. Mr. Edward Paul has been admitted to the bar and is practicing at Milton.

The Wittenberger contains the following information which may be of interest to us:—Senator Garfield of the Ohio legislature, a son of the martyred president has introduced a bill to limit the number of colleges in the state; under the provisions of this bill all institutions of learning applying hereafter for charters must receive the approval of a University council of ten members and must have a yearly income of $15,000. The personel of the council will be the State Superintendent of Education, three presidents of undenominational colleges and three presidents of denominational colleges, and three superintendents of public Schools. Existing colleges will be required to show an income of $7,500 in order to insure their continued life. It is stated that the bill was prepared at the instigation of President Thwing of Adelbert, and President Canfield of O. S. U.

Editorial.

CLASS spirit is a commendable possession for all students, when that spirit finds expression in legitimate efforts to excel. But class spirit does not give unrestricted license; it gives no privileges that set at defiance rights which honor is bound to respect. These limitations do not relegate class spirit to the realm of the prosaic and dull—under such conditions it would fail to accomplish that which is its principal object—nor do they exclude harmless and innocent fun. But class spirit is exercising itself in ways not its prerogative when it forgets the obligations which rest upon any one who claims to be a gentleman. There are jokes and efforts at fun which lend spice to the life of the student, but some of the perpetrations in connection with the recent difference between the Sophomore and Freshman classes no man who is just or fair minded can approve. In everything be fair! Don't do in another's room that which you would be unwilling to have done in your own when you have done no greater wrong than participate in a class banquet.

One other matter of the same nature calls for comment here. It would seem that a new division of the students into upper and lower classmen is necessary. There are other things than the mere bounds of class years that mark the proper division into the two bodies: more than these are needed to qualify a man to be an upper classman. It is generally considered in all colleges that the province of the upper classes is to act as a court of appeal in all cases of dispute between the lower classes. In the recent difference mentioned above members of both the Senior and Junior classes forfeited the right to sit in judgment by very marked indirect, if not by direct, participation. It is to be greatly lamented that all upper classmen do not appreciate the power given them, or recognize the obligations entailed upon them by their position. Some of the mightiest laws are unwritten.

"THOSE Juniors are a set of jays!" Yes; that's what '95 said of '94 when '95 was a Soph; what '94 said of '95 when '94 was a Senior; what '95 said of '96 when '95 was a Senior, and what '96 and some others are saying of '97 in these latter days. Strange! After all, the point of view has much to do with deciding one's own course of action and fully as much with his judgment of others' doings. Nevertheless, an evident lesson is at hand for the Junior class, be it '97 or some future year: Avoid undue eagerness to see your assailants of last year again engaged in scrapping. When classes vote to do away with such contests, it ought to be beneath the dignity of a Junior to incite an attempt on the part of the Freshmen to stir up the Sophomores. Class scraps at Bucknell will never come to an end unless the upper classmen use their influence in suppressing them.

WHILE BANQUETING.

Read by E. R. Powell, '96, at Mr. Miller's reception to the Senior class.

Though learning's road perchance may seem,
To be at times a little rough;
Though we o'er lessons nod and dream,
But wake to find them doubly tough
What though our energies we ply
From day to day our pates to cram
With wisdom sage, but vainly try
To resurrect it for "exam,"
Yet now and then a day may give
A passing gleam of Sportive Light,
Enough to make us glad we live,
And so—We'er glad we live to-night.

The Profs,—may all their tribes increase!—
In pity for our low estate,
Dole out their knowledge piece by piece,
With comments wise and intricate,
They take our little heads away,
And give us larger ones instead.
Our minds are lean, quite lean they say
And must be from their bounty fed,
Of course we take just as they give,
And take for granted they are right;
But since our bodies too must live,
Will eat corporeal food to-night.

They teach us to philosophize,
As all at once agree we should,
To strive to find and realize,
The goal of life, the highest good.
This good in knowledge some may see,
While others still may deem it meet
To live for wealth or fame, but we
At present live to laugh and eat.
Here rest we now, nor seek to climb
To any more pretentious height.
Whate'r we be another time,
We're Epicureans to-night.

BYRON, THE VOICE.

The poet is not so much a great man, as a voice. Great men are founders of states, of religions—men of action; the philosopher and the poet are the voice of their age, the one of its thought, the other of its feeling.

So Byron is the voice of the revolution age on the side of its passion. Neither Scott nor Wordsworth was the voice of the revolution age—Scott was only negatively so: He was conservative, medieval, the glorifier of the past; Wordsworth was reflective, didactic, pantheistic. Nor had the voice of either of them, much less that of Moore, sufficient volume to utter the passion of the Demos awaking after chiliads of slumber to a consciousness of her power, of her rights, and of her wrongs.

She had tested her strength on the field and in the forum and found herself irresistible; but she had not yet found her voice. But when Byron landed in Europe, fitted as he was by heredity, and by training, the Zeitgeist seized his impressionable nature and uttered through him the passion that had stormed on a hundred battlefields, and the agony that had accumulated under the wrongs of a thousand years. It was the Time-Spirit rather than Byron which summoned "August Athena," and Rome, the "Niobe of Notions," and the East, "the clime of the sun," and of the new West with its unpruned forests and its roar of cataracts,—wherever, in fine, freedom had found a home or a grave, —as well as the stars, "the poetry of heaven," and "night and storm and darkness," and the mountains and the rivers and the seas all to join their voices in the mingled music of the voice through which Europe uttered her passion and her wrongs. This accounts for his sudden and unprecedented popularity. It was the Demos, hitherto voiceless, speaking through him; and in his, recognizing her own voice.

To understand Byron, we must remember that Byron is not an English but a Continental poet. He uses the English language, the language of Freedom, and so fittest for the Voice of Europe; but he is not an English poet. Yet his reception by the English was at first like that of the Demos of Europe. All the progressives and the youth hailed him as the new star of poesy, not half comprehending him; but the aristocracy, polished, polite, merciless,—as aristocracies always are,—understood, with the sure instinct of despotism, knew what the portent meant, and what the Voice was uttering,—better than the Voice himself yet understood. The aristocracy bided its time and it was not long in coming. Byron's marital difficulties were not the cause, but the opportune occasion only of the ferocious outburst, the real source of which lay deeper. Unfortunately the poet gave amply other occasions on which privilege might seize. Yet it was fortunate for Byron's mission that he was exiled from England; he could thus give voice to the age the better.

As the Voice of the age in one of its phases, he partook of the characteristics of the age. The age was destructive, rather than constructive; so Byron has no gospel for recreating Europe but can only utter passionate appeals for the breaking of every fetter that weighs upon the mind or heart or limbs of man; the Demos is just emerging into self-consciousness, and so its Voice is self-conscious, and egotistic.

Byron was pessimistic but not despairing. When "France got drunk with blood to vomit crime" in her revolution orgies, he felt the fatal blow which Freedom had received; still he sings with hope—

> "Yet, Freedom! yet thy banner torn but flying,
> Streams like the thunder-storm against the wind.
> Thy tree hath lost its blossoms and its rind
> Chopped by the axe, looks rough and little worth,
> But the sap lasts."

These are brave words; yet it cannot be denied that the despair which settled on Europe when the Bourbons returned to the throne, and the Holy Alliance conspired to crush freedom, filled Byron's work during this time with an undertone of despair; as is seen in Don Juan, a Mephistopheles, "the spirit which denies," wandering over Europe mocking at everything and finding plenty at which to mock. But when Greece raised the standard of revolt against the Turk, and Europe, a giant with unshorn locks, began again to move, and earth to tremble, the Voice again sounded in the old strain. The hour of despair had passed and the hour of hope again had come before the Voice ceased its utterance forever.

A STUDENT'S SEARCH FOR THE HOLY GRAIL.

> "Many a shot at random sent,
> Finds mark the archer little meant—
> The MIRROR Box.

One evening several years ago, my room door was opened by the last man in college that I expected when I heard the knock. Besides being something of a recluse and out of touch with the students in general he was an upper classman and ceremoniously observed class proprieties. He carried a monstrous white-leather volume under his arm, and with a formal salutation said; "I have a favor to ask of you in a matter that I feel will bring some reward. You doubtless think it strange for me, on such slight acquaintance to come here; but without any explanation I will simply say that I have considered the matter carefully."

Gratified by this distinction, I asked what I could do.

"For several weeks," he replied, "I have been tracing out some of Sir Walter Scott's stories in the original. This volume of Froissart's Chronicles was obscurely tucked away in the Library but really it is interesting. However, to the point. Here it is," and quickly leafing to the proper page, he read a prophecy of the magician Merlin, communicated when Arthur's great mission failed:

> "'No fret o'er Sangreal expend;
> 'Til Teuton will the Jew befriend.'

"To-night," he continued, "the big German on the third floor has invited me up to a feed, and said that I might bring some one with me. That couplet of Merlin's is a premonition that something will happen, and it haunts me."

"I was not aware that you knew of my Jewish extraction," said I, devining his scheme, "but, of course, that is nothing. His feeds are rare and select, I understand, I am delighted to go."

I became more and more impressed with the fact that I was a deus ex machina to work out my companion's conjuration.

The host as we entered at ten o'clock raised his brow inquiringly and said only too plainly by countenance, "How in the world did you happen to bring that Freshman." He was however friendly to me. There were only four of us: the one not yet mentioned was regarded as the brightest fellow in school, adding to vivid imagination and tenacious memory the greatest industry. Our host, the German, was a large man noted as an athlete; a man of violent temper and ferocious aspect. Underneath that rough exterior, though, was a loyalty that never deserted a cause. Of my companion, I am no more certain now than on that evening. He had a calculating turn of mind, was abnormally quiet and given to long abstraction. I have thought of him many times since, but without any solution.

After discussing the poetry of Goethe, Buddhistic Philosophy and what not—for I was unable to appreciate their conversation—our host drew out various articles of food from a heavily locked chest. There was more in that chest than food; for I remember hearing distinctly a clinking. The party was very lively, and gastronomically I kept with it.

At last the company disappeared. My companion as we parted said in an undertone: "The grail is beneath my coat, but do not dare to mention it."

Whether he really thought he had the grail and afterward learned his mistake, and how much deceit there lay beneath that taciturn countenance,—I never expect to know: but the next week I learned that the Literary Society Debate Cup was missing from its retreat and no man knows its resting place.

A FOOTBALL LEAGUE.

M. R. COLLINS, '97.

The question should athletics be allowed in our Colleges. has ceased to be debated. The question now is, how shall we make them most beneficial. Certain considerations lead me to think that this will be accomplished in football by a league.

In the first place it would improve the game itself. The larger colleges are obliged each year jointly to make out a set of rules, by which each college may be governed individually and yet coincide in match games. But these rules do not meet the requirements where contesting teams are on different bases. If there is to be any comparison of teams they must come together on the same level, use the same rules, indulge in the same sport. If Pennsylvania colleges would form a league they could enact rules govering the contests and instead of the present jockeying for advantage there would be a fair, decisive contest.

From the player's standpoint it appears beneficial. It would purify athletics. Where amateur leagues exist professional men are turned down; with special, stringent rules professionalism could be almost eliminated. Purely college contests moreover would give football a better name. The town and professional players are those who bring upon it discredit and slurring remarks. Another reason is football requires constant practice and we all know how hard it is to get the men to train for our small games and the lack of it is demoralizing. They know they can win without regular practice and a big score is no incentive. Their attitude is decidedly different before a big game. Where the prize is highest the fight is hottest. Our present purpose is too small. We practice football during the entire year practically for one game, and when this is accomplished the result is trivial and unsatisfying. But with the greater prize in sight, standing in the league, every player would exert himself throughout the season and feel amply repaid for his labor.

Our intercollegiate position would be bettered. For while the student body thinks their team second in Pennsylvania, the players realize that they cannot schedule games that will allow any absolute reckoning to be made. Some of our most enthusiastic supporters, however, say that Bucknell should not go into a league of the first five because she might stand in a subordinate position. Should a league be formed and we not join we would sadly miss it. The Colleges in the league will be competitors; those outside will be forced to become spectators. If a league is composed confessedly of the five first teams, it can easily be deduced that a team out of the league will be unavoidably reckoned as not of the five best. It is better to be last in a first class than first in a second class.

As an advertisement it would be advantageous. The championship of the Pennsylvania Football league during the fall would be the engrossing subject of sporting interest for Pennsylvanians. Each team's supporters would become the supporters of the other four. Our league would command space in the news columns, for the press is always willing to print what the people want. It is a lamentable fact that a vast majority of the people cannot name over one or two colleges in the state, if they can name any. The league will bring all five before the public simultaneously, those who know of one will be interested in all; their attention will be held, sympathies aroused and support elicited.

For financial reasons some people object. They say that we tried a league once and could not defray expenses. But times are better now. Then football interest was confined to the few, it has widened wonderfully in the past five years. Our ordinary games are financially successful. The game at Williamsport with State, the Indian game, the Sunbury game brought in plenty of money. We lost on but one game last year and that was the poorest. The reason is not far to seek. Anyone is willing to pay to see a hard, manly contest but no one cares to witness a game when one side is in an easy lead from start to finish. All the league games would be big games and people would be sure of seeing real football when they paid the entrance fee. And the excitement of league game is two-fold as all baseball enthusiasts know. The part derived from the game itself already discussed and that arising from comparative competition. Both of these would be high if a football league were formed.

Let us by all means have a league. The players, the college, the rooters, the business manager, and the registrar should unite to encourage a football league for ninety-six.

TWO BANQUETS.

Mr. and Mrs. D. Bright Miller gave a supper to the graduating classes of Institute and College in honor of their son Frank. The guests arrived at five-thirty and shortly afterwards repaird to the large dining hall. This room was elaborately decorated in Orange and Blue, bespangled with daisies—the class flower. After doing justice to an extensive number of courses, H. T. Colestock, the class president, in fitting remarks called for a toast from Mr. Rohland in honor of "Our Host." The subject of course filled the speaker with spontaneous eloquence. Mr. Walkinshaw was advisedly given the subject—"The Ladies." After he had told two jokes,—we have his word for it,—Miss Williamson made a touching response. The class poet read a poem on "Banqueting," given above, amid rounds of applause. Mr. Ware followed with a toast on the subject, "Of making of books there is no end and much study is weariness of the flesh." Inasmuch as he is a printer, the first part of the sentence is applicable and others think so of the whole text. Mr. Reynolds spoke authoritatively on the "Ultimate Ground of Obligation." This consists during the senior year in at least standing up when called on in Ethics. "That recitation is like a game of euchre; the Doctor orders you up, you give him your best, and he goes it alone." The toast master then introduced the last speaker, Mr. Wood, who spoke on that dearest of themes—"'96."

After leaving the hall, the guests enjoyed music, dancing, and recitations until the word came, all too soon, that the ladies must go. With rousing cheers for Host and Hostess the banqueters disappeared into the night.

For some time '99 slept with one eye open to find out when and where '98 intended to hold its banquet. But that eye might as well have been closed. On Thursday, February 27, as darkness was falling from the wings of night, the Sophs. stole away as silently as the Arabs and were safe and snug in a private car and well on their way to Sunbury before the Freshies awoke to the exasperating truth that they had been outwitted. Then in their delirium, led on by some gentlemanly Juniors who really ought to know better, the poor, deluded Freshies went through a number of childish performances; for all of which they now are duly sorry.

And all this time the Sophs., serenely ignorant of the pillaging going on at home, were chatting and joking, and smiling and nodding at each other in a very congenial way over familiar eatables with unfamiliar French names. After properly disposing of the numerous courses and taking a drink from the Mirror trophy cup and secretly committing to memory the French names, '98 heaved a contended sigh of fullness, leaned back in its chairs, and turned toward the Toast Master with that little self-satisfied, after dinner look of expectance that says as plain as novels would say it: "Now let's hear somebody say something."

Accordingly Mr. Flint rose. In a graceful little speech, replete with classic allusions and ending with the gallant statement that a woman always leads, he asked Miss Flora Siegel to respond to the toast, "Our Class Motto." Miss Siegel ably showed that woman rightly leads the way. She praised the wisdom of the class in choosing the business-like motto, "Virtus in Actione Consistit," and pointed out how zealously '98 has lived up to it.

In reply to "'98 and the Odd Numbers," Mr. Walter L. Hill made a bright, pleasant little speech, in spite of the disagreeableness of his subject.

He was followed by the class Quartette, Messrs. Dutton, Flint, Fithian and Thomas, who sang several wittingly worded and well rendered songs, written by them for the occasion.

Then the call for "Our Professors," gave Mr. George T. Ritter a chance to soar, and soar he did. A phalanx of phonographs could not reproduce his flights about "redecapitation in the impending struggle with the pendulum, the steam engine and the washing machine."

Mr. C. A. Lindeman was called upon to "toast co-education at Bucknell," but, as he himself put it, he seemed rather to "roast" it. His most striking statement was: "Surrounding it (co-education) there seems to be a subtle, indescribable something, perhaps analagous to a vortex ring, within which there is an influence highly inimical to the purpose of a man who is aiming for a worthy place as a student."

After Mr. Lindeman had resumed his seat Miss Grace Slifer contributed to the enjoyment of the evening by reading some original, well turned verses, full of life and fun and in perfect accord with the joyous spirit of the hour.

On "Class Athletics" Mr. Roy B. Mulkie recounted the achievements of '98 in the field of sport and made an earnest appeal to every man in the class to help with his "mite or might" to defend the "MIRROR Cup" in the coming contest.

Mr. B. F. Thomas gave the last toast "What we have not done." According to him '98 has left undone few of those things she ought to have done and has done absolutely none of those things she ought not to have done, and she is very well, thanks.

The evening was crowned by songs and cheers and a general good fellowship and each one came away more closely than ever before bound to his class-mates and to his class. And, although after a dreary trudge across the bridge from Montandon the terrible news of the devastated condition of their rooms was learned and a number of the fellows had to sleep on the floor, it will be many a day before '98 will forget the delightful evening and the brilliant success of its Sophomore Banquet.

Athletics.

On Friday, February 21, the basket-ball team journeyed to Bloomsburg where they played the Normal School team of that city. The score was 24 to 12 in favor of Bloomsburg. The next evening Bucknell tried conclusions with the Wilkesbarre Y. M. C. A. team and suffered another defeat, this time the score being 17 to 6. The men have only words of highest praise for their treatment and entertainment in that city, and are positive that the game was won on its merits,—Wilkesbarre clearly outclassing us in every point. On Friday evening, February 28, our team met with another defeat. This time the Williamsport Y. M. C. A. took the boys into camp, the score being 12 to 2. This game closed the season, the team disbanding in order to devote more time and attention to baseball.

On February 22, the second annual indoor track meet was held in Tustin gymnasium and proved to be a very successful affair. Five new indoor records were established. The meet was opened by an indoor tennis match, Profs. Phillips and Fisher against Williams and Reynolds. The playing was quite spirited, the Professors finally winning from the Senior team by superior all round work, 11 games to 6. Following is a summary of the events:

Twenty-yards' dash, Thomas, '98, 2 seconds.

Climbing 18 foot pole, Slifer, '98, 11½ seconds. New record.

Running high jump, Pearse, Academy., 5 ft. ½ in. New record.

One-quarter mile run, Dillon, '98, 1 min. 9 sec. New record.

One-half mile run, Slifer, '98, 2 min. 35 sec.

High dive, Meserve '99, 5 feet 1½ inches.

Pole Vault, Davis '98, 7 feet 7½ inches.

One-half mile walk, Thomas '98, 4 min. 18 sec. New Record.

The following have been elected officers of the Association for the year beginning April 2: President, E. C. Kunkle, '97; Vice President, H. C. Fithian, '98; Recording Secretary, J. R. L. Diggs, '98; Corresponding Secretary, G. L. Bayard, '99; Treasurer, E. R. Myers, '97.

The Volunteer Band for Foreign Missions held a public meeting in Bucknell Hall, Sunday, March 8. An interesting program was carried out.

The Band is doing aggressive work in visitation. Sunday, March 1, Ezra Allen, '95, addressed the students of State College, and B. B. Ware, '96, addressed two meetings at Gettysburg College. Several members of the Band conducted a Missionary service in the Baptist Church of Sunbury, Thursday evening, March 5. The ladies of the Band were also engaged in similar work.

The Academy Association last Tuesday evening elected the following officers for the ensuing year: President, E. T. Shields; Vice President, G. W. Alexander; Rec. Secretary, C. B. Ayars; Cor. Secretary, H. B. C. Riemer; Treasurer, R. G. Pierson.

Local.

R. H. Rivenburg, '97 has been spending a couple of weeks away from college with friends.

Miss Rosa Hartley, the Literary Editor, has been confined to her home for some time by illness.

Misses Goddard and Taylor were in Milton on February 27, and addressed the Y. W. C. A. of that place.

Frank Hollinshead, '97, went home to Philadelphia to vote on election day. How Holly does enjoy voting.

We are glad to see Miss Davenport with us again and sympathize deeply with her in her sad bereavement!

The "Dutchman" has been kept busy with stray dogs, new shoes, and boisterous Freshmen during the past few weeks.

Prof. Hulley filled the pulpit of the Baptist church on Sunday, February 23, at Franklin, Pa. where he is well known.

Friday evening, March 13, the second Junior debate will be held, and from it men are to be selected for the prize contest.

Walter Hill, '98, slightly injured his ankle while jumping in the gymnasium a few days ago. He has recovered from the shock.

Macnab had a "date" on the evening of the twenty-fifth. These previous engagements always do interfere with our social happiness.

It would be a good idea for the relay team candidates to have a cross country run or an inter-class relay race, or both this month.

Local astronomers tell us that about forty sun spots were visible the last week in February. Attempts to photograph the largest ones failed.

We hear that Page and Hile, two new students who expect to come to Bucknell next term, are likely to try for battery positions on the base-ball nine.

Dr. Groff served up a lamb's head for the benefit of the Sophomore class in Physiology a short time ago. The brains were given to ———. Watch for effects.

We hear that our Freshman friend, LeVan, has received several flattering offers to fill the space in local papers until recently occupied by the late William Nye.

The library notices posted on the bulletin board are very entertaining as must also be the books kept out three or four weeks when they are needed daily by others.

A neatly arranged bargain counter made up of the contents of room 5 West Wing attracted much attention one Sunday afternoon. The inhabitant of that room was absent during the performance.

Saturday, March 21 will be held the annual class drills at the gymnasium. Several new features will be introduced in the program and all should attend to show their appreciation of the directors' work.

"Tales from Velleius Paterculus" recently published by an energetic Sophomore has caused that tired feeling to creep over the frames of several Freshmen who now look forward to next term with terror.

Candidates for the relay team should use the gymnasium track steadily until the end of this term and be in as good condition as possible for out door work. Next term the time for training will be very short.

Some one has suggested that we devote an evening to sparring, boxing, wrestling, and fencing contests in the Gymnasium. Undoubtedly such a meeting would prove a financial success if properly conducted.

The "Sheeneys" were given a delightful reception by Mrs. Hulley on February 27. After an elegant repast they were delighted by the Professor's inimitable renderings from Whitcomb Riley. Surely the Hebrews are not to be sniffed at.

In olden times college literary society men were wont occasionally to entertain their Seminary friends at the hill, but now the "preps" have almost monopolized the young ladies' attention When will the good old days return?

Our friend "Doc" Brown is engaged to deliver a lecture at the Pottsgrove Academy on the "Story of an Oil Barrel" soon. Several friends will go along to preserve order. Mr. Sheddan, '95, "Doc's old chum," has charge of this school.

The material for L'Agenda is fast coming in and the board is busy perfecting the many details. Artistically this will be a handsome book and it will be more convenient to handle than previous issues. It is expected to appear about May first.

Mr. Fred. L. Hayes as the guest of Prin. and Mrs. Edwards at the Academy, Thursday, February 20, had a pleasant visit with his friends of the Union City Club. Mr. Hayes is one of the traveling salesmen for the Keystone Chair Works of Union City.

Let the MIRROR suggest to our brainy readers that they spring a surprise on the students and have an inter-society or an inter-class debate some evening in Bucknell Hall. Some men like to talk considerably but when it comes down to talking for a purpose their power of speech vanishes.

A party of Institute girls came up on the hill to see the heavens from the observatory a few nights ago but in addition they saw the atmosphere full of water pails, tin horns, and masculine shouts. No doubt some one was getting even for like treatment under the ramparts of the Institute. Come again girls.

Five hundred invitations have been sent out for the Junior ball at the Armory, Friday evening, March 13. The committee has worked ceaselessly to make the affair a success, the Sunbury military band has been engaged to furnish music. '97 will make every effort to entertain their many friends in a becoming style.

The College Girls Glee Club made its debut in the Reitmeyer Benefit Concert held in the Opera House on February 28. They are to be congratulated upon bringing an unusually chilly audience to a hearty encore. At the close of this term they will give a concert in Bucknell Hall in conjunction with the University Band.

The following are settled features of the Commencement Program: Prof. E. H. Johnson, D. D., of Crozer, will deliver the sermon before the Educational Society on Sunday; Pres. Harper, of Chicago University, will address the Literary Societies on Monday Evening; Prof. Milton G. Evans, D. D. pronounces the oration before the Alumni on Tuesday.

To Alex. Douglas of the Senior class belongs considerable of the credit that the people of Lewisburg and the students of Bucknell are enabled to hear the excellent course of University Extension lectures being delivered Saturday evenings by Dr. W. Clarke Robinson, and that the proceeds go to the Christian organizations. These lectures are highly appreciated by our young people who attend each week.

Our ever popular and delightful ex-Bucknell student returned from Waverly, N. Y. in the person of Rev. Charles DeWoody and delivered another of his interesting humorous lectures in Bucknell Hall, Thursday evening, Feb. 27. The audience could have been larger but not more appreciative. The young men of his fraternity, the Sigma Chi, pleasantly entertained the speaker after the lecture.

A meeting of the Executive committee on Athletics was held at the home of Prof. Hulley, Wednesday afternoon, February 26, when it was decided to close the basket-ball season at Williamsport the following Friday night, but an inter-class game was requested in order to balance the season financially. The finance committee was authorized to get H. F. Smith, '94, now of Universiy of Pennsylvania to coach the baseball players indoors this month.

It was a mean trick that the class in English History played on Professor Hulley a short time since when they left the class-room en masse at the expiration of the ten-minute limit, though they knew that the Professor was coming not far off. But it was a meaner trick for the man who was the first to instigate the ungentlemanly proceeding, when all his comrades had dispersed to their rooms, to sneak back to the recitation room. But that is probably the way they do it at Chicago.

The cup on the water tank has been causing unlimited trouble and pleasure. Some one walked off with the chain at the same time forgetting to detach the cup. Then the boys went thirsty until some kind person in the east wing started a subscription. They must have used up all their money because the next time we saw the filter there was a two quart dipper atached by a log chain and fastened with a large padlock. Even the Dutchman was surprised. Meanwhile the the original cup was found and returned; but the kindness of the east wingers will never be forgotten.

Two new clubs for upper classmen were recently form from the embryonic doctors and lawyers. The Alfred Taylor Law Club, named in honor of our late distinguished alumnus, adopted a constitution and elected for president, Rohland '96; vice president, Walkinshaw '96; secretary, Reynolds '96; treasurer, Sinnette '97. This club will meet every month for the study of law and transaction of business. Of the Dr. Carpenter Medical Club the officers are Williams '96, President; Fisher '96, Vice President;Brown '96, Secretary, and Grim '97, Treasurer. It meets at the call of the President.

As usual all regular work was suspended on Washington's Birthday, but coming on Saturday it was not observed by collegeate exercises. The Freshmen and Juniors were mad because Macnab put up the American flag in place of ninety-nine's colors so cleverly lowered by the Sophs. Two Sophomore girls battled nobly to keep the Freshmen colors down at the Institute. The loyal girls of '99 attended the indoor meeting wearing their color and sorrowfully viewing the superiority of Sophomore athletes. Upper classmen wasted their breath trying to provoke a class rush. This, in a nut shell, is the history of an uneventful day such as was Saturday, February 22., 1896.
